Pentreath (Dolly). The last person who spoke Cornish. Daines Barrington went from London to the Land’s End to visit her. She lived at Mouseshole.

“Hail, Mouseshole! birthplace of old Doll Pentreath.
The last who jabbered Cornish, so says
Daines Barrington.
Peter Fidler (Ode xxi. To Myself).
Peony. The name Peony is derived from the Greek word peinō, meaning to suffer or to endure. The Peony, or Paeonia officinalis, is a herbaceous plant native to Asia and Europe. It is noted for its large, showy flowers and its medicinal properties.

People. The word "people" comes from the Old English peopel, which means a crowd or a mass.

People's Charter. The People's Charter of 1848 was a political reform movement in Britain, advocating for the extension of the right to vote to all adult males.

Pepper. Pepper was a valuable commodity in ancient times, and its use as a spice dates back to ancient civilizations.

Pepper Gate. Pepper Gate was a gate in the city of Chester, England.

Pepper and Salt. Pepper and salt were used in ancient times for their flavor and preservative properties.

Peppercorn Rent. Peppercorn rent, a nominal rent, was a type of rent that required the payment of a small amount of peppercorns.

Peppy Bap. Peppy Bap is a term used to describe a lively and energetic child.

Per Salum (Latin). Per Salum, or "by the sea," is a phrase used in the Vulgate Bible to describe the location of the island of Sicily.

Perdita. Perdita was a daughter of Leontes and Hermione, and she was the object of much suffering and intrigue in Shakespeare's play "The Winter's Tale."
read his epistles in a new light. They reject all law, saying the guidance of the Spirit is superior to all human codes. If they would know how to act in matters affecting others, they consult "public opinion," expressed by a committee; and the "law of sympathy" so expressed is their law of action. In material prosperity, this society is unmatched by all the societies of North America. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, vii, 30, 21.)

Perdrix, toujours Perdrix. Too much of the same thing. Walpole tells us that the confessors of one of the French kings reproofed him for conjugal infidelity, and was asked by the king what he liked best. "Partridge," replied the priest, and the king ordered him to be served with partridge every day, till he quite loathed the sight of his favourite dish. After a time, the king visited him, and hoped he had been well served, when the confessors replied, "Mais oui, perdrix, toujours perdrix." "Ah! ah!" replied the amorous monarch, "and one mistress is all very well, but not perdrix, toujours perdrix." "Soup for dinner, soup for supper, and soup for washing again." —Fauquhar: The Inconstant, iv, 2.

Père Duchêne. Jacques René Hébert, one of the most profligate characters of the French Revolution. He was editor of a vile newspaper so called, containing the grossest insinuations against Marie Antoinette. (1753-1794.)

Père la Chaise, the Parisian cemetery, is the site of a great monastery founded by Louis XIV., of which his confessors, Père la Chaise, was made the superior. After the Revolution, the grounds were laid out for a public cemetery; first used in May, 1804.

Perigrine (3 syl.) ran away from home, and obtained a loan of £10 from Job Thornbury, with which he went abroad and traded: he returned a wealthy man, and arrived in London on the very day Job Thornbury was made a bankrupt. Having paid the creditors out of the proceeds made from the hardwareman’s loan, he married his daughter. (George Colman the Younger: John Bull.)

Perigrine Falcon (A). The female is larger than the male, as is the case with most birds of prey. The female is the falcon of falconers, and the male the tercel. It is called perigrine from its wandering habits.

Perigrine Pickle. The hero of Smollett’s novel so called. A savage, ungrateful spendthrift; fond of practical jokes to the annoyance of others, and suffering with evil temper the misfortunes brought on by his own wilfulness.

Perfectionista. A society founded by Father Noyes in Oneida Creek. They take St. Paul for their law-giver, but
The most common inscription was, "Draw me not without reason, sheathe me not without honour."

Perillos and the Brazen Bull. Perillos of Athens made a brazen bull for Phalaris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, intended for the execution of criminals. They were shut up in the bull, and, fires being lighted below the belly, the metal was made "red hot." The cries of the victims, reverberating, sounded like the lowing of the bull. Phalaris admired the invention, but tested it on Perillos himself. (See Inventors.)

Perillos Castle. The castle of Lord Douglas was so called in the reign of Edward I., because good Lord Douglas destroyed several English garrisons stationed there, and vowed to be revenged on anyone who should dare to take possession of it. Sir Walter Scott calls it "Castle Dangerous." (See Introduction of Castle Dangerous.)

Perion. A fabulous king of Gaul, father of "Amadius of Gaul." His encounter with the lion is one of his best exploits. It is said that he was hunting, when his horse reared and snorted at seeing a lion in the path. Perion leaped to the ground and attacked the lion, but the lion overturned him: whereupon the king drove his sword into the belly of the beast and killed him. (Amadis de Gaul, chap. i.)

Peripatetics. Founder of the Peripatetics—Aristotle, who used to teach his disciples in the covered walk of the Lyceum. This colonnade was called the peripatés, because it was a place for walking about (pers patēs).

Peris. (See Perl.)

Perissáa (excess of prodigality: Greek, Perissos). Step-sister of Elissa and Medina. These ladies could never agree on any subject. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, bk. ii.)

Periw. (See Peruke.)

Periwinkle. The bind-around plant. (Anglo-Saxon, pinecwele; French, pérénèche; Latin, perennis, to bind thoroughly.) In Italy it was used to wound dead infants, and hence its Italian name, fior de morte.

Perk. To perk oneself. To plume oneself on anything. (Welsh, peren, to smarten or plume feathers, pere, neat.)

You begin to perk up a bit—i.e. to get a little fatter and more plump after an illness. (See above.)

Perku'nos. God of the elements. The Scylovian Trinity was Perku'nos, Rikollos, and Potrimpos. (Grum.: Deutsche Mythologie.)

Pern'ian Strata. So called from Perm, in Russia, where they are most distinctly developed.

Pernelle (Madame). A scolding old woman in Molière's Tartuffe.

Perpendiculars. Parties called crushes, in which persons have to stand almost stationary from the time of entering the suite of rooms to the time of leaving them.

"The night before I daily attended my mother to three thousand crowds, a scolding old woman is the best name for them, for there is seldom more than standing room."—Edna Lyall: Donora, chap. 13.

Perpetual Motion. Restlessness; fidgety or nervous disquiet; also a chimerical scheme wholly impracticable. Many have tried to invent a machine that shall move of itself, and never stop; but, as all materials must suffer from wear and tear, it is evident that such an invention is impossible.

"It was better to be eaten to death with meat, than to be ruined to nothing with perpetual motion."—Shakespeare: Henry IV, i. 2.

Pers. Persia; called Far. (French, Pers.)

Persecution (The ten great). (1) Under Nero, A.D. 64; (2) Domitian, 95; (3) Trajan, 98; (4) Hadrian, 118; (5) Pertinax, 202, chiefly in Egypt; (6) Maximin, 236; (7) Decius, 249; (8) Valerian, 257; (9) Aurelian, 272; (10) Diocletian, 302.

"It would be well if these were the only religious persecutions, but alas! those on the other side prove the truth of the Founder: 'I came not to send peace but a sword.' (Matt. 10:34.) Witness the long and relentless persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses, the six or seven crusades, the wars of Charlemagne against the Saxons, and the thirty years' war of German Witness, again, the persecution of the times the Bartholomew slaughter, the wars of Louis XIV on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, the Decembrists, and the wars against Witness the bitter persecutions stirred up by Luther, which spread to England and Scotland.

No more so lasting, so relentless as bloody religious wars. It has been no thin red line.

Persop'olis, called by the Persians "The Throne of Jam-shed," by whom it was founded. Jamshed removed the seat of government from Balk to Istakhar.

* Per'seus (2 syl.). A bronze statue in the Loggia dei Lanzi, at Florence. The best work of Benvenuto Cellini (1500-1562).
Persian's flying horse. A ship.

"Persians conquered the head of Medu'mas, and did make Persiana, the most swift ship, which he always calls Persiana flying horse."—Destruction of Troy.

"The strong-ribbed bark through liquid mountains cut. Like Persiana's horse."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

Persevere (3 syl.). This word comes from an obsolete Latin verb, persevera (to stick rigidly); hence perseverans (severe or rigid). Asseverate is to stick rigidly to what you say; persevere is to stick rigidly to what you undertake till you have accomplished it. (Persevere.)

Persian Alexander (The). Sandjar (1177-1184). (See Alexander.)

Persian Bucephalon (The). Sheibdos, the charger of Chosroes Parviz. (See Bucephalon.)

Person (Latin, persona, a mask; personatus, one who wears a mask, an actor). A "person" is one who impersonates a character. Shakespeare says, "All the world's a stage, and all the men and women merely players" or persons. When we speak of the "person of the Deity" we mean the same thing, the character represented, as that of the Father, or that of the Son, or that of the Holy Ghost. There is no more notion of corporeality connected with the word than there is any assumption of the body of Hamlet when an actor impersonates that character.

Persona Grata (Latin). An acceptable person; one liked.

"The Count (Minister) is not a persona grata at court, as the royal family did not allow the count to walk in Hanoverian affairs in 1699."—Truth, October 22nd, 1880.

Perth is Celtic for a bush. The county of Perth is the county of bushes.

Fair Maid of Perth. Catherine Glover, daughter of Simon Glover, Glover, of Perth. Her lover is Henry Gow, alias Henry Smith, alias Gow Crom, alias Hal of the Wynd, the armorer, fosterson of Dame Shoolbred. (Sir Walter Scott: Fair Maid of Perth.)

The Five Articles of Perth were those passed in 1618 by order of James VI., enjoining the attitude of kneeling to receive the elements; the observance of Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Pentecost; the right of confirmation, etc. They were ratified August 4, 1621, called Black Saturday, and condemned in the General Assembly of Glasgow in 1638.

Peru. That's not Peru. Said of something utterly worthless. A French expression, founded on the notion that Peru is the El Dorado of the world.

Pernian Bark, called also Jesuit's Bark, because it was introduced into Spain by the Jesuits. "Quinine," from the same tree, is called by the Indians quinquina. (See Cinchona.)

Peruke or Perwig. Menage ingeniously derives these words from the Latin pilus ("hair"). Thus, pilus, pelus, pelicies, pelricia, perwa, perwig. The wigs are first mentioned in the 16th century; in the next century they became very large. The fashion began to wane in the reign of George III. Perwig is a corrupt form of the French word perruque.

Pessecola. The famous swimmer drowned in the pool of Charybdis. The tale says he dived once into the pool, and was quite satisfied with its horrors and wonders; but the King Frederick then tossed in a golden cup, which Pessecola dived for, and was never seen again. (See Schiller's Donner.)

Pessimist. One who fancies everything is as bad as possible. (Latin, pessimus, the worst.)

Petard. Host on his own petard. Caught in his own trap, involved in the danger he meant for others. The petard was a conical instrument of war employed at one time for blowing open gates with gunpowder. The engineers used to carry the petard to the place they intended to blow up, and fire it at the small end by a fusee. Shakespeare spells the word petar: "To strike the sport to have the engineer hoist with his own petar." (Hamlet, II, 4.)

"Turning the muzzles of the guns Magdalawards, and getting a piece of lighted rope the party blazed away vigorously as possible, and tried to boast that he had killed the petar himself."—Boat paper.

Petaud. 'Tis the court of King Petaud, where everyone is master. There is no order or discipline at all. This is a French proverb. Petaud is a corruption of pote (I bag), and King Petaud means king of the beggars, in whose court all are equal. (See Albast.)

Peter. (See Blue Peter.)

Great Peter. A bell in York Minster, weighing 10½ tons, and hung in 1845.

Rob Peter to pay Paul. (See Robbing.)

St. Peter. Patron saint of fishers and fishmongers, being himself a fisherman.
St. Peter, in Christian art, is represented as an old man, bald, but with a flowing beard; he is usually dressed in a white mantle and blue tunic, and holds in his hand a book or scroll. His peculiar symbols are the keys, and a sword, the instrument of his martyrdom.

He has got St. Peter’s fingers—i.e., the fingers of a thief. The allusion is to the fish caught by St. Peter with a piece of money in its mouth. They say that a thief has a fish-hook on every finger.

Peter Botte Mountain, in the island of Mauritius; so called from a Dutchman who scaled its summit, but lost his life in coming down. It is a rugged cone, more than 2,800 feet in height.

Peter Parley. The nom de plume of Samuel Gilman Goodrich, an American (1793-1860).

Peter Peebles. Peter Peebles’ Landsat. In Sir Walter Scott's novel of Redgauntlet. Peter is a litigious hard-hearted drunkard, poor as a churchmouse, and a liar to the backbone. His “gangling plea” is Hogarthian comic, as Carlyle says.

Peter-pence. An annual tribute of one penny, paid at the feast of St. Peter to the see of Rome. At one time it was collected from every family; but afterwards it was restricted to those “who had the value of thirty pence in quick or live stock.” This tax was collected in England from 740 till it was abolished by Henry VIII.

Peter Findar. The nom de plume of John Wolcot (Woolcut), of Dollbrooke, Devonshire. (1738-1819)

Peter Porcupine. William Cobbett, when he was a Tory. We have Peter Porcupine’s Gazette and the Porcupine Papers, in twelve volumes. (1762-1833.)

Peter Wilkins was written by Robert Pulock, of Clifford’s Inn, and sold to Dodsley, the publisher, for £20.

Peter of Provence came into possession of Merlin’s wooden horse. There is a French romance called Peter of Provence and the Fair Magaloine, the chief incidents of which are connected with this flying charger.

Peter the Great of Russia built St. Petersburg, and gave Russia a place among the nations of Europe. He laid aside his crown and sceptre, came to England, and worked as a common labourer in our dockyards, that he might teach his subjects how to build ships.

Peter the Hermit (in Tasso), “the holy author of the crusade” (bk. i.). It is said that six millions of persons assumed the cross at his preaching.

Peter the Wild Boy, found 1725 in a wood near Hame, in Hanover, at the supposed age of thirteen. (Died 1785.)

Peterboat. A boat made to go either way, the stem and stern being both alike.

Peterborough (Northamptonshire). So called from the monastery of St. Peter, founded in 653. Tracts relating to this monastery are published in Sparke’s collection.

Peterloo. The dispersal of a large meeting in St. Peter’s Field, Manchester, by an armed force, August 16th, 1819. The assemblage consisted of operatives, and the question was purely men’s. The word, suggested by Hunt, is a parody upon what he absurdly called “the bloody butchers of Waterloo.”

It is a most exaggerated phrase. The massacres consisted of six persons accidentally killed by the rush of the crowd, when the military and some 450 special constables appeared on the field.

Petit-Maitre. A term of address: a man who assumes the manners, dress, and affectations of a man. The term arose before the Revolution, when a great dignitary was styled a grand-maitre, and a pretentions one a petit-maitre.

Petit Serjeantry. Holding lands of the Crown by the service of rendering annually some small implement of war, as a bow, a sword; a lance, a flag, an arrow, and the like. Thus the Duke of Wellington holds his country seat at Stratfieldsaye and Aspley House, London, by presenting a flag annually to the Crown on the anniversary of the battle of Waterloo. The flag is hung in the guardroom of the state apartments of Windsor Castle till the next anniversary, when it becomes the perquisite of the officer of the guard. The Duke of Marlborough presents also a flag on the anniversary of the battle of Blenheim, for his estate at Blenheim. This also is placed in the guardroom of Windsor Castle.

Petitio Prinicip’i (A). A begging of the question, or assuming in the premises the question you undertake to prove. Thus, if a person undertook to prove the infallibility of the pope, and were to take for his premises—(1) Jesus Christ promised to keep the apostles and their successors in all the truth; (2) the popes are the regular successors of the apostles, and therefore the popes are infallible—it would be a vicious syllogism from a petitio principii.

Petitioners and Abhorrens. Two political parties in the reign of Charles II. When that monarch was first restored he used to grant everything he was asked for; but after a time this became a great evil, and Charles enjoined his loving subjects to discontinue their practice of "petitioning." Those who agreed with the king, and disapproved of petitioning, were called Abhorrens; those who were favourable to the objectionable practice were nicknamed Petitioners.

Petarach. The English Petrarch. Sir Philip Sidney; so called by Sir Walter Raleigh. Cowper styles him "the warbler of poetic prose." (1554-1586.)

Petræo. The stormy petrel. So named, according to tradition, from the Italian Petrella (little Peter), in allusion to St. Peter, who walked on the sea. Our sailors call them "Mother Carey's chickens." They are called stormy because in a gale they surround a ship to catch small animals which rise to the surface of the rough sea; when the gale ceases they are no longer seen.

Petæræ florida. The petrified city. Isinome, in Upper Egypt, is so called from the number of petrified bodies of men, women, and children to be seen there. (Latin, petra-fio, to become rock.)

Petrobrusianus or Petrobrusians. A religious sect, founded in 1110, and so called from Peter Bruys, a Provençal. He declared against churches, asserting that a stable was as good as a cathedral for worship, and a manger equal to an altar. He also declared against the use of crucifixes.

Petronii. Sir Petronel Flash. A braggadocio, a tongue-doughty warrior.

"Give your scholar doles and your lawyer his fees,
And some dice for Sir Petronel Flash."

Petra'ch'io. A gentleman of Verona who undertakes to tame the haughty Katharine, called the Shrew. He marries her, and without the least personal chastisement brings her to lamb-like submission. (Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew.)

Petticoat. A woman. "There's a petticoat will prove to be the cause of this."—Hawley Smart: Struck Down, chap. xi.

Petticoat Government. Female rule.

Petticoat and Gown. The dress. When the gown was looped up, the petticoat was an important item of dress.

The poppy is said to have a red petticoat and a green gown; the daffodil, a yellow petticoat and green gown; a candle, a white petticoat; and so on in our common nursery rhymes—

1 "The king's daughter is coming to town,
With a red petticoat and a green gown."
2 "Jackdaw dilly is now come to town,
In a yellow petticoat and green gown."

Petto. In petto. In secrecy, in reserve (Italian, in the breast). The pope creates cardinals in petto—i.e., in his own mind—and keeps the appointment to himself till he thinks proper to announce it. "Belgium, a department of France in petto—i.e., in the intention of the people."—The Herald, 1867.

Petty Cu'ry (Cambridge) means "The Street of Cooks." It is called Petra Cok'eria in a deed dated 13 Edward III. Probably at one time it was part of the Market Hall. It is a mistake to derive Curie from Cecunie. Dr. Pegge derives it from cura'vre, to cure or dress food.

Pettinger'ian Map. A map of the roads of the ancient Roman world, constructed in the time of Alexander Severus (A.D. 226), made known to us by Conrad Peutinger, of Augsburg.

Peveril of the Peak. Sir Geoffrey the Cavalier, and Lady Margaret his wife; Julian Peveril, their son, in love with Alice Bridgenorth, daughter of Major Bridgenorth, a Roundhead; and William Peveril, natural son of William the Conqueror, ancestor of Sir Geoffrey. (Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak.)

Pewter. To scour the pewter. To do one's work.

"But if she vastly scour her pewter, Give her the money that is due to her."

Phedria (vanity). Handmaid of Acrasia the enchantress. She sails about Idle Lake in a gondola. Seeing Sir Guyon she ferries him across the lake to the floating island, where Cymoeh'les attacks him. Phedria interposes, the combatants desist, and the little waunton ferries the knight Temperance over the lake again. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii.)

Pha'eton. The son of Phoebus, who undertook to drive the chariot of the sun, was upset, and caused great mischief; Libya was parched into barren sands, and all Africa was more or less injured, the inhabitants blackened, and vegetation nearly destroyed.

"Galloping, space, you fiery-footed steeds,
Toward Phœbus' mansion: such a waggoner
As Phaeton would whip you to the war,
And bring in cloudy night, immediate."—
Shakespeare: "Romeo and Juliet," ii. 2.

Pha'eton. A sort of carriage; so called from the sun-car driven by Phaeton. (See above.)

Phaeton's bird. The swan. Cyenus was the friend of Phaeton, and lamented his fate so grieveously that Apollo changed her into a swan, and placed her among the constellations.

Phalax. The close order of battle in which the heavy-armed troops of a Grecian army were usually drawn up. Hence, any number of people distinguished for firmness and solidity of union.

Phal'aris. The brazen bull of Phal'aris. Perillos, a brass-founder of Athens, proposed to Phal'aris, Tyrant of Agri-gentum, to invent for him a new species of punishment; accordingly, he cast a brazen bull, with a door in the side. The victim was shut up in the bull and roasted to death, but the throat of the engine was so contrived that the groans of the sufferer resembled the bellows of a mad bull. Phal'aris commanded the invention, and ordered its merits to be tested by Perillos himself.

The epistles of Phal'aris. Certain letters said to have been written by Phal'aris, Tyrant of Agrigentum, in Sicily. Boyle maintained them to be genuine, Bentley affirmed that they were forgeries. No doubt Bentley is right.

Phaleg, in the satire of Abalom and Achiteloph, by Dryden and Tate, is Mr. Forbes, a Scotthan.

Phantom Ship. (See CARMILHAN.)

"Or of that phantom ship, whose form
Shoots like a meteor through the storm:
When the dark scull comes driving hard,
And lowered in every rippling yard...
And well the doomed spectators know
The harbinger of wreck and woe!"
Sir Walter Scott: "RobRoy," ii. 11.

Pha'zon. A young man greatly ill-treated by Furor, and rescued by Sir Guyon. He loved Claribel, but Philemon, his friend, persuaded him that Claribel was unfaithful, and, to prove his words, told him to watch in a given place. He saw what he thought was Claribel holding an assignation with what seemed to be a. groom, and, rushing forth, met the true Claribel, whom he slew on the spot. Being tried for the murder, it came out that the groom was Philemon, and the supposed Claribel only her lady's maid. He poisoned Philemon, and would have murdered the handmaid, but she escaped, and while he pursued her he was attacked by Furor. This tale is to expose the intemperance of revenge. (Spenser: "Faerie Queene," ii. 4, 28.)

Phar'amond. King of the Franks and a knight of the Round Table. He is said to have been the first king of France. This reputed son of Marcemir and father of Clo'dion, is the hero of one of Calprenée's novels.

Pha'ren (2 syl.) The king. It is the Coptic article P and the word arow (king). There are eleven of this title mentioned in Holy Scripture:—

i. Before Solomon's time.
(1) The Phuran on contemporary with Abraham (Gen. xi. 25).
(2) The good Pharan who advanced Joseph (Gen. xli.).
(3) The Pharan who "knew not Joseph" (Exod. i. 8).
(4) The Pharan who was drowned in the Red Sea (Exod. xiv. 28); said to be Memphrhos or Meneptah, son of Ramesses II.
(5) The Pharan that protected Hadad (1 Kings xi. 19).
(6) The Pharan whose daughter Solomon married (1 Kings iii. 1; ix. 16).

ii. After Solomon's time.
(7) Pharan Shishah, who was warring against Rohobo'am (1 Kings xiv. 25, 26).
(8) Pharan Shabakok, or "So," with whom Hoshea made an alliance (2 Kings xvii. 4).
(9) The Pharan that made a league with Hezekiah against Sennacherib, called Tirhakah (2 Kings xviii. 21; xix. 9).
(10) Pharan Necho, who was warring against Josiah (2 Kings xxii. 29, etc.).
(11) Pharan Hophra, the ally of Zedekiah (Jer. xlvii. 39); said to be Aprizes, who was strangled B.C. 570. (See KING.)

"After Solomon's time the titular word Pharan is joined to a proper name.

iii. Other Pharaohs of historic note.
(1) Cheops or Suphis I. (Dynasty IV.), who built the great pyramid.
(2) Cemphres or Suphis II., his brother, who built the second pyramid.
(3) Memcheres, his successor, who built the most beautiful pyramid of the three.
(4) Memnon or A-menophis III. (Dynasty XVIII.), whose musical statue is so celebrated.
(5) Sethos I., the Great (Dynasty XIX.), whose tomb was discovered by Belzoni.
(6) Sethos II., called Proteus (Dynasty XIX.), who detained Helen and Paris in Egypt.
(7) Phœbœ or Thûbœ, who sent aid to Priam in the siege of Troy.
(8) Rampsinótus or Rameses Nêter, the miser (Dynasty XX.), mentioned by Herodótus.
(9) Osorothôn IV. or Osorkon (Dynasty XXII.), the Egyptian Hercules.

Pharaoh, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means Louis XIV. of France. "If Pharaoh's doubtful succour be [Charles II.] should use, A foreign aid would more incense the Jews [English nation]."

Pharaoh who Knew not Joseph. Supposed to be Menephtah, son of Rameses the Great. Rider Haggard adopts this hypothesis. After Rameses the Great came a period of confusion in Egypt, and it is supposed the Pharaoh who succeeded was a usurper. No trace of the destruction of Pharaoh and his host has been discovered by Egyptologists.

His wife was Asia, daughter of Mezannah. Pharaoh cruelly maltreated her for believing in Moses. He fastened her hands and feet to four stakes, and laid a millstone on her as she lay exposed to the scorching sun; but God took her, without dying, into Paradise. (Sale: Al Korán, lxvi. note.) Among women, four have been perfect: Asia, wife of Pharaoh; Mary, daughter of Imran; Khadîjah, daughter of Khawwâl (Mahomet's first wife); and Fatima, Mahomet's daughter. Attributed to Mahomet.

Pharaoh who made Joseph his Viceroy. Supposed to be Osertesen II. There is a tablet in the sixth year of his reign which is thought to represent Jacob and his household.

Pharaoh's Chicken. The Egyptian vulture, so called from its frequent representation in Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Pharaoh's Daughter, who brought up Moses, Bathia.

"Bathia, the daughter of Pharaoh, came, attended by her maidservants, and entered the water she chanced to see the box of bulrushes, and pitying the infant, she rescued him from death."—The Talmud.

Pharos, an island on the coast, noted for its lighthouse.

"And passed from Phœnian fields to Phœnian land."—Milton: Psalm cxi.

Pharisees means "separatists" (Heb. parash, to separate), men who looked upon themselves as holier than other men, and therefore refused to hold social intercourse with them. The Talmud mentions the following classes:
(1) The "Dashers," or "Bandy-legged" ('Neill), who scarcely lifted their feet from the ground in walking, but "dashed them against the stones," that people might think them absorbed in holy thought (Matt. xxi. 41).
(2) The "Mortars," who wore a "mercier," or cap, which would not allow them to see the passers-by, that their meditations might not be disturbed. "Having eyes, they saw not" (Mark viii. 18).
(3) The "Bleeders," who inserted thorns in the borders of their gaberdines to prick their legs in walking.
(4) The "Cryers," or "Inquirers," who went about crying out, "Let me know my duty, and I will do it" (Matt. xix. 16-22).
(5) The "Almsgivers," who had a trumpet sounded before them to summon the poor together (Matt. vi. 2).
(6) The "Stumblers," or "Bloodily-browed" (Kizer), who shut their eyes when they went abroad that they might see no women, being "blind leaders of the blind" (Matt. xxv. 14). Our Lord calls them "blind Pharisees," "fools and blind.
(7) The "Immovables," who stood like statues for hours together, "praying in the market places" (Matt. vi. 5).
(8) The "Footloose Pharisees" (Moluskis), who kept themselves bent double like the handle of a pestle.
(9) The "Strong-shouldered" (Shikmi), who walked with their back bent as if carrying on their shoulders the whole burden of the law.
(10) The "Dyed Pharisees," called by our Lord "Whited Sepulchres," whose externals of devotion cloaked hypocrisy and moral uncleanness. (Talmud of Jerusalem, Erubeth, ix: Sota, v. 1: Talmud of Babylon, Sota, 22 b.)

Pharos. A lighthouse; so called from the lighthouse built by Sostratus Cudius in the island of Pharos, near the port of Alexandria, in Egypt. It was 450 feet high, and could be seen at the distance of 100 miles. Part was blown down in 738. This Pharos was one of the Seven Wonders of the World.
Pharsalia. An epic in Latin hexameters by Lucan. The battle of Pharsalia was between Pompey and Caesar. Pompey had 45,000 legionaries, 7,000 cavalry, and a large number of auxiliaries; Caesar had 22,000 legionaries and 1,000 cavalry. Pompey's battle-cry was 'Hercules invictus'; that of Caesar was 'Fama victoria.' On this occasion Caesar won the battle.

Pheasant. So called from Phasis, a stream of the Black Sea.

Phæbe (2 syl.). A shepherdess. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Phælia. Called the Fair. The wife of Sir Guy, Earl of Warwick. (See Guy.)

Phæmonen (plural, phæmonena) means simply what has appeared (Greek, phainomenon, to appear). It is used in science to express the visible result of a phenomenon. In popular language it means a prodigy. (Greek, phæmonenon.)

Phidias. The French Phidias. Jean Goujon (1510-1572) also called the Caravage of sculptors. (2) J. B. Pigalle (1711-1785).

Phigalian Marbles. A series of twenty-three sculptures in alto-relievo, discovered in 1812 at Phigalia, in Arcadia, and in 1814 purchased for the British Museum. They represent the combat of the Centaurs and Lapiths, and that of the Greeks and Amazons. They are part of the Elgin Marbles (q.v.).

Philadelphia Stones. Called Christian Bones. It is said that the walls of Philadelphia, in Turkey, were built of the bones of Christians killed in the Holy Wars. This idle tale has gained credit from the nature of the stones, full of pores and very light, not unlike petrified bones. Similar incrustations are found at Knaresborough and elsewhere.

Philander (in Orlando Furioso). A sort of Joseph. (See Gabrina.)

Philandering. Coquetting with a woman: paying court, and leading her to think you love her, but never declaring your preference. The word is coined from Philander, the Dutch Knight who coquetted with Gabrina (q.v.).

Philanthropist (The). John Howard, who spent much of his life in visiting the prisons and hospitals of Europe. (1726-1790.) (Greek, philanthropos.)

Philémon and Baucis entertained Jupiter and Mercury when everyone else refused them hospitality. Being asked to make a request, they begged that they might both die at the same time. When they were very old, Philémon was changed into an oak, and Baucis into a linden tree. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, iii. 631, etc.)

Philip. Philip, remember thou art mortal. A sentence repeated to the Macedonian king every time he gave an audience.

Philip sober. When a woman who asked Philip of Macedon to do her justice was snubbed by the petulant monarch, she exclaimed, "Philip, I shall appeal against this judgment." "Appeal!" thundered the enraged king, "and to whom will you appeal?" "To Philip sober," was her reply.

Philip Nye (in Aulularia). One of the assembly of Dissenting ministers, noted for his ugly beard.

Philip Quari. A castaway sailor, solitude on a desert island by a monkey. Imitation of Robinson Crusoe. (1727.)

Philip'pic. A severe scolding; an invective. So called from the orations of Demosthenes against Philip of Macedon, to rouse the Athenians to resist his encroachments. The orations of Cicero against Antony are called "Philippikes."

Philip'pines. A Russian act; so called from the founder, Philip Pustoswiat. They are called Old Faith Men, because they cling with tenacity to the old service books, old version of the Bible, old hymn-book, old prayer-book, and all customs previous to the reforms of Nekon, in the 17th century.

Philip (John) author of The Splendid Shilling, wrote a georgic on Cider in blank verse: a serious poem modelled upon Milton's epics.

"Philip, Pomona's bard, the second thou
Who nobly durst, in rhyme-unlettered verse,
With British freedom sing the British song." Thomson: Autumn.

Philisides (4 syl.). Philip Sidney (Philip Sid). Spenser uses the word in the Pastoral Eclogue on the Death of Sir Philip.

"Philisides is dead."
Philistines, meaning the ill-behaved and ignorant. The word so applied arose in Germany from the Charies or Philisters, who were in everlasting collision with the students; and in these "town and gown rows" identified themselves with the town, called in our universities "the mob." Matthew Arnold, in the Cornhill Magazine, applied the term Philistine to the middle class, which he says is "ignorant, narrow-minded, and deficient in great ideas," insomuch that the middle-class English are objects of contempt in the eyes of foreigners.

Philistines (3 syl.). Earwigs and other insect tormentors are so called in Norfolk. Bailiffs, constables, etc. "The Philistines are upon thee, Samson" (Judges xvi.).

Philistinism. A cynical indifference and supercilious sneering at religion. The allusion is to the Philistines of Palestine.

Philis. A play written in Spanish by Lupercio Leonardo of Argensola. (See Don Quijote, vol. iii. p. 70.)

Philoeleia, in Sidney's Arcadia, is Lady Penelope Devereux, with whom he was in love; but the lady married another, and Sir Philip transferred his affections to Frances, eldest daughter of Sir Francis Walsingham.

Philoctetes. The most famous archer in the Trojan war, to whom Hercules, at death, gave his arrows. He joined the allied Greeks, with seven ships, but in the island of Lemnos, his foot being bitten by a serpent, ulcerated, and became so offensive that the Greeks left him behind. In the tenth year of the siege Ulysses commanded that he should be sent for, as an oracle had declared that Troy could not be taken without the arrows of Hercules. Philoctetes accordingly went to Troy, slew Paris, and Troy fell.

Philoctetes of Sophocles is one of the most famous Greek tragedies. Laharpe wrote a French tragedy, and Warren, in 1871, a metrical drama on the same subject.

Philomel or Philomele. (See Nightingale.)

Philomeleia. The Druid bard that accompanied Sir Industry to the Castle of Indolence. (Thomson, canto ii. 34.)

Philosophers, general of the Achæan league, made Epaminondas his model.

He slew Mecha'n'idæ, tyrant of Sparta, and was himself killed by poison.

Philosopher. The sages of Greece used to be called sophoi (wise men), but Pythagoras thought the word too arrogant, and adopted the compound philosoph'oi (lover of wisdom), whence "philosopher," one who courts or loves wisdom.

Philosopher. "There was never yet philosopher who could endure the toothache patiently, however they have writ the style of gods, and made a push at chance and suffrance." (Shakespeare: Much A'do About Nothing, v. 1.)

The Philosopher. Marcus Aurelius Antonius is so called by Justin Martyr. (121, 161-180.)

Leo VI., Emperor of the East. (866, 886-911.)

Porphyry, the Antichristian. (233-305.)

The Philosopher of China. Confucius. His mother called him Little Hillock, from a knob on the top of his head. (n. c. 551-479.)

The Philosopher of France. Voltaire; so called from his chateau of Ferney, near Gen'e'ven. (1694-1778.)

The Philosopher of Persia. Abou Ebn Sina, of Shiraz. (Died 1037.)

The Philosopher of Samos'ta. Lucan.

"Just such another feast as was that of the Lapithæ, described by the philosopher of Samosata."—Babæus: Pentateuch, book iv. 19.

The Philosopher of Seso'sones. Frederick the Great (1712, 1740-1786).

The Philosopher of Wimbledon, John Horne Took, author of Divisions of Purity. (1786-1812.)

Philosopher with the Golden Thigh. Pythagoras, General Zelislaus had a golden hand, which was given him by Bolislaus III. when he lost his right hand in battle. Nuid had an artificial hand made of silver by Cred.

"Quite discard the symbol of the old philosopher with the golden thigh."—Babæus: Penta-treuch (Prologue to book v.).

Philosopher's Egg (The). A preservative against poison, and a cure for the plague; a panacea. The shell of a new egg being pricked, the white is blown out, and the place filled with saffron or a yolk of an egg mixed with saffron.

Philosopher's Stone. The way to wealth. The ancient alchemists thought there was a substance which would Philosopher's Tree (The), or Diana's tree. An amalgam of crystallised silver, obtained from mercury in a solution of silver; so called by the alchemists, with whom Diana stood for silver.

Philosophers.
The Seven Sages or Wise Men of Greece. Thalès, Solon, Chión, Pittácus, Bias, Cleobúlus, Periander; to which add Sois'adès, Anacharsis the Scythian, Mýson the Spartan, Epimenídes the Cretan, and Pherecýdes of Syros.

Philosophers of the Académic sect. Plato, Sócrates, Xenoc'rátas, Pole- mon, Crátês, Crantor, Aresília'os, Care'a dés, Clítomachos, Philo, and Ant'i'amóchus.

Philosophers of the Cyrénac sect. Antí'sthenes, Diog'énés of Sinópë, Mon'míos, O molócrítos, Crátês, Metrócrítos, Hippárr'chia, Menippus, and Menedé'mos of Lamba'cacos.

Philosophers of the Cyrenæic sect. Arístippos, Hegé'sias, Animé'ris, Theodó'ros, and Bion.

Philosophers of the Eleac or Eret'riac sect. Phe'do, Plísthenës, and Menedé'mos of Eret'riá.

Philosophers of the Eleatic sect. Xenóph'anes, Parménidès, Melissos, Zeno of Tarseos, Leucippos, Democ'rítos, Protag'ora, and Anaxar'chus.

Philosophers of the Epicure'an sect. Epicú'ros, and a host of disciples.

Philosophers of the Heraclï'tan sect. Heraclï'tos; the names of his disciples are unknown.

Philosophers of the Megaric sect. Euclid, Eubú'lices, Alex'inos, Euphántos, Apollo'ños, Chronó'os, Diodó'tos, Ich'thyas, Clínom'áchos, and Stílpo.

Philosophers of the Priorat'ec' sect. Aristotle, Theophrastus, Straton, Lyco, Aristo, Critola'os, and Diodó'tos.

Philosophers of the Socratic sect. Pyrrho and Timon.

Philosophers of the Socrat'ic sect. Socr'a'tes, Xenóph'anes, Thesp'ídon, Crito, Simón, Glauко, Simnías, and Ce'ás.

Philosophy. Father of Philosophy. Albrecht von Haller, of Berno. (1708-1777.)

Philó'timé. The word means lover of honour. The presiding Queen of Hell, and daughter of Minnmon. (Spenser: Faërie Queene, ii.)

"And fair Philotimé, the ruddy light,
The fairest wight that wonneth under sky."

Book ii. canto vii.

Philoxénos of Cythêra. A most distinguished dithyrambic poet. He was invited to the court of Dionysus of Syracuse, who placed some poems in his hand to correct. Philoxenos said the only thing to do was to run a line through them and put them in the fire. For this frankness he was cast into prison, but, being released, he retired to Ephesia. The case of Voltaire and Frederick II, the Great of Prussia is an exact parallel.

"Bolder than Philoxenos,
Down the veil of truth I tear.
Amanu Chalchimah, Los Grandes Verdes."

Philoxénos of Leucadia. A great epicure, who wished he had the neck of a crane, that he might enjoy the taste of his food the longer. (Aristotle: Ethicus, iii. 10.)

Phîll'êr (A). A draught or charm to incite in another the passion of love. The Thessalian philters were the most renowned, but both the Greeks and Romans used these dangerous potions, which sometimes produced insanity. Lucre'tius is said to have been driven mad by a love-potion, and Caligê'ula's death is attributed to some philters.
Phineus

administered to him by his wife, Cassònia. Brabantio says to Othello—

"Thou hast practised on her [Desdemona] with foul charmers.
Abused her delicate youth with drugs or minerals
That weaken motion."

Shakespeare: Othello, I. 1.

("Philter," Greek, philtron, philos, loving.)

Phineus (2 syl.). A blind king of Thrace, who had the gift of prophecy. Whenever he wanted to eat, the Harpies came and took away or defiled his food.

"Blind Thian's pin, and blind Molennës,
And Firenys, and Phineus, prophets old."

Milton: Paradise Lost, III. 31.

Phis, the face, is a contraction of physignomy.

Phis. Hablot K. Browne, who illustrated the Pickwick Papers, etc.

Phleg'athon. A river of liquid fire in Hadês. (Greek, phlegy, to burn.)

"Fierce Phlegathon, Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with glare."

Milton: Paradise Lost, I. 1.

Phlegr'a, in Macedonia, was where the giants attacked the gods. Asclevados was the chief of the giants.

Phlogiston. The principle or element of heat, according to Stahl. When latent the effect is imperceptible, but when operative it produces all the effects of heat from warmth to combustion. Of course, this theory has long been exploded. (Greek, phlogiston, inflammable.)

Phocæan Despair. Desperation which terminates in victory. In the days of Philip, King of Macedonia, the men of Phocis had to defend themselves single-handed against the united forces of all their neighbours, because they presumed to plough a sacred field belonging to Delphi. The Phocæans suggested that they should make a huge pile, and that all the women and children should join the men in one vast human sacrifice. The pile was made, and everything was ready, but the men of Phocis, before mounting the pile, rushed in desperation on the foe, and obtained a signal victory.

Pho'elon, surnamed The Good, who resisted all the bribes of Alexander and his successor. It was this real patriot who told Alexander to turn his arms against Persia, their common enemy, rather than against the states of Greece, his natural allies.

"Phoelon the good, in public life severe,
To virtue still inexorably true."

Thomson: Winter.

Phoenix Period

Phæbë. The moon, sister of Phæbus.

Phæbus. The sun or sun-god. In Greek mythology Apollo is called Phæbos (the sun-god), from the Greek verb phæo (to shine).

"The rays divine of Phæbus shine."

Thomson: Spring.

Phænix. Said to live a certain number of years, when it makes in Arabia a nest of spices, sings a melodious dirge, flaps its wings to set fire to the pile, burns itself to ashes, and comes forth with new life, to repent the former one. (See Phoenix Period.)

"The enchanted pile of that lonely bard,
Who sings at the last his own death-tune.
Add in music and perfume dies away."

Thomas Moore: Paradise and the Peri.

Phænix, as a sign over chemists' shops, was adopted from the association of this fabulous bird with alchemy. Paracelsus wrote about it, and several of the alchemists employed it to symbolise their vocation.

A phænix among women. A phænix of his kind. A paragon, unique; because there was but one phænix at a time.

"If she be furnished with a mind so rare,
She is alone: the Arabian lord."

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, I. 7.

The Spanish Phænix. Lope de Vega is so called by G. H. Lewes.

"Insueno poeta, a cupido en versa una presa Ninguno le vaentera en tus Vega."

Phænix Alley (London). The alley leading to the Phoenix theatre, now called Drury Lane.

Phænix Park (Dublin). A corruption of the Gaelic Pho-mhise (fair water), so called from a spring at one time resorted to as a chalybeate spa.

Phænix Period or Cycle, generally supposed to be 500 years; Tacitus tells us it was 250 years; it is, Stuart Poole, that it was 1,400 Julian years, like the Gothic Cycle; and Lipsius that it was 1,500 years. Now, the phænix is said to have appeared in Egypt five times: (1) in the reign of Sesostris; (2) in the reign of Am-masis; (3) in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus; (4) a year or two prior to the death of Tiberius; and (5) 1834, during the reign of Constantine. These dates being accepted, a Phoenix Cycle consists of 300 years: thus, Sesostris, B.c. 860; Am-masis, B.c. 566; Ptolemy, B.c. 266; Tiberius, A.D. 34; Constantine, A.D. 334. In corroborating this suggestion it must be borne in mind that Jesus Christ, who died A.D. 34, is termed the Phoenix by monastic writers. Tacitus mentions the first three of these appearances. (Annales, vi. 28.)
Phoenix Theatre. (See Phoenix Alley.)

Phoenix Tree. The palm. In Greek, phoenix means both phoenix and palm-tree.

"Now I will believe ... that in Arabia There is one tree, the phoenix' throne—one Phoenix At this hour regneth there."

Shakespeare: The Tempest, iii. 3

Phoo'ka or Foo'ka. A spirit of most malignant disposition, who hurries people to their destruction. He sometimes comes in the form of an eagle, and sometimes in that of a horse, like the Scotch kelpie (q.v.). (Irish superstition.)

Phor'cos. "The old man of the sea." He was the father of the three Gruin, who were grey from their birth, and had but one eye and one tooth common to the three. (Greek mythology.)

Phormio. A parasite who accommodates himself to the humour of everyone. (Tyrone: Phormio.)

Phryg'ians. An early Christian sect, so called from Phrygia, where they abounded. They regarded Mithras as their prophet, and laid claim to the spirit of prophecy.

Phry'ne (2 syl). A courteuse or Athenian hetaira. She acquired so much wealth by her beauty that she offered to rebuild the walls of Thebes if she might put on them this inscription: "Alexander destroyed them, but Phryne the hetaira rebuilt them." The Cnidian Venus of Praxiteles was taken from this courteuse. Apelles' picture of Venus Rising from the Sea was partly from his wife Campaspe, and partly from Phryne, who entered the sea with dishabilleved hair as a model.

Phylactery. A charm or amulet. The Jews wore on their wrist or forehead a slip of parchment bearing a text of Scripture. Strictly speaking, a phylactery consisted of four pieces of parchment, enclosed in two black leather cases, and fastened to the forehead or wrist of the left hand. One case contained Ex. viii. 1-10, 11-16; and the other case, Deut. vi. 4-9, xi. 13-21. The idea arose from the command of Moses, "Therefore shall ye lay up these my words in your heart ... and bind them for a sign upon your hand ... as frontlets between your eyes." (Deut. xi. 18.) (Greek, phylacteron, from the verb phylasseo, to watch.)

Phyllis. A country girl. (Virgil: Eclogues, iii. and v.)

"Country messes, Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses."

Milton: L'Allegro.

Phyllis and Brunetta. Rival beauties who for a long time vieled with each other on equal terms. For a certain festival Phyllis procured some marvellous fabric of gold brocade to outshine her rival; but Brunetta dressed the slave who bore her train in the same material, clothing herself in simple black. Upon this crushing mortification Phyllis went home and died. (Spectator.)

Phyllis the Fair. Philandering - making soft speeches and winning faces at them. Garth says of Dr. Atterbury:

"He passed his easy hours, instead of prayer, In nuptials and phylis the fair."

The Dispensary, i.

Phynned d'ere [the Harry-one]. A Manx spirit, similar to the Scotch "brownie," and German "kobold." He is said to be an outlawed fairy, and the offence was this: He absented himself without leave from Fairy-court on the great levée-day of the Harvest-moon, being in the glen of Husson, dancing with a pretty Manx maid whom he was courting.

Physician. The Beloved Physician. Lucius, supposed to be St. Luke, the evangelist (Col. iv. 11).

The Prince of Physicians. Avicenna, the Arabian (980-1037).

Physician or Fool. Plutarch, in his treatise On the Preservation of Health, tells us that Tiberius was wont to say, "A man of thirty is his own physician or a fool."

Physician, heal Thyself. "First cast out the beam from thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote which is in thy brother's eye."

Physina'thos [one who swells the cheeks]. King of the Frogs, and son of Pelus [mud], slain by Troxartas, the Mouse-king.

"Great Pysina'thos I, from Pelus race, Reged in fair Hydrambo’s embrace, Where, by the napal tank, that ranks his side, The swift Enchom-delights to glide."

Piment - Battle of the Frogs, bk. i.

P'iarists, or Brethren of the Iona School. A religious congregation founded in the 10th century by Joseph of Calsanza, for the better instruction and education of the middle and higher classes.
Pic-nic. Dr. John Anthony derives it from the Italian piccola vischius (a small task), each person being set a small task towards the general entertainment. (French, petite-nique.)

Picador (Spanish). A horseman: one who in bull fights is armed with a gilt spear (pica dorada), with which he pricks the bull toadden him for the combat.

Picardie. An immoral sect of fanatics in the 16th century; so called from Picard of Flanders, their founder, who called himself the New Adam, and tried to introduce the custom of living nude, like Adam in Paradise.

You are as hot-headed as a Picard. This is a French expression, and is tantamount to our "Peppery as a Welshman."

Picer. A pirate; one who plunderers wreaks. (French, procureur, piqueur, to plunder; Scotch, pikar, rapine; Spanish, picar, a villain.)

Picaatrix. The pseudonym of a Spanish monk, author of a book on demonology, collected from the writings of 224 Arabic magicians. It was dedicated to King Alfonso.

Piccadilly (London). So called from Piccadilly Hall, the chief depot of a certain sort of lace, much in vogue during the reign of Queen Elizabeth. The lace was called percully lace, from its little spear-points (a diminutive of pike, a pike or spear). In the reign of James I. the high stuff was called a percully, though divested of its lace edging. Barnaby Riche, speaking of the piccadillies, says: "He that some forty years since had have asked after a piccadilly, I wonder who would have understood him, and would have told him whether it was fish or flesh" (1614). Another derivation is given in the Glossographia (1681). Piccadilly, we are there told, was named from Higgins' famous ordinary near St. James's, called Higgins's Piccadilly, "because he made his money by selling piccadillies" (p. 485). (See also Home: Every-day Book, vol. ii. p. 381.)

Pickle. A rod in pickles. One ready to chastise with at any moment. Pickled means preserved for use. (Danish, pikel.)

I'm in a pretty pickle. In a sorry plight, or state of disorder.

"How can't thou in this pickle?" Shakespeare: Tempest, v. 1

Pickwick (Mr. Samuel). The hero of the Pickwick Papers, by Charles Dickens. He is a simple-minded, benevolent old gentleman, who wears spectacles, breeches, and short black gaiters, has a bald head, and "good round belly." He founds a club, and travels with its Pickwickians (1774-1780). A French musicocratic faction, who contended that pure Italian music is higher art than the mixed German school. In other words, that music is the Alpha and Omega of opera, and the dramatic part is of very minor importance.

Niccolo Piccinni, of Naples (1726-1800), was the rival of Christoph Gluck, of Bohemia, and those two musicians gave birth to a long paper war. Those who sided with the Italian were called Piccinists, those who sided with the German were called Gluckists.

PICK. To throw; same as pitch. The instrument that throws the shuttle is called the picket. (Anglo-Saxon, pyc-an, to throw, pull, or pick.)

"I'll pick you over the pales." Shakespeare: Henry VIII, v. 3.

Pick Straw (70). To show fatigues or weariness, as birds pick up straws to make their nests (or bed).

"Thine eyes did not once pick straws,
And winkle, and winkle away:
No, no, they were as brisk as bees,
And doing things did say." Peter Pindar: Orson and Ellen, cant. 1.

Pick a Hole in his Coat (70). To find fault with one; to fix on some small offence as censurable.

"And shall such mock as this, not worth a great Dare pick a hole in such a great man's coat?" Peter Pindar: Epistle to John Norris.

Pickaninny. A young child. A West Indian negro word. (Spanish, pequin, little; mew, child.)

Pick'elher'inge (5 syll.). A buffoon, is so called by the Dutch.

Pickers and Stealers. The hands. In French argent hands are called harpès, which is a contracted form of harpins; and harpion is the Italian arpione, a hook used by thieves to pick linen, etc., from hedges. A harpe d'un chien means a dog's paw, and "Il mante très bien ses harpes" means he used his fingers very dexterously.

"Romancier: My lord, you once did love me.
Hamlet: And do still, by these pickers and stealers." Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 5.

Pickled. A rod in pickles. One ready to chastise with at any moment. Pickled means preserved for use. (Danish, pikel.)

I'm in a pretty pickle. In a sorry plight, or state of disorder.

"How can't thou in this pickle?" Shakespeare: Tempest, v. 1

Pickwick (Mr. Samuel). The hero of the Pickwick Papers, by Charles Dickens. He is a simple-minded, benevolent old gentleman, who wears spectacles, breeches, and short black gaiters, has a bald head, and "good round belly." He founds a club, and travels with its members over England, each member being under his guardianship.

Pickwickian. In a Pickwickian sense. An insult whitewashed. Mr. Pickwick accused Mr. Blotton of acting in "a vile and calumnious manner," whereupon Mr. Blotton retorted by calling Mr. Pickwick "a humbug." It finally was made to appear that both had used the offensive words only in a Pickwickian sense, and that each had, in fact, the highest regard and esteem for the other. So the affront was adjusted, and both were satisfied.

"Lawyers and politicians daily abuse each other in a Pickwickian sense."—Boroditch.

Picrochole, King of Lernæ. A Greek compound, meaning "bitter-bile," or choleric. The rustics of Utopia one day asked the cake-bakers of Lernæ to sell them some cakes, but received only abuse; whereupon a quarrel ensued. When Picrocholo was informed thereof, he marched with all his men against Utopia. King Grangoussi tried to appease the choleric king, but all his efforts were in vain. At length Gargantua arrived, defeated Picrocholo, and put his army to the rout. (Rabelais: Gargantua, bk. i.)

King Picrocholo's statesman. One who without his host reckons of mighty achievements to be accomplished. The Duke of Smalltrash, Earl of Swashbuckler, and Captain Durtaille advised King Picrocholo to divide his army into two parts: one was to be left to carry on the war in hand, and the other to be sent forth to make conquests. They were to take England, France and Spain, Asia Minor, the Greek Islands, and Turkey, Germany, Norway, Sweden, Russia, etc., and to divide the lands thus taken among the conquerors. "Ezech'ron, an old soldier, replied "A shoemaker bought a half-pint of milk; with this he was going to make butter; the butter was to buy a cow, the cow was to have a calf, the calf was to be changed for a colt, and the man was to become nabob; only he cracked his jug, spilt his milk, and went supperless to bed." (Rabelais: Gargantua, bk. i. 33.)

* In 1870 the French emperor (Napoleon III.) was induced to declare war against Germany. He was to make a demonstration and march in triumph to Berlin. Having taken Berlin, he was to march to Italy to restore the Pope to his dominions, and then to restore the Queen of Spain to her throne; but he failed in the first, lost his throne, and Paris fell into the hands of the allied Prussian army.

His uncle's "Berlin Decree," for the subjection of Great Britain, was a similar miscalculation. This decree ordained that no European state was to deal with England; and, the trade of England being thus ruined, the kingdom must force submit to Napoleon. But as England was the best customer of the European states, the states of Europe were so impoverished that they revolted against the dictator, and the battle of Waterloo was his utter downfall.

Plots. The inhabitants of Albion, north-east of Scotland. The name is usually said to be the Latin picti (painted [or tattooed] with woad), but in the Irish chronicles the Picts are called Pictones, Pictores, Picendy, etc.

Plots' Houses. Those underground buildings more accurately termed "earth houses," as the Pict's House at Kettleburn, in Caithness.

The Picture. Massinger has borrowed the plot of this play from Bandello of Piedmont, who wrote novellas or tales in the fifteenth century.

Picture Bible. (See Biblia.)

Picture Galleries.
London is famous for its Constables, Turners, Landseers, Gainsboroughs, etc.
Madrid for its Murillos, Van Dycks, Da Vincis, Rubenses, etc.
Dresden for its Raphael, Titian, and Correggiio.
Amsterdam for its Dutch masters.
Rome for its Italian masters.

Pictures. (See Cabinet, Cartoons, etc.)

Pie. Looking for a pie's nest (French). Looking for something you are not likely to find. (See below.)

He is in the pie's nest (French). In a fix, in great doubt, in a quandary. The pie places her nest out of reach, and fortifies it with thorny sticks, leaving only a small aperture just large enough to admit her body. She generally sits with her head towards the hole, watching against intruders.

"Je m'en vais chercher un grand ventouse. Il est au nid du pie."—Rabelais.

Pie Poudre. A court formerly held at a fair on St. Giles's Hill, near Winchester. It was originally authorised by the Bishop of Winchester from a grant of Edward IV. Similar courts were held elsewhere at wakes and fairs for the rough-and-ready treatment of pedlars and hawkers, to compel them and those with whom they dealt to fulfill their contracts. (French, pied poudreux, dusty foot. A vagabond is called in French pied poudreux.)

"Have its proceedings dissolved or Allowed, at fancy of pie-powder." —Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii. 2

Piebald. Partly coloured. A corruption of pie-buriel, speckled like a pie. The words Ball, Dun, and Favel are frequently given as names to cows. "Ball" means the cow with a mark on its face; "Dun" means the cow of a dun or brownish-yellow colour; and "Favel" means the bay cow. (Ball, in Gaelic, means a mark; ballack, speckled.)

Pied de la Lettre. (1st). Quite literally.

"Of course, you will not take everything I have said quite au pied de la lettre."—F. Ollier: A Philosophical Trilogy

Pied Piper of Hamelin. The Pied Piper was promised a reward if he would drive the rats and mice out of Hamelin (Westphalia). This he did, for he gathered them together by his pipe, and then drowned them in the Weser. As the people refused to pay him, he next led the children to Koppelp berg Hill, where 130 of them perished (July 22nd, 1376). (See Harro.)

"To blow the pipe his lisp he wrinkled And green and blue his sharp yes wrinkled ... And ere three notes his pipe had uttered ... Out of the houses rats came tumbling— tiresalt rats, small rats, lean rats, brownvy rats, brown rats, black rats, grey rats, buckey rats, and step by step they followed him dancing, Till they came to the river Weser." —Robert Browning.

"Hamelin, on the river Hamel, is where the Rattenfanger played this prank. It is said that the children did not perish in the mountain, but were led over it to Transylvania, where they formed a German colony.

Pierre. A conspirator in Otway's Venier Preserved. He is described as a patriot of the bluntest manners, and a stoical heart.

"Tiger than Pierre du Coignet (French). Coignets was an advocate-general in the reign of Philippe de Valois, who stoutly opposed the encroachments of the Church. The monks, in revenge, called, by way of pun, those grotesque monkey-like figures carved in stone, used in church architecture, pierres du Coignet or pierres du Coigners. At Notre Dame de Paris they used to extinguish their torches in the mouths and nostrils of these figures, which thus acquired a superadded ugliness. (See Recherches de Pasquier, iii. chap. xxvii.)

"You may associate them with Master Peter du Coignet, in the middle of the porch... to perform the office of extinguishers, and with their noses put out the lighted candles, torches, papers, and flambeaux." —Fabius.

Pierrot [pe-er-ro]. A character in French pantomime representing a man in growth and a child in mind and manners. He is generally the tallest and thinnest man that can be got, has his face and hair covered with white powder or flour, and wears a white gown with very long sleeves, and a row of big buttons down the front. The word means Little Peter.

Piers. The shepherd who relates the fable of the Kid and her Dun, to show the danger of bad company. (Spenser: Shepherd's Calendar.)

Piers Plowman. The hero of a satirical poem of the fourteenth century. He falls asleep, like John Bunyan, on the Malvern Hills, and has different visions, which he describes, and in which he exposes the corruptions of society, the dissoluteness of the clergy, and the allurements to sin, with considerable bitterness. The author is supposed to be Robert or William Langland.

Pieta. A representation of the Virgin Mary embracing the dead body of her Son. Filial or parental love was called pietry by the Romans. (See Prots.)

Pietists. A sect of Lutherans in the seventeenth century, who sought to introduce a more moral life and a more "evangelical" spirit of doctrine into the reformed church. In Germany the word Pietist is about equal to our vulgar use of Methodist.

Pietro (2 syl.). The putative father of Pompilia, criminally assumed as his child to prevent certain property from passing to an heir not his own. (Robert Browning: The Ring and the Book, ii. 580.) (See Ring.)

Pig (Thé) was held sacred by the ancient Cretans, because Jupiter was suckled by a sow; it was immolated in the mysteries of Eleusis; was sacrificed to Hercules, to Venus, the Lares (2 syl.), and all those who sought relief from bodily ailments. The sow was sacrificed to Ceres (2 syl.), 'because it taught men to turn up the earth; and in Egypt it was slain on grand weddings on account of its fecundity.

Pig. In the forefront of pigs is a very small hole, which may be seen when the hair has been carefully removed. The tradition is that the legion of devils entered by these apertures. There are also round it some six rings, the whole together not larger than a small spangle; they look as if burnt or branded into the skin, and the tradition is that they are the marks of the devil's claws when he entered the swine (Mark v. 11-15).

(See Christian Traditions.)

Riding on a pg. It was Jane, afterwards Duchess of Gordon, who, in 1770, undertook for a wager to ride down the High Street of Edinburgh, in broad daylight, on the back of a pig, and she won her bet.

Some men there are lore not a gaping pg (Merchant of Venice, iv, 1). Marshal d'Albert always hunted at the sight of a roast sucking pig. (See Antipathy, Cat.)

The same is said of Vaughein, the renowned Hanoverian huntsman. Keller used to faint at the sight of smoked bacon.

Pig-back, Picka-back, or a-Pigger-back, does not mean as a pig is carried by a butcher, but as a pg or child is carried. It should be written apiggy-back. A butcher carries a pig head downwards, with its legs over its shoulders; but a child is carried with its arms round your neck, and legs under your arms.

"She carries the other a pack upon her shoulders." (Bunyan.)

Pig-eyed. Very small black eyes, like those of a pig. Southey says, "Those eyes have taught the lover flattery." The ace of diamonds is called "a pig's eye."

Pig Hunt (A). A village sport, in which a certain number of persons blindfolded hunt a small pig confined by hurdles within a limited space. The winner, having caught the pig, tucks it under his arm, and keeps it as his prize.

Pig-iron. This is a mere play on the word sow. When iron is melted it runs off into a channel called a sow, the lateral branches of which are called the pigs; here the iron cools, and is called pig-iron.

Pig and Tinderbox. The Elephant and Castle.

Pig and Whistle. The bowl and wassail, or the wassail-cup and wassail. A piggon is a pail, especially a milk-pail; and a pig is a small bowl, cup, or mug, making "milk and wassail;" similar to the modern sign of Jow and Glass—i.e., beer and wine. Thus a crockery-dealer is called a pig-wife.

Pig in a Pock. (A). Blind bargain. The French say Acheter chat en poche. The reference is to a common trick in days gone by of substituting a cat for a sucking-pig, and trying to palm it off on greenhorns. If anyone heedlessly bought the article without examination he bought a "cat" for a "pig," but if he opened the sack he "let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed. The French chat en poche refers to the fact, while our proverb regards the trick. Pocket is diminutive of pock.

Pigs. (See Bartholomew Pigs.)

He has brought his pigs to a pretty market. He has made a very bad bargain; he has managed his business in a very bad way. Pigs were the chief articles of sale with our Saxon herdsmen, and till recently the village cottager looked to pay his rent by the sale of his pigs.

He follows me about like an Anthony pig, or such and such a one as a Fantony pig; meaning a beggar, a hanger-on. Stow says that the officers of the market used to slit the ears of pigs until for food. One day one of the proctors of St. Anthony's Hospital tied a bell about a pig whose ear was slit, and no one would ever hurt it. The pig would follow like a dog anyone who fed it.

Please the pigs. If the Virgin permits, (Saxon, prgan, a virgin.) In the Danish New Testament "maiden" is generally rendered prgan. "Pig Cross," dedicated to the Virgin Mary, is Virgin Cross, or the Lady Cross. So also "Pig's Hill," "Pig's Ditch," in some instances at least, are the field and diggin attached to the Lady's chapel, though in others they are simply the hill and ditch where pigs were offered for sale. Another etymology is Please the provies (fairies), a saying still common in Devonshire.

It is somewhat remarkable that pig should be Norse for maiden, and hog or ag Gaelic for young generally. Thus agan (a young man), and goag (a young woman).

Pigskin (A). A gentleman's saddle, made of pigskin. "To throw a leg across a pigskin" is to mount a horse.
Pigtails (The). The Chinese; so called because the Tartar tonsure and braided queue are very general.

"We layd away telling one another of the pigtail till we both dropped off to sleep."—Giles' Adventures of the Chinaman.

Pigeon (To). To cheat, to gull one of his money by almost self-evident hoaxes. Pigeons are very easily gull'd, caught by snares, or scared by malkins. One easily gull'd is called a pigeon. The French pigeon means a dupe.

"Je me défend de tant que tu prends un de ceux qui ne saissent si facilement praumer à telles gens."—Les Dialogues de Jacques Marceau, (1533).

Flying the pigeons. Stealing coals from a cart or sack between the coal-dealer's yard and the house of the customer.

Flying the blue pigeon. Stealing the lead from off the roofs of churches or buildings of any kind.

To pigeon a person is to cheat him clandestinely. A gullible person is called a pigeon, and in the sporting world sharps and flats are called "rooks and pigeons." The brigands of Spain used to be called palomos (pigeons); and in French argot a dupe is called pêcher, or pêcheur de rubis; where pêcher or pêcheur is the Italian pescatore (a pigeon), and de rubis is a pun on dérobé, bamboozled.

To pluck a pigeon. To cheat a gullible person of his money. To fleece a greenhorn. (See Greenhorn.)

"Here comes a nice pigeon to pluck, and one of the thievish."—C. Mather.

Pigeon, Pigeons. Pitt says in Mecca no one will kill the blue pigeons, because they are held sacred.

The black pigeons of Indostan. Two black pigeons, we are told, took their flight from Thebes, in Egypt; one flew to Libya, and the other to Dodona, in Greece. On the spot where the former alighted, the temple of Jupiter Ammon was erected; in the place where the other settled, the oracle of Jupiter was established, and there the responses were made by the black pigeons that inhabited the surrounding groves. This tale is probably based on a pun upon the word pelea, which usually means "old women," but in the dialect of the Ephroites signifies pigeons or doves.

Mahomet's pigeon. (See Mahomet.)

In Russia pigeons are not served for human food, because the Holy Ghost assumed the likeness of a dove at the baptism of Jesus; and part of the marriage service consists in letting loose two pigeons. (See The Sporting Magazine, January, 1825, p. 307.)

Pigeon lays only two eggs. Hence the Queen says of Hamlet, after his fit he will be—

"As patient as the female dove When that her golden cuplets are disclosed [i.e., hatched]."—Hamlet, vi. 1.

He who is sprinkled with pigeon's blood will never die a natural death. A sculptor carrying home a bust of Charles I. stopped to rest on the way; at the moment a pigeon overhead was struck by a hawk, and the blood of the bird fell on the neck of the bust. The sculptor thought it ominous, and after the king was beheaded the saying became current.

Flocks of wild pigeons presage the pestilence, at least in Louisiana. Longfellow says they come with "naught in their craws but an acorn." (Evangeline.)

"The traders care nothing for the Chinese language, and are content to carry on their business transactions in a mixed language called "pigeon-English."—The Times.

Pigeon-hole (A). A small compartment for filing papers. In pigeon-lockers a small hole is left for the pigeons to walk in and out.

Pigeon-livered. Timid, easily frightened, like a pigeon. The bile rules the temper, and the liver the bile.

Pigeon Pair. A boy and girl, twins. It was once supposed that pigeons always sit on two eggs which produce a male and a female, and these twin birds live together in love the rest of their lives.

Pigg. (See under the word BREWER.)

Piggy-wiggy or Piggy-whidden. A word of endearment; a pet pig, which, being the smallest of the litter, is called by the diminutive Piggy, the wiggy being merely alliterative.

Piglet or Piggle. A small parcel of land enclosed with a hedge. In the eastern counties called a pikkle.

"Never had that novelty in manner whitened the laughter of Court Fams."—Miss Mitford: the Village, p. 92.

Pigmy. A dwarf. In fabulous history the pigmies were a nation of dwarfs devoured by cranes. (See PROMET.)

Pigmy or Pigenie. A word of endearment to a girl. (Diminutive of the Anglo-Saxon piga, a little girl.)

Pigwiggin. An elf in love with Queen Mab. He combats the jealous O'heron with great fury. (Drayton: Nymphidia.)

Pike's Head. A pike's head has all the parts of the crucifixion of Christ. There are the cross, three nails, and a sword distinctly recognisable. The German tradition is that when Christ was crucified all fishes dived under the waters in terror, except the pike, which, out of curiosity, lifted up its head and beheld the whole scene. (See Passion Flower.)

Pikestaff. Plain as a pikestaff. Quite obvious and unmistakable. The pikestaff was the staff carried by pilgrims, which plainly and somewhat ostentatiously announced their "devotion." It has been suggested that "pikestaff" is a corruption of "packstaff," meaning the staff on which a pedlar carries his pack, but there is no need for the change.

Pilate Voice. A loud ranting voice.

In the old mysteries all tyrants were made to speak in a rough ranting manner. Thus Bottom the Weaver, after a rant "to show his quality," exclaims, "That's 'Ecles' vein, a tyrant's vein;" and Hamlet describes a ranting actor as "out-heroding Herod."

"In Pilate voys hegan to cry, / And swor by armes, and by blood and bones."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 3126.

Pilate's Wife, who warned Pilate to have nothing to do with Jesus, is called Procla. (H. Johnson: The Rise of Christendom, p. 416.)

Others call her Justitia, evidently an assumed name.

Pilatus. (Mount) in Switzerland. The similarity of the word with the name of Pontius Pilate has given rise to the tradition that the Roman Governor, being banished to Gaul by Tiberius, wandered to this mount and threw himself into a black lake on its summit. But Mont Pilatus means the "hatted mountain," because it is frequently capped with clouds.

"The story goes, that once a year Pilate appears in his robes of office, and whoever sees the ghost will die before the year is out. In the sixteenth century a law was passed forbidding anyone to throw stones in the lake, for fear of bringing a tempest on the country.

There is a town called Pilate in the island of Hispaniola, and a Mont Pilate in France.

Pilch. The flannel napkin of an infant; a buff or leather jerkin. (Anglo-Saxon *pyle", a pilch.)

Pilcher. A scabbard. (Anglo-Saxon, *pyle"; Latin, pellis, skin.)

"Will you pluck your sword out of his pilcher?"—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, III. 1.

Pilgarlic or Pille'd Garlic. (A.) One whose hair has fallen off from dissipation. Stow says of one getting bald: "He will soon be a peeled garlic like myself." Generally a poor wretch avoided and forsaken by his fellows. The editor of Notes and Queries says that garlic was a prime specific for leprosy, so that garlic and leprosy became inseparably associated. As lepers had to pill their own garlic, they were nicknamed Pilgarlicos, and anyone shunned like a leper was so called likewise. (To pill = to peel; see Gen. xxx. 37.)

"It must be borne in mind that at one time garlic was much more commonly used in England than it is now."

"After this (feast) we jourged off to bed for the night; but never a bit could we pillow our sleep to wink, for the everlasting jangle of bells."—Rabelais: Pantagruel, V. 7.

Pilgrim Fathers (The). The 102 English, Scotch, and Dutch Puritans who, in December, 1620, went to North America in the ship called the Mayflower, and colonised Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut.

Pilgrimage (3 syl.). The chief places in the West were (1) Walsingham and Canterbury (England); (2) Fourvières, Puy, and St. Denis (France); (3) Rome, Loretto, Genesano, and Assisi (Italy); (4) Compostella, Guadalupe, and Montserrat (Spain); (5) Goting, Zell, Cologne, Trier, and Einsiedeln (Germany). Chaucer has an admirable account, chiefly in verse, of a pilgrimage to Becket's tomb in Canterbury Cathedral. The pilgrims beguile the weariness of the way by telling tales. These Canterbury Tales were never completed.

Pillar Saints or Stylites. A class of ascetics, chiefy of Syria, who took up their abode on the top of a pillar, from which they never descended. (See Stylites.)

Pillar to Post. Running from pillar to post—from one thing to another without any definite purpose. This is an allusion to the manège. The pillar is the centre of the riding ground, and the posts are the columns at equal distances, placed two and two round the circumference of the ring.

Pillars of Heaven (The). The Atlas Mountains are so called by the natives.

Pillars of Hercules (The). The opposite rocks at the entrance of the Mediterranean Sea, one in Spain and the other on the African continent. The tale is that they were bound together till Hercules tore them asunder in order to get to Gadès (Cadiz). The ancients called them Calpé and Ab'yds; we call them Gibraltar Rock and Mount Hacho, on which stands the fortress of Ceuta (Ku'tah).

Pillory. The following eminent men have been put in the pillory for literary offences:—Leighton, for tracts against Charles I.; Lilburn, for circulating the tracts of Dr. Bastwick; Bastwick, for attacking the Church of England; Warton the publisher; Prynne, for a satire on the wife of Charles I.; Daniel Defoe, for a pamphlet entitled The Shortest Way with Dissenters, etc.

Pilot, according to Scaliger, is from an old French word, pilote (a ship).

Pilot Balloon (A). A political feeler; a hint thrown out to ascertain public opinion on some moot point.

"As this gentleman is in the confidence of ministers, it is fair to assume that he was deputed to start this scheme as a pilot balloon."—Newspaper leader, 1856.

Pilot Fish. So called because it is supposed to pilot the shark to its prey.

Pilot that weathered the Storm (The). William Pitt, son of the first Earl of Chatham. (George Canning, in 1802, wrote a song so called in compliment to William Pitt, who steered us safely through the European storm stirred up by Napoleon.

Pilpay or Bidpay. The Indian Aesop. His compilation was in Sanskrit, and entitled Panthea-Tavtra. Khosru (Chosroes) the Great, of Persia, ordered them to be translated into Pehlivi, an idiom of Medieh, at that time the language of Persia. This was in the middle of the sixth century.

Pimlico (London). At one time a district of public gardens much frequented on holidays. According to tradition, it received its name from Ben Pimlico, famous for his nut-brown ale. His tea-gardens, however, were near Hoxton, and the road to them was termed Pimlico Path; so that what is now called Pimlico was so named from the popularity of the Hoxton resort.

"Have at thee, then, my merry bawes, and beg for old Ben Pimlico's nut-brown ale."—Nevis from Hoghton (1526).

Pimlico. To walk in Pimlico. To promenade, handsomely dressed, along Pimlico Path.

"Not far from this place were the Asparagus Gardens and Pimlico Path, where were fine walks, cool airrooms, etc., much used by the citizens of London and their families."—Nat. Hist. Survey. 211.

Pin (A). A cask holding 4½ gallons of ale or beer. This is the smallest of the casks. Two pins = a firkin or 9 gallons, and 2 firkins = a kilderkin or 18 gallons.

Pin. Not worth a pin. Wholly worthless.

I don't care a pin, or a pin's point. In the least.

The pin. The centre; as, "the pin of the heart." (Shakespeare: Romus and Juliet, ii. 4). The allusion is to the pin which fastened the clout or white mark on a target in archery.

Weak on his pins. Weak in his legs, the legs being a man's pegs or supporters.

A merry pin. A roysterer.

We are told that St. Dunstan introduced the plan of pegging tankards, to check the intemperate habits of the English in his time. Called "pin-tankards."

In merry pin. In merry mood, in good spirits. Pegge, in his Anonymaum, says that the old tankards were divided into eight equal yards, and each part was marked with a silver pin. The cups held two quarts, consequently the quantity from pin to pin was half a Winchester pint. By the rules of "good fellowship," a drinker was supposed to stop drinking only at a pin, and if he drank beyond it, was to drink to the next one. As it was very hard to stop exactly at the pin, the vain efforts gave rise to much mirth, and the drinker had generally to drain the tankard. (See P20.).

"No song, no laugh, no jovial ditty of drinking vastly to the pin."

Longfellow: *Golden Legend."

*I do not pin my faith upon your sleeve. I am not going to take your ipse dixit for gospel. In feudal times badges were worn, and the partisans of a leader used to wear his badge, which was pinned on the sleeve. Sometimes these badges were changed for specific purposes, and persons learned to doubt. Hence the phrase, "You wear the badge, but I do not intend to pin my faith on your sleeve."

He tided at the pin. Rattled at the latch to give notice that he was about to enter. The pin was not only the latch of chamber-doors and cottages, but the "rump" of castles used instead of the modern knocker. It was attached to a ring, which produced a grating sound to give notice to the wanderer.

"See, light he jumped up the stair, And tured at the pin; And who see ready as herself To let the ladder in."

Charlie is my Durran.

Pin Money. A lady's allowance of money for her own personal expenditure. Long after the invention of pins, in the fourteenth century, the maker was allowed to sell them in open shop only on January 1st and 2nd. It was then that the court ladies and city dames flocked to the depots to buy them, having been first provided with money by their husbands. When pins became cheap and common, the ladies spent their allowances on other fancies, but the term pin money remained in vogue.

It is quite an error to suppose that pins were invented in the reign of François I., and introduced into England by Catherine Howard, the fifth wife of Henry VIII. In 1317, just 200 years before the death of François, 12,000 pins were delivered from the royal wardrobe for the use of the Princess Joan. So that pins were not only manufactured in England, but were of high repute even in the reign of Henry IV. (1399-1413).

Policy of Pin Pins. A policy of petty annoyances. The term came into prominence during the strained relations between England and France in 1898, and probably took its rise from a passage in the Paris Mutual November 8th, 1898.

Pinabello or Pinabel (in Orlando Furioso). Son of Anselmo, King of Maganza. Murphisa, having overthrown him, and taken the steed of his dame, Pinabello, at her instigation, decreed that nothing would wipe out the disgrace except a thousand dukes and a thousand warriors unhorsed, and spoiled of their arms, steed, and vest. He was slain by Bradamant.

Pinchbeck. So called from Christopher Pinchbeck, a musical-clock maker, of Fleet Street. (Died 1732.) The word is used for Brummagem gold; and the metal is a compound of copper, zinc, and tin.

Where, in these pinchbeck days, can we hope to find the old agricultural virtue in all its purity? —Anthony Trollope: Framley Parsonage.

The Italian Pindar. Gabriele Chiabrera; whence Chiarbergino is in Italian tantamount to "Pindarico." (1552-1637.)

Peter Pindar. Dr. John Wolcott (1738-1812).

In Westminster Abbey, the last line of Gray's tablet claims the honour of British Pindar for the author of The Bard.

"She [Britain] felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,

A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray."

Pindar and the Bees. (See PLATO.)

Pindar of Wakefield (George-a-Green) has given his name to a celebrated house on the west side of the Gray's Inn Road; and a house with that name still exists in St. Chad's Row, on the other side of the street. (The Times.) (See PINDER.)

Pindaric Verse. Irregular verse; a poem of various metres, but of lofty style, in imitation of the odes of Pindar. Alexander's Fust, by Dryden, is the best specimen in English.

Pinder. One who impounds cattle, or takes care of the cattle impounded; thus George-a-Green was the "Pinder of Wakefield," and his encounter with Robin Hood, Scarlet, and Little John forms the subject of one of the Robin Hood ballads. ( Anglo-Saxon pind, a fold.)

Pindor's (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the two heralds; the other is Arideus.

Pine-bender (The). Sinis, the Corinthian robber: so called because he used to fasten his victims to two pine-trees bent towards the earth, and then leave them to be rent asunder by the rebound.

Pink (.I.). The flower is so called because the edges of the petals are pinked or notched. (See below.)

Pink of Perfection (The). The acme; the beau-ideal. Shakespeare has "the pink of courtesy" (Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4); the pink of politeness. (Welsh, pyn, a point, an acme; our pink, to stab; pinking, cutting into points.)
Piony or Peony. A flower; so called from the chieftain Paion, who discovered it. (Saxon Leechdoms, i.)

Pion-pion. An infantry soldier. This is probably a corruption of pion, a pawn or foot-soldier. Cotgrave, however, thinks the French foot-soldiers are so called from their habit of pilfering chickens, whose cry is pion pion.

Pious (2 syl.). The Romans called a man who revered his father pious; hence Antonius was called pious, because he requested that his adopted father (Hadrian) might be ranked among the gods. Hence was called pious because he rescued his father from the burning city of Troy. The Italian word pio (q.v.) has a similar meaning.

The Pious, Ernst I., founder of the House of Gotha. (1601-1674.)
Robert, son of Hugues Capet. (971, 996-1031.)
Eric IX. of Sweden. (*, 1155-1161.)

Pip. The hero of Dickens's Great Expectations. He is first a poor boy, and then a man of wealth.

Pipe. Anglo-Saxon pip, a pipe or flute.
Put that into your pipe and smoke it. Digest that, if you can. An expression used by one who has given an adversary a severe rebuke. The allusion is to the pipes of peace and war smoked by the American Indians.
Put your pipe out. Spoil your piping or singing; make you sing another tune, or in another key. "Take your shine out" has a similar force.
As you pipe, I must dance. I must accommodate myself to your wishes.
To pipe your eye. To snivel: to cry.

Pipe Rolls or Great Rolls of the Pipe. The series of Great Rolls of the Exchequer, beginning 2 Henry II., and continued to 1834, when the Pipe Office was abolished. These rolls are now in the Public Record Office, Chancery Lane.
"Take, for instance the Pipe Rolls, that magnificent series of documents on which, from the middle of the 12th century until well on in the 19th, we have a perfect account of the Crown revenue, rendered by the sheriffs of the different counties."—Notes and Queries, June 8, 1883, p. 421.

Office of the Clerk of the Pipe. A very ancient office in the Court of Exchequer, where leases of Crown lands, sheriffs' accounts, etc., were made out. It existed in the reign of Henry II., and was abolished in the reign of William IV. Lord Bacon says, "The office is so called because the whole receipt of the court is finally conveyed into it by means of divers small pipes or quills, as water into a cistern.

Pipe of Peace. The North American Indians present a pipe to anyone they wish to be on good terms with. To receive the pipe and smoke together is to promote friendship and good will, but to refuse the offer is virtually a declaration of hostility.

Pipoclay. Routine; fossilised military dogmas of no real worth. In government offices the term red-tape is used to express the same idea. Pipoclay was at one time largely used by soldiers for marking their gloves, accoutrements, and clothes look clean and smart.

Pipolet. A concierge or French door-keeper; so called from a character in Eugène Sue's Mysteries of Paris.

Piper. The Pied Piper. (See Pied.) Who's to pay the piper? (See PAY.) Tom Piper. So the piper is called in the morris dance.
"There is apparently another Tom Piper, referred to by Drayton and others, of whom nothing is now known. He seems to have been a sort of Mother Goose, or raconteur of short tales.
"Tom Piper is gone out, and mirth beended.
He never will come in to tell us tales."

Piper that Played before Moses (By the). Per tubaemium quae coram Mose modulatus est. This oath is from Tales in Blackwood [Magazine, May, 1838]: Father Tom and the Pope (name of the tale). (Notes and Queries, April 2, 1887, p. 276.)

Piping Hot. Hot as water which pipes or sings.

Pippa Passes. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. Some casual influence has dropped good seed, which has taken root and beareth fruit to perfection. The words are the title of a dramatic poem by Robert Browning. Pippa is a chaste-minded, light-hearted peasant maiden, who resolves to enjoy New Year's Day, her only holiday. Various groups of persons overhear her as she passes-by singing her innocent ditties, and some of her stray words, falling into their hearts, act with secret but sure influence for good. (1842.)

Piranesi. Now called the port Leone.
Pirrie's Chair. "The lowest seat o' hell." "If you do not mend your ways, you will be sent to Pirrie's chair, the lowest seat of hell."

"In Pirrie's chair you'll sit, I say, The lowest seat o' hell; If ye do not amend your ways It's a place that ye must dwell." Child's English and Scottish ballads: The穿越the skies Knight.

"Pirrie or priarie means a sudden storm at sea (Scotch priar). "They were driven back by storms of wind and pyrries of the sea." (North: Plutarch, P. 355.)

Pirithous. King of the Lapithae, proverbial for his love of Theseus (2 syl.), King of Athens.

Pisaller (French). As a shift: for want of a better: a dernier ressort; better than nothing.

"She contended herself with a pisaller, and gave her head... in six months to the son of the baronet's steward."—No W. Scott: Waverley, chap. v.

Piss'nie. A servant noted for his attachment to Imogen. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Piso's Justice. That is Piso's justice. Verbally right, but morally wrong. Seneca tells us that Piso condemned a man on circumstantial evidence for murder; but when the suspect was at the place of execution, the man supposed to have been murdered exclaimed, "Hold, hold! I am the man supposed to have been killed." The centurion sent back the prisoner to Piso, and explained the case to him; whereupon Piso condemned all three to death, saying, "Fat justitla." The man condemned is to be executed because sentence of death has been passed upon him, and fat justitla; the centurion is to be executed because he has disobeyed orders, and fat justitla; the man supposed to have been murdered is to be executed because he has been the cause of death to two innocent men, and fat justitla eto cepun runt.

Pistol. Falstaff's lieutenant or ancient; a bully, a coward, a rogue, and always poor. (Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV; Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Pistols. So called from Pistoia, in Tuscany, where they were invented in 1545. (Latin, pistorium.)

To discharge one's pistol in the air. To fight a man of straw; to fight harmlessly in order to make up a foolish quarrel.

"Dr. Rewluc has discharged his pistol in the air (that he pretends to fight against me, but discharges his shot against objections which he never made)."—W. E. Gladstone: Nineteenth Century, November, 1886.

Pistis, Pistis, Pistis, or Pistris. The sea-monster sent to devour Andromeda. In ancient art it is represented with a dragon's head, the neck and head of a beast, fins for the forelegs, and the body and tail of a fish. In Christian art the pistris was usually employed to represent the whale which swallowed Jonah. (Urbani: Commentaries.) Aratus died A.D. 213.

Pit-a-pat. My heart goes pit-a-pat. Throbs, palpitates. "Fat" is a gentle blow (Welsh, fit), and "pit" is a mere ricochet expletive. We have a vast number of such ricochet words, as "fiddle-faddle," "harum-scarum," "ding-dong," etc.

"Anything like the sound of a rat Makes my heart go pit-a-pat." Drayton: First Part of Hamlet.

Pitch. Touch pitch, and you will be defiled. "The finger that touches rouge will be red." "Evil communications corrupt good manners." "A rotten apple injures its companions."

Pitch and Pay. Pitch down your money and pay at once. There is a suppressed pun in the phrase: "to pay a ship" is to pitch it.

"The word is pitch and pay—trust none." Shakespeare: Henry V, ii. 3.

Pitch into Him. Thrust or dart your fists into him.

Pitcher. The pitcher went once too often to the well. The dodge was tried once too often, and utterly failed. The same sentiment is proverbial in most European languages.

Pitcher's. Little pitchers have long ears. Little folk or children hear what is said when you little think it. The ear of a pitcher is the handle, made in the shape of a man's ear. The handle of a cream-ewer and of other small jugs is quite out of proportion to the size of the vessel, compared with the handles of large jars.

Pithos. A large jar to keep wine or oil in. Winckelmann has engraved a copy of a curious bas-relief representing Diogenes occupying a pithos and holding conversation with Alexander the Great. (Greek pithos, a large wine jar.)

P'iri (plur. Pitaris). An order of divine beings in Hindu mythology inhabiting celestial regions of their own, and receiving into their society the spirits of those mortals whose funeral rites have been duly performed.
Pitt Diamond or The Regent. Called Pitt diamond because it once belonged to Mr. Pitt, grandfather of the famous Earl of Chatham. Called the Regent diamond from the Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, who purchased it. This famous diamond was worn in the sword-hilt of Napoleon, and now belongs to the King of Prussia.

Pitt's Mark. The printer's name and place of business affixed to printed books, according to William Pitt's Act, 39 Geo. III., c. 79.

Pitt's Pictures or Billy Pitt's Pictures. Blind windows; so called because many windows were blocked up when William Pitt augmented the Window Tax in 1784, and again in 1797.

Pitáctos (Greek, Pitakous). One of the "Seven Sages" of Greece. His great sayings were: (1) "Know the right time" ("Giówthi kaiwun"), and (2) "Tis a sore thing to be eminent" ("Xábepmo exthlon emmenva").

Pittance. An allowance of victuals over and above bread and wine. Anthony du Pinet, in his translation of Pliny, applies the term over and over again to figs and beans. The word originally comes from the people's piety in giving to poor mendicants food for their subsistence. (Probably connected with pites, Monksh Latin, petuence; Spanish, pitar, to distribute a dose of food; pitancero, one who distributes the dose, or a begging friar who subsists by charity.)

Pixies (2 syl.). The Devonshire Robin Goodfellow: said to be the spirits of infants who have died before baptism. The Pixy monarch holds his court like Titania, and sends his subjects on their several tasks. The word is a diminutive of Pix, probably the same as Puck. (Swedish, pyk; old English, poep, pyn, pyc, bly, blyce; Danish, pøj, and pokker.)

Pixy-land (Devonshire), Peake-addon (Worcestershire). Mussed into bags and ditches.

Place aux Dames. Make way for the ladies: give place to the ladies: the ladies first, if you please. Indirectly it means women beat the men hollow in every contest.

Placebo. One of the brothers of January, an old baron of Lombardy. When January held a family council to know whether he should marry, Placebo very wisely told him to do as he liked, for says he—

"A full great fool is any counsellor,
That serveth any lord of high honour.
That dar presum, or none (once) thanketh it.
That his counsel shold pass his lordes will," Warder: The Marchantane Tale, line 8121, etc.

To sing Placebo. To seek to please; to trim in order not to offend. The word Placebo is often used to denote vapors for the dead, from the fact that it is the first word of the first Antiphon of that Office.

Plagiarist means strictly one who kidnaps a slave. Martial applies the word to the kidnappers of other men's brains. Literary theft unacknowledged is called plagiarism. (Latin, plagiarus.)

Plain (The). The Girondists were so called in the National Convention, because they sat on the level floor or plain of the hall. After the overthrow of the Girondists this part of the House was called the marsh or swamp (marais), and included such members as were under the control of the Mountain (g. t.).

Plain Dealer (The). Wycherly was so called, from his celebrated comedy of the same title. (1610-1715.)

"The Countess of Drogheda, required for the Plain Dealer, 'Madame,' says Mr. Partridge, 'speak you are for the 'Plain Dealer, there he is for you,' pushing Mr. Wycherly towards her." — Cooke: Life of the Poets, iii. p. 252.

Plan of Campaign (The). Often cited shortly as "The Plan," promulgated by John Dillon in October, 1886. It provided that Irish tenants on an estate should band together, and determine what abatement of rent they considered to be called for. If the landlord accepted the abatement, well and good; if not, the tenants were to pay into a campaign fund the amount offered to the landlord, and the money thus funded should be used in fighting the landlord if he went to law to recover his rents.

"The Plan of Campaign proposed to reduce rents by an average of some 30 per cent." — Nineteenth Century, April, 1887, p. 598.

* In 1885 the Land Commission reduced all the rents from 10 to 14 per cent.; so that 30 per cent. more would equal from 40 to 45 per cent.

Planets.

i. In astrology there are seven planets:—

- ALEIL, the sun, represents gold.
- DANA, the moon, represents silver.
- MERCURY represents quicksilver.
- VENUS represents copper.
- MARS represents iron.
- JUPITER represents tin.
- SATURN represents lead.
Planet-struck. A blighted tree is said to be planet-struck. Epilepsy, paralysis, lunacy, etc., are attributed to the malignant aspects of the planets. Horses are said to be planet-struck when they seem stupefied, whether from want of food, colic, or stoppage. The Latin word is sidérum.

Plank. To walk the plank. To be about to die. Walking the plank was a mode of disposing of prisoners at sea, much in vogue among the South Sea pirates in the 17th century.

Plantagenet, from planta genista (broom-plant), the family cognisance first assumed by the Earl of Anjou, the first of his race, during a pilgrimage to the Holy Land, as a symbol of humility. (Sir George Buck: Richard III.) Died 1022.

Plate (n.). A race in which a prize is given out of the race fund, or from some other source, without any stakes being made by the owners of the horses engaged. Usually entrance money is required. (See Sweepstakes, Handicap, Plate, Selling Race, Weight-for-Age Race.)

Plate, meaning silver, is the Spanish plate.

Plateen, among printers, is the power or weight which presses on the tympan (q.v.), to cause the impression of the letters to be given off and transferred to the sheet. (French, plat, flat.)

Platen, in type-writing machines, the plate is the feeding roller on which the paper rests to receive the proper impressions.

Plates or Plates of Meat. Slang for feet. One of the chief sources of slang is rhyme. Thus meat rhymes with feet, and "warming my plates" is slang for warming my feet. Similarly, "Rory O'More" is slang for door, and "there came a knock at the Rory O'More" means there was a knock at the door. A prescott is slang for waistcoat. (See Chivy.)

Platform, in the United States, is the policy of a political or religious party. Of course the meaning is the policy on which the party stands. An American revival. Each separate principle is a plank of the platform.

Queen Elizabeth, in answer to the Supplication of the Parliament (offered to the Parliament in 1566), said she "had examined the platform, and account it most paramount to the religion established, to her crown, her government, and her subjects."

Again, the Rev. John Norris writes in 1566 that Plato said, "God created man, and put him into a garden, and said, 'I will give you every tree in the garden, to eat of, and to have desire of.'"--Lyle, viii, 6.

The word has been resuscitated in North America. Lily, in 1881, says he “discovered the whole platform of the conspiracy.” (Discovery of the New World, p. 115.)

“Their declaration of principles—their ‘platform’ to use the appropriate term—was settled and published to the world. Its distinctive elements, or ‘planks,’ are financial.”—The Times.

Plato. His original name was Aristocles, but he was called Platôn from the great breadth of his shoulders.

The German Plato, Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi (1743-1819).

The Jewish Plato, Philo Judaeus, an Alexandrine philosopher. (Flourished 20-40.)

The Puritan Plato. John Howe, the Nonconformist. (1630-1706).

Plato and the Bees. When Plato was an infant, some bees settled on his lips when he was asleep, indicating that he would become famous for his honeyed words. The same is said of Sophocles, Pindar, St. Ambrose, St. Chrysostom, and others.

“And as when Plato did the cradle thrive, Bees to his lips brought honey from their hive.”

W. Browne: Britannia’s Pastorals, ii.

Plato’s Year. A revolution of 25,000 years, in which period the stars and constellations return to their former places in respect to the equinoxes.

“Cut out more work than can be done in Plato’s year, but finish none.”

Butler: Hudibras, pt. iii. 1.

Platonic Bodies. The five regular geometric solids described by Plato—viz. the tetrahedron, hexahedron, octahedron, dodecahedron, and icosahedron, all of which are bounded by like, equal, and regular planes.

Platonic Love. Spiritual love between persons of opposite sexes. It is the friendship of man and woman, without mixture of what is usually called love. Plato strongly advocated this pure affection, and hence its distinctive name.

Platonic Puritan (Thir). John Howe, the Nonconformist divine. (1630-1706).

Platonism. The philosophical system of Plato; dialectics. Locke maintains that the mind is by nature a sheet of white paper, the five senses being the doors of knowledge. Plato maintained the opposite theory, drawing a strong line of demarcation between the province of thought and that of sensations in the production of ideas. (See Dialectics.)

In theology, he taught that there are two eternal, primary, independent, and incorruptible causes of material things—God the maker, and matter the substance.

In psychology, he maintained the ultimate unity and mutual dependence of all knowledge.

In physics, he said that God is the measure of all things, and that from God, in whom reason and being are one, proceed human reason and those “ideas” or laws which constitute all that can be called real in nature.

Platter with Two Eyes. (A). Emblematical of St. Lucy, in allusion to her sending her two eyes to a nobleman who wanted to marry her for the exceeding beauty of her eyes. (See Lucy.)

Play. “This may be play to you, ‘tis death to us.” The allusion is to the fable of the boys throwing stones at some frogs. (Roger L'Estrange.)

As good as a play. So said King Charles when he attended the discussion of Lord Ioss’s “Divorce Bill.”

Play the Deuce. The Irish say, Play the poaka. Pooka or Poake is an evil spirit in the form of a wild colt, who does great hurt to berefted travellers.

Played Out. Out of date; no longer in vogue; exhausted.

“Valentines, I suppose, are played out, said Milton.”—Tennyson: Quo Vadis, Feb. 13, 1866.

Playing to the Gods. Degrading one’s vocation ad captandum vulgus. The gods, in theatrical phrase, are the spectators in the uppermost gallery, the ignominous vulgus. The ceiling of Drury Lane theatre was at one time painted in imitation of the sky, with Cupids and other deities here and there represented. As the gallery referred to was near the ceiling, the occupants were called the gods. In French this gallery is nick-named paradis.

Please the Pigs. (See under Pres.)

Pleased as Punch. Greatly delighted. Our old friend Punch is always singing with self-satisfaction in all his naughty ways, and his evident “pleasure” is contagious to the beholders.

“You could skip over to Europe whenever you liked; mamma would be pleased as Punch.”—E. Grant.

Pleasure. It was Xerxes who offered a reward to anyone who could invent a new pleasure.
Plebeians. Common people; properly it means the free citizens of Rome, who were neither patricians nor clients. They were, however, free landowners, and had their own "gentes." (Latin, plebes, 2 syl.)

Plebiacite (3 syl). A decree of the people. In Roman history, a law enacted by the "comitia" or assembly of tribes. In France, the resolutions adopted in the Revolution by the voice of the people, and the general votes given during the Second Empire—such as the general vote to elect Napoleon III., emperor of the French.

Pledge. I pledge you in this wine—t.e. I drink to your health or success.

"Drink to me only with thine eyes, And I will pledge with mine."—Den Johan (translated from Philoctetes) second century.

To pledge. To guarantee. Pleading a drinker's security arose in the tenth century, when it was thought necessary for one person to watch over the safety of a companion while in the act of drinking. It was by no means unusual with the fierce Danes to stab a person under such circumstances.

"If you were a huge man, I should fear to drink at meals. Let the rest charm my windpipe's dangerous notes. Great men should drink with firmness on their threats."—Timon of Athens, I. 2.

Pleiades (3 syl.) means the "sailing stars" (Greek, pleo, to sail), because the Greeks considered navigation safe at the return of the Pleiades, and never attempted it after those stars disappeared.

The Pleiades were the seven daughters of Atlas and Pleione (Pléione). They were transformed into stars, one of which (Métope) is invisible out of shame, because she alone married a human being. Some call the invisible star "Electra," and say she hides herself from grief for the destruction of the city and royal race of Troy.

i. The Pleiad of Alexandria. A group of seven contemporary poets in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphos: so called in reference to the cluster of stars in the back of Taurus. Their names are—Callimachus, Apollonios of Rhodes, Ara'tos, Phileus (called Homer the Younger), Ly'cophron, Nicander, and Theocritus.

There are in reality eleven stars in the Pleiades.

ii. The literary Pleiad of Charlemagne. Alcun (Albion), Angilbert (Honor), Adelward (Augzhoue), Riculf (Dametius), Charlemagne (David), Vausfrid, and Eginhard.

iii. The first French Pleiad. Seven contemporary poets in the sixteenth century, in the reign of Henri III., who wrote French poetry in the metres, style, and verbiage of the ancient Greek and Latin poetry. Of these, Ronsard was by far the most talented; but much that would be otherwise excellent is spoilt by pedantry and Frenchified Latin. The seven names are Ronsard, Dorat, Du Bellay, Remi-Belleau, Jodelle, Batail, and Thiard.

The second French Pleiad. Seven contemporary poets in the reign of Louis XIII., very inferior to the "first Pleiad." Their names are Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupeyray, and P ott.

iv. The Last Pleiad. Electra, one of the Pleiades, wife of Dardanus, disappeared a little before the Trojan war (B.C. 1193), that she might be saved the mortification of seeing the ruin of her beloved city. She showed herself occasionally to mortal eye, but always in the guise of a comet. Mons. Fretet says this tradition arose from the fact that a comet does sometimes appear in the vicinity of the Pleiades, rushes in a northerly direction, and passes out of sight. (See Olym. v. and Hild. xvi.)

Letitia Elizabeth Landon published, in 1829, a poem entitled The Last Pleiad.

Ploet is a lash like a knob, but not made of raw hides. (Russian, plet, a whip.)

Pleydell (Mr. Paulus). An advocate in Edinburgh, formerly sheriff of Ellangowan.

"Mr. Counsellor Pleydell was a lively, straightforward gentleman, with a professional airiness in his eye, and, generally speaking, a professional formality in his manner; but this he could slip off on a Saturday evening, when... he joined in the ancient pastime of High Jinks."—Sir W. Scott: Glimpse Handering, xxix.

Pliable. One of Christian's neighbours, who went with him as far as the Slough of Despond, and then turned back again. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. i.)

Pliny of the East. (See Zakaria.)

Pliny's Doves. In one of the rooms on the upper floor of the museum of the Capitol at Rome are the celebrated Doves of Pliny, one of the finest and most perfectly preserved specimens of ancient mosaic. It represents four doves drinking, with a beautiful border surrounding the composition. The mosaic is formed of natural stones, so small that 160 pieces cover only a square inch. It is supposed to be the work of Soeas, and is described by Pliny as a proof of the perfection to which that art had arrived. He says:—

"At Pergamos is a wonderful specimen of a dove, and a rabbit with the shadow of her head; on the lip of the vessel are other doves pluming themselves."

This exquisite specimen of art was found in Villa Adriana, in 1737, by Cardinal Furtiotti, from whom it was purchased by Clement XIII.

Plith. A piece of iron made hot and put into an iron box, to be held for punishment by a criminal. (See Plut.)

Plon-plon. The sobriquet of Prince Napoleon Joseph Charles Bonaparte, son of Jerome Bonaparte. He was nicknamed Quot plon-plon (Four-bullet) in the Crimean war (1853-1856), a nickname afterwards perverted into Plon-plon.

Plot, in a theatrical sense, does not only mean the incidents which lead to the development of a play, but half a dozen other things; thus, the "scene plot" is a list of the various scenes to be used; the "flyman's plot" is a list of the articles required by the flyman in the "fices;" there is also the "gasmans's plot:" the "property plot" is a list of all the properties required in the play, for which the manager is responsible.

Plotooock. The old Scotch form of the Roman Pluto, by which Satan is meant. Chaucer calls Pluto the "king of Fuerie," and Dunbar names him "Pluto the cirich incubus."

Plough. Food, Fool, or White. Plough. The plough dragged about a village on Plough Monday. Called white, because the mummers who drag it about are dressed in white, gaudily trimmed with flowers and ribbons. Called food or fool, because the procession is fond or foolish— not serious, or of a business character.

Plough Monday. The first Monday after Twelfth Day is so called because it is the end of the Christmas holidays, and the day when men return to their plough or daily work. It was customary on this day for farm labourers to draw a plough from door to door of the parish, and solicit "plough-money" to spend in a frolic. The queen of the banquet was called Bessey. (See Distaff.)

Plower. To live like a plower, i.e. to live on nothing, to live on air. Plowers do not, however, live on air, but feed largely on small insects. They also eat worms, which they hunt for in newly-ploughed fields.

Plowden. "The case is altered," quoth Plowden. Plowden was a priest, very unpopular, and in order to bring him into trouble some men inveigled him into attending mass performed by a layman, and then impeached him for so doing. Being brought before the tribunal, the cunning priest asked the layman if it was he who officiated. "Yes," said the man. "And are you a priest?" said Plowden. "No," said the man. "Then," said Plowden, turning to the tribunal, "that alters the case, for it is an axiom with the church, 'No priest, no mass.'"

Plowman. The Vision of Piers Plowman is a satirical poem by W. [or R.] Langland, completed in 1362. The poet supposes himself falling asleep on the Malvern Hills, and in his dream sees various visions of an allegorical character, bearing on the vices of the times. In one of the allegories, the Lady An'tina (the saint) is placed in Castle Caro (jerk) under the charge of Sir Constable Inwit, and his sons See-well, Hear-well, Work-well, and Go-well. The whole poem consists of nearly 15,000 verses, and is divided into twenty parts, each part being called a passus, or separate vision.

Pluck. To reject a candidate for literary honours because he is not up to the required mark. The rejected candidate is said to be plucked.

When degrees are conferred the name of each person is read out before he is presented to the Vice-Chancellor. The proctor used at one time to walk once up and down the room, and anyone who objected to the degree being conferred might signify his dissent by plucking or twitching the proctor's gown. This was occasionally done by tradesmen to whom the candidate was in debt; but now all persons likely to be objected to, either by tradesmen or examiners, know it beforehand, and keep away. They are virtually plucked, but not really so.

A case of pluck. An instance of one who has been plucked: "Tome Jones is a case of pluck," i.e. is a plucked man.

A man of pluck. Of courage or spirit. The pluck is the heart, liver, and whatever else is "plucked," away from the chest of a sheep or hog. We also use the expressions bold heart, lily-livered, a man of another kidney, bowls of mercy, a vein of fun, it raised his bile, etc. (See Liver.)
Pluck his Goose. I'll pluck his goose for him. That is: I'll cut his crest, I'll lower his pride, I'll make him eat humble pie. Comparing the person to a goose, the threat is to pluck off his feathers in which he prides himself.

Plucked Pigeon (A.). One fleeced out of his money; one plucked by a rook or sharper.

"There were no smart fellows whom fortune had troubled, no plucked pigeons or winged rooks, no disappointed speculators, no ruined miners." — Sir W. Scott. Peveril of the Peak, c. xi.

Plungon of Undershoot. Carlyle's typical commercial Radical in the middle of the 19th century, who found that no decent Tory would shake hands with him; but at the close of the century found free-competition company with latter-day Tories.

"There are two motive forces which may impel the Plungons of Toryism; the pressure is not simply enough, ... to overcome the 'prejudice' at Plungon and Co." — Nineteenth Century, Dec., 1882, p. 878.

Plum. A plum bed (Devonshire). A soft bed, in which the down lies light.

The plum's going well (Devonshire).

Rise well, and will not be heavy.

The cake is nice and plum (Devonshire).

Light. (Plump, swelled out.)

He is worth a plum. The Spanish plum means both plumage and wealth. Hence tiene pluma (he has feathered his nest). We arbitrarily place this desideratum at £100,000, and the man who has realised only £50,000 has got only half a plum. "Either a plum or a plumstone" — i.e., "fat Caesar and munichs."

Plume Oneself (To). To be conceited of; to boast of.

"Mrs. Bracewray ... plumed herself upon her resolute manner of performing (what she thought right). "— Trollope, Vanity Fair.

Plumes. In borrowed plumage. Assumed merit; airs and graces not merited. The allusion is to the plume of the jack-daw who dressed up in peacock's feathers.

Plumber (A.). Every elector represented in Parliament by two members has the power of voting for both candidates at an election. To give a plumber is to vote for only one of the candidates, and not to use the second vote. If he votes for two candidates of opposite politics, his vote is termed a split vote.

Plunger. One who planges, or spends money recklessly in bets, etc. The Marquis of Hastings was the first person so called by the turf. One night he played three games of draughts for £1,000 a game, and lost all three. He then cut a pack of cards for £500 a cut; and lost £5,000 in an hour and a half. He paid both debts at once before he left the room.

Plus Ultra. The motto in the royal arms of Spain. It was once Ne plus ultra, in allusion to the pillars of Hercules, the ne plus ultra of the world; but after the discovery of America, and when Charles V. inherited the crown of Aragon and Castile, with all the vast American possessions, he struck out ne, and assumed the words plus ultra for the national motto, as much as to say Spain and the plus ultra country.

Plush (John). A gorgeous footman, conspicuous for his plush breeches.

To take plush. To take a subordinate place in the ministry, where one can only act as a government flunky.

"Lord Rosebery perhaps remembers that, years ago, a young politician who had just finished his education, was warned by an old and affectionate tea-chest not to take plush. 'The reply was, 'I have been offered plush tights with red tape and have refused it.' — Nineteenth Century, Jan., 1892, p. 157.

Pluto. The grave, or the god of that region where the dead go to before they are admitted to Elysium or sent to Tartarus.

"Brothers, be of good cheer, the night we shall sing with Pluto! I came to the three hundred Spartans before the battle of Thermopyles.

"Give the unsalted portion you have won... To those who look, you come to Pluto's porch." — Thomson, Castle of Indolence, canto 1.

Pluto. Many artists of great repute have painted this god, the three most famous being that by Jule-Romain (1492-1546), a pupil of Raphael, in Mantua; one by Augustin Carache (1538-1601), in Madrid, generally called Il Famoso; and the third by Luc Giodano (1632-1701), in the gallery of the Palace Riccardi. Raphael has introduced Pluto in his Assembly of the Gods.

In the Villa Albani of Rome is the famous antique statue of Pluto and Cerberus.

Plutonic Rocks. Granites, and certain porphyries, supposed to be of igneous, but not of volcanic, origin. So called by Lyell from Pluto, the principle of elemental fire.

Plutus. Rich as Pluto. In Greek mythology Plutos is the god of riches. Plutus and Pluto are widely different.

Plymouth Brethren. A sect that protests against all sectarianism, and advocates the unity of the church; some even go so far as to advocate a community of goods. So called from Plymouth, where they sprang into existence in 1830.

Plymouth Cloak (A). A good stout cudgel. In the time of the Crusades many men of good family used to land at Plymouth utterly destitute. They went to a neighbouring wood, cut themselves a good stout club, and, stopping the first passenger that passed by, provided themselves with money and clothing. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Pocahontas. Daughter of Powhatan, an Indian chief of Virginia, who rescued Captain John Smith when her father’s hand was on the point of killing him. She subsequently married John Rolfe, and was baptised under the name of Rebecca, (1595-1617.) (See Old and New London, ii. 481.)

Pocket (diminutive of poche, a pouch).
To put one’s hand in one’s pocket. To give money (generally to some charity). Put your pride in your pocket. Lay your pride aside for the nonce.
To be in pocket. To be a gainer by some transaction.
To be out of pocket. To be a loser by some transaction.

Pocket an Insult (T). To submit to an insult without apparent displeasure.

Pocket Borough (A). A borough where the influence of the magnate is so powerful as to be able to control the election of any candidate he may choose to support. Well nigh a thing of the past since the introduction of voting by ballot.

Pocket Judgment (A). A bond under the hand of a debtor, countersigned by the sovereign. This bond can be enforced without legal process, but has quite fallen into disuse.

Pocket Pistol (A). A drum-flask for the pocket, in “self-defence,” because we may be unable to get a drum on the road.

Pocket Pistol (Queen Bess’s). A formidable piece of ordnance given to Queen Elizabeth by the Low Countries in recognition of her efforts to protect them in their reformed religion. It used to overlook the Channel from Dover Cliffs, but in 1894 was removed to make room for a battery of modern guns. It is said that it contains in Flemish the equivalent of the following words:—
“Lead me well and keep me clean,
And I’ll carry a sail to Cain’s Green.”

But this translation is only fanciful.

Poco, rather, as a poco forte, poco animato.

Pococurante (5 syll.). Insouciant, devil-may-care, easy-go-lucky. As the “Pococurante Guardsman” (the imperturbable and impassive . . .). Also used for one who in argument leaves the main gist and rides off on some minor and indifferent point.

Pococurantism. Insouciance, imperturbability. Also indifference to important matters, but concern about trifles.

Podgers. Toadies, veneration (real or pretended) of everything and everyone with a name. (John Hollingshead: The Birthplace of Podgers, a Farce.)

Podsnap. A type of the heavy gentry, lumbering and straight-backed as Elizabethan furniture. (Dickens: Our Mutual Friend.)

Podsnappery. The etiquette of the fossil gentry, stiff-starched and extremely proper.
“it may not be so in the gospel according to Podsnappery . . . but it has been the truth since the foundations of the universe were laid”—our mutual friend.

Poe (Edgar Allan). The alias of Arthur Gordon Pym, the American poet. (1811-1849.)

Poe Squab. So Rochester calls Dryden, who was very corpulent. (1631-1701.)

Poets (Greek, poies, to make).
Skalds of Scandinavia (etym., scalla, to sing, Swedish, etc.)

Minnesingers of the Holy Empire (Germany), love-singers.

Troubadours of Provence in France (trouver, to invent, in the Provençal dialect).

Trouvères of Normandy (trouver, to invent, in the Walloon dialect).

Bards of Wales (bardgan, a song, Celtic).

Poet of Haslemere (The). Alfred Tennyson (Lord Tennyson), poet laureate (1809-1893). (See Bard.)

Prince of poets. Edmund Spenser is so called on his monument in Westminster Abbey. (1553-1598.)

Prince of Spanish poets. Garciía de la Vega, frequently so called by Cervantes. (1503-1566.)
Quaker poet (The). Bernard Barton (1784-1849).

Poets' Corner (The). In Westminster Abbey. The popular name given to the south corner, because some sort of recognition is made of several British poets of very varied merits. As a national Valhalla, it is a national disgrace. It is but scant honour to be ranked with Davenport, Mason, and Shadwell. Some recognition is taken of five of our first-class poets — viz. Chaucer, Dryden, Milton, Shakespeare, and Spenser. Wordsworth and Tennyson are recognised, but not Byron, Pope, Scott, and Southey. Gray is very properly acknowledged, but not Cowper. Room is found for Longfellow, an American, but none for Burns and Hogg, both Scotchmen.

Poets Laureate, appointed by letters patent.

Dryden. Spenser calls him "the pure well of English undefiled." He was not the first English poet, but was so superior to his predecessors that he laid the foundation of a new era. He is sometimes termed "the day-star," and Spenser the "sun-rise" of English poetry.

Poilzie. An Apulian horse. The horses of Apulia were very greatly valued at one time. Richard, Archbishop of Armagh in the fourteenth century, says of St. Thomas, "Neither the mule of Spain, the courser of Apulia, the mule of Ethiopia, the elephant of Asia, the camel of Syria, nor the English ass, is bolder or more comical than he."

"Therto so hourly, and so quy k of ye; As if a gentil Poilzie by his courser were; For certes, for his tiall unto his nacy, Nature ne art ye coutum he neought amend." — Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, line 10 336.

Point. One of the companions of Sir John Falstaff. (Shakespeare: 1 and 2 Henry IV.)

Point. Defined by Euclid as "that which hath no parts." Playfair defines it as "that which has position but not magnitude," and Legendre says it is "a limit terminating a line;" but none of these definitions can be called either philosophical or exact. A point is not necessarily a "limit terminating a line," for if so a point could not exist, even in imagination, without a line. Besides, Legendre's definition presupposes that we know what a line is; but assuredly a "point" precedes a "line," as a line precedes a "superficies." To arrive at Legendre's idea we must begin with a solid, and say a superficies is the limit terminating each face of a solid, "lines are the limits terminating superficies," and points are the "limits terminating a line." In regard to Euclid's definition, we say: Ex nihilo nihil fit.

In good point (French, en bon point, plumps.) (See Stretch a point.)

To carry one's point. To gain the object sought for. The allusion is to archery.

To dine on potatoes and point. To have potatoes without salt, a very meagre dinner indeed. When salt was very dear, and the cellar was empty, parents used to tell their children to point their potato to the salt cellar, and eat it. This was potato and point. In the tale of Ralph Richards the Miser, we are told that he gave his boy dry bread, and whipped him for pointing it towards the cupboard where a bit of cheese was kept in a bottle.

To make a point of [doing something]. To consider the matter as a point of duty. The reference is to the old Roman way of voting by ballot. The ballot tablets were thrown by the voters into a chest, and were afterwards counted by points marked on a tablet, and to obtain every vote was to "carry every point" ("Omne tali punctum" [Horace]). Hence a point of duty or point of conscience is a plank on the platform of duty or conscience.

To stretch a point. To exceed what is strictly right. Points were the tagged laces used in ancient dress; hence, to "true a point," to true or tie the laces which held the breaches; to "stretch a point" is to stretch these laces, so as to adjust the dress to extra growth, or the temporary fulness of good feeding. At Whitsuntide these points or tags were given away by the churchwardens.

"Their points being broken, down fell their hose."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Point-blank. Direct. A term in gunnery; when a cannon is so placed that the line of sight is parallel to the axis and horizontal, the discharge is point-blank, and is supposed to go direct to the object without a curve. In French point blanc is the white mark or bullet's eye of a target, to hit which the ball or arrow must not deviate in the least from the exact path.

"Nun art thou within point-blank of our jurisdiction royal."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, v. 7.

Point d'Appui (French). A standpoint; a fulcrum; a position from which you can operate; a pretext to conceal the real intention. Literally the point of support.

"The material which gives name to the dish is the point d'appui; for the literary cayenne and carrypander, by which it is recommended to the palate of the reader."—The Almanac.

Point de Judas (French). The number 13. The twelve apostles and our Lord made thirteen at the Last Supper.

Point-devise. Punctilious; minutely exact. Holofemes says, "I abhor such insociable and point de rive companions, such rackers of orthography." (French, point de rive.)

"You are rather point de rive in your acquaintance."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, iii. 2.

Points. Armed at all points. "Armé de toutes pièces," or "Armé jusqu'aux dents." "Armed at all points exactly cap-a-pie."

To stand on points. On punctilios; delicacy of behaviour.

"This fellow doth not stand upon points."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. i.

Points of the Escutocheon. There are nine points distinguished in heraldry by the first nine letters of the alphabet—three at top, A, B, C; three at middle, D, E, F; and three at the bottom, G, H, I. The first three are chiefs; the middle three are the collar point, fess point, and numeral or navel point; the bottom three are the base points.

Poison. It is said that poisons had no effect on Mithridates, King of Pontus. This was Mithridates VI, called the Great, who succeeded his father at the age of eleven, and fortified his constitution by drinking antidotes to poisons which might at any moment be administered to him by persons about the court. (See Aqua Tofana.)

Poison Detectors.

Aladdin's ring was a preservative against every evil. Gundoferus. No one could pass with poison the gate of Gundoferus. Naureghan's bracelet. When poison was present the stones of this bracelet seemed agitated.

Opals turn pale at the approach of poison.

Peacocks ruffle their feathers at the sight of poison. Rhinoceros. If poison is put into a cup made of rhinoceros' horn, the liquid will effervesce.

Sign of the Cross was supposed in the Middle Ages to be a poison detector. Vinetian glass will shiver at the approach of poison. (See also Philosopher's Elixir.)

Poison of Khaibar refers to the poisoned leg of mutton of which Mahomet partook while in the citadel of Khaibar. It was poisoned by Zaub, a Jewess, and Mahomet felt the effects of the poison to the end of his life.

Poisoners (Secret).

(1) Locusta, a woman of ancient Rome, who was employed by the Empress Agrippina to poison her husband Claudius. Nero employed the same woman to poison Britannicus and others.

(2) The Borgias (Bope-Alexander VI. and his children, Cesar and Lucrezia) were noted poisoners.

(3) Hieronyuma Spara and Toffania, of Italy. (See Aqua Tofana.)

(4) Marquise de Brinvilliers, a young profligate Frenchwoman, taught the art by an officer named Saint-Croix, who learnt it in Italy. (See World of Wonders, part vii, p. 203.)

(5) Lavoisier and Lavigere, French midwives and fortune-tellers.

(6) Anna Maria Zweiniger, sentenced to death in 1811.

In English history we have a few instances: e.g. Sir Thomas Overbury was so murdered by the Countess of Somersset. King James, it has been said, was a victim to similar poisoning, by Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

Poisson d’Avril. An April fool. The poisson d’Avril is the mackerel, and we have the expression "You silly mackerel," and silly indeed are those who allow themselves to be caught by the palpable jokes engendered on the 1st of April. The French say "hunting the gowk" (cuckoo). It is said that the best explanation is a reference to Matt. xxix. 2.

"The mackerel, sait Gudin, recall'd the poisson d’Avril, 'pour que les marquesse se prumant 'etre maingant en courrier non-loin.'"

A correspondent of Notes and Queries, June 29, 1891, p. 490 says that the April fish is the rente", secured to Venus.

Poke. A bag, pouch, or sack.

Poke. A lazy person, a loafer, a dawdler.

Poke. To thrust or push against; to thrust or butt with the horns. Also to busy oneself without any definite object.

"Poking about where we had no business." — *Kampe’s Tales.

"To poke fun at one is to make one a laughing-stock."

"At a table he was hospitable and jocose, always poking good-natured fun at Luke." — Lyall Lyndon: Essex (London of Gregory) chap xi.

Poke Bonnet. A long, straight, projecting bonnet, formerly commonly worn by women.

Poker. A poker set leaning against the upper bars of a fire to draw it up. This is to make a cross to keep off Loh, the house spirit, who loves to lie before the fire, and, like Puck and Robin Goodfellow, dearly loves mischief and practical jokes.

Poker Pictures. Drawings executed by the point of a hot poker or "heater" of an Italian iron. By charring different parts more or less, various tints are obtained.

Poker Talk. Gossip, fireside chit-chat.

"Gaston rallied with this specimen of poker talk lightly." — Mrs. Edgeworth: Aorton Grit, ch ii.

---

Pokers. The squire Bedels who carry a silver mace or poker before the Vice-Chancellor are so called at Cambridge.

Poky. Cramped, narrow, confined; as, a poky corner. Also poor and shabby.

"The ladies were in their pokiest old head-gear" — Thackeray: The Newcomes, chap. lii.

Polack. An inhabitant of Poland. (French, Polaque.

"So frowned he once, when in angry parle,
He smote the studded Polacks on the ice."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. i.

Polarisation of Light is the absorption of those rays which are at right angles to the rays preserved: Thus \( A B \) is one ray in which \( A \) is reflected to \( B \) and \( B \) to \( A \); \( C D \) is a ray, in which \( C \) is reflected to \( D \) and \( D \) to \( C \). In \( E \), if the light is polarised, either \( E \) or \( G \) is absorbed. \( A B \) and \( C D \) are the poles of light, or the directions in which the rays are reflected.

Pol'less (2 syl.). The labouring class of Ireland.

"Poles' the labouring lower clans are named. By the proud Nayres the noble rank is claimed."

Polies. Underhave polis. Said of a ship when all her sails are furled.

Polichinelle. Le secret de... (See Secret.)

Polinnesio (in Orlando Furioso). Duke of Albany, who falsely accused Genevra of incontinence, and was slain in single combat by Ariodantes.

Polish off. To finish out of hand. In ellusion to articles polished.

"I'll polish him off in no time means I'll set him down, I'll give him a drubbing.

"To polish off a meal is to eat it quickly, and not keep anyone waiting.

Political Economy. This term was invented by François Quesnay, the French physician. (1691-1774.)

Polinexone (3 syl.). The name assumed by Madean in Moreu's Précieux Rudeurs.

Polix'enos (1 syl.). King of Bohemia, being invited to Sicily by King Leontes, excites unwittingly the jealousy of his friend, because he prolongs his stay at the entreaty of Queen Hermione. Leontes orders Camillo to poison the royal guest, but, instead of doing so, Camillo flees with him to Bohemia. In time Florizel, the son and heir of Polixenas, falls in love with Perdita, the lost daughter of Leontes. Polixenes forbids the match, and the young lovers, under the charge of Camillo, flee to Sicily. Polixenes follows the fugitives, the mystery of Perdita is cleared up, the lovers are married, and the two kings resume their friendship. (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.)

Poll. To go out in the poll. To take an ordinary degree—a degree without university "honours." (Greek, hos polloi, the many.)

Poll Degree. (See above.)

Poll Men. Those of the "hui polloi," the many, not the honour-men.

Pollenté. The puissant Suncrem, father of Mu'ern. He took his station on "Bridge Perilous," and attacked everyone who crossed it, bestowing the spoil upon his daughter. Sir Artegal slew the monster. Pollente is meant for Charles IX. of France, sadly notorious for the slaughter of Protestants on St. Bartholomew’s Eve. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book v. 2.)

Pollio, to whom Virgil addresses his Fourth Eclogue, and to whom he ascribes the remarkable advent of the "golden age," was the founder of the first public library of Rome. (B.C. 76-80. A.D. 4.)

Pollux. The horses of Castor and Pollux. Cyllaros and Harpagos. Seneca and Claudian give Cyllaros to Castor, but Virgil (Georgic iii.) to Pollux. The two brothers mount it alternately on their return from the inferior regions. Harpagos, the horse from Harpagus in Phrygia, was common to both brothers.

Polly. Mary. The change of M for P in pet names is by no means rare—

Margaret. Maggie or Meggy, becomes Peggie, and Peg or Peg.

Martha. Matty becomes Patty.

Mary. Molly becomes Polly or Poll.

Here we see another change by no means unusual—that of r into l or ll. Similarly, Sarah becomes Sally; Dorothea, Dora, becomes Dolly: Harry, Hal.

Polenius. An old courtier, garulous, conceited, and pohitic. He was father of Ophelia, and lord chamberlain to the king of Denmark. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Polony. A vulgar corruption of Bolv'gyn savange.

Poll-foot. A club-foot. Ben Jonson calls Vulcan, who was lame, the "polt-footed philosopher." (Swedish, bull, a club; bulb, to beat; our bolt.)

Poltron. A bird of prey, with the talons of the hind toes cut off to prevent its flying at game. (Latin, pollcetrauato, deprived of its toe or thumb.)

Poltroon. A coward. Menage derives it from the Italian polto, a bed, because cowards feign themselves sick a-bed in times of war. Saumaise says it means "maimed of the thumb," because in times of conscription those who had no stomach for the field disqualified themselves by cutting off their right thumb. More probably a poltroon is a hawk that will not or cannot fly at game. (See above.)

Polybo'tes (4 syl.). One of the giants who fought against the gods. The sea-god pursued him to the island of Cos, and, tearing away part of the island, threw it on him and buried him beneath the mass. (Greek fable. (See GIANTS.)

Polyce'tus. A statue of Sic'yon, who deduced a canon of the proportions of the several parts of the human body, and made a statue of a Persian body-guard, which was admitted by all to be a model of the human form, and was called "The Rule" (the standard.)

Polycrates (4 syl.), Tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in all things that Amanis, King of Egypt, advised him to chequer his pleasures by relinquishing something he greatly prized. Whereupon Polycrates threw into the sea a beautiful seal, the most valuable of his jewels. A few days afterwards a fine fish was sent him as a present, and in its belly was found the jewel. Amanis, alarmed at this good fortune, broke off his alliance, declaring that sooner or later this good fortune would fail; and not long afterwards Polycrates was shamefully put to death by Orocles, who had invited him to his court.

"Richard III."

"... had feelings not unlike those which built King Polycrates' old..." (Shakespeare: Cymbeline, chap. vi.)

Polycrates’ Ring. (See above.)

Polycrat'ion, in eight books, by John of Salisbury. This is his chief work, and is an exposé of the frivolities of courtiers and philosophers. It is learned, judicious, and very satirical. (He died 1182.)

Poly'damas. A Grecian athlete of immense size and strength. He killed a fierce lion without any weapon, stopped a chariot in full career, lifted a mad bull, and died at last in attempting to stop a falling rock. (See Milo.)

Polydore (3 syl.). The name assumed by Guidorius, in Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

Polyphemus (3 syl.). One of the Cyclops, who lived in Sicily. He was an enormous giant, with only one eye, and that in the middle of his forehead. When Ulysses landed on the island, this monster made him and twelve of his crew captive; six of them he ate, and then Ulysses contrived to blind him, and make good his escape with the rest of the crew. Polyphemus was most passionately in love with Galatea, a sea-nymph, but Galatea had set her heart on the shepherd Acis, whom Polyphemus, in a fit of jealousy, crushed beneath a rock.

In the valley of the Parmac gaiace is a superb painting of Polyphemus, in three parts: (1) playing a flute to Galatea; (2) holding a rock at Acis; and (3) pursuing the ships of Ulysses. Pompeii has also introduced, in one of its frescoes, Polyphemus sitting on a rock and playing a flute.

Pomme Alcinoe Dare (2 syl.). (See Alcinoe.)

Pomtum. So called because it was originally made by macerating over-ripe apples in grease. (Dr. John Quincy: Lexicon Physico-Medical, 1723.)

Pommard (French). Beer. This is a pun on the word pomme. The Normans called cider pomme; whence pomat, a sort of beer.

"His tenant, leure chalantes...be pomm, ou patre aux remants de pumme, de vin, de pomme, ou patre, entre ou me de plus de saison..."—Alain Le Tac: Les Etats Contiues de la Mer, p. 157.

Pomme. The pomme of a saddle is the apple of it, called by the French pommeau. The Spaniards use the expression pomme de espada (the pomme of a sword). To "pommel a person" is to beat him with the pomme of your sword. The ball used as an ornament on pointed roofs is termed a pomel. (Latin, pomum, an apple.)

Pomean. Fruit: goddess of fruits and fruit-trees—one of the Roman divinities. (Latin, pomea.)

Pompadour, as a colour, is claret purple. The 5th Foot is called the Pompadours, from the claret facings of their regimental uniforms. There is an old song supposed to be an elegy on John Broadwood, a Quaker, which introduces the word:—

"Sometimes he wore an old brown coat,
Sometimes a pompadour;
Sometimes 't was buttoned up behind,
And sometimes down before."

Pompey. A generic name for a black footman, as Abigail used to be of a lady's maid. Moll or Molly is a cook; Betty, a housemaid; Sambo, a black "buttons;" etc. One of Hood's jokes for a list of library books was, Pompeii: or, Memoirs of a Black Footman, by Sir W. Gill. (Sir W. Gill wrote a book on Pompeii.) Pompey is also a common name for a dog.

Pompey's Pillar, in Alexandria. A pillar erected by Publius, Prefect of Egypt, in honour of the Emperor Dionysius, to record his conquest of Alexandria in 206. It has about as much right to be called Pompey's pillar as the obelisk of Heliopolis, re-erected by Ramesses II. at Alexandria, has to be called Cleopatra's Needle, or Gibraltar Rock to be called a Pillar of Heracles.

Pompey's pillar is a Corinthian column nearly 100 feet high, the shaft being of red granite.

Pomprilla. The bride of Count Guido Franceschini, who is brutally treated by him, but makes her escape under the protection of a young priest, named Capanaschi. She subsequently gives birth to a son, but is stabbed to death by her husband. (Robert Browning: The Ring and the Book.) (See Ring.)

Pongo. The terrible monster of Sicily. A cross between a "land-tiger and sea-shark." He devoured five hundred Sicilians, and left the island for twenty miles round without inhabitant. This amphibious monster was slain by the three sons of St. George. (The Seven Champions of Christendom, iii. 2.) A loose name for African anthropoid apes.

Ponocrates (1 syl.). Gargantua's tutor, in the romance of Pantagruel. and Gargantua, by Rabelais.

Pons Asinorum. The fifth proposition, book i., of Euclid—the first difficult theorem, which dunces rarely get over for the first time without stumbling. It is anything but a "bridge;" it is really petit asserum, the "dolt's stumbling-block."

Pontefract Cakes. Liquorice lozenges impressed with a castle; so called from being made at Pontefract.

"Pontefract" pronounce "Pont frec."

Pontiff means one who has charge of the bridges. According to Varro, the highest class of the Roman priesthood had to superintend the construction of the bridges (pontes). (See Ramsay: Roman Antiquities, p. 51.)

"Well has the name of Pontiff been given into the church's head, as the chief builder and architect of the invisible bridge that leads from earth to heaven."

Longfellow: Golden Legend, v.

7 Here Longfellow follows the general notion that "pontif" is from ponte-fisco, and refers to the tradition that a Roman priest threw over the Tiber, in the time of Numa, a sublician, or wooden bridge.

Sublicium means made of timber or poles. There were subsequently eight stone bridges, and Ancilus converted the subherian bridge into a stone one. There were fifteen pontifcs in the time of Sylla.

Pontius Pilate's Body-Guard.
The 1st Foot Regiment, now called the Royal Scots, the oldest regiment in the service. When called Le Regiment de Douglas, and in the French service, they had a dispute with the Picardy regiment about the antiquity of their respective corps. The Picardy officers declared they were on duty on the night of the Crucifixion, when the colonel of the 1st Foot replied, "If we had been on guard, we should not have slept at our posts."

Pony (A). Twenty-five pounds. A sporting term; a translation crib = to carry one over a difficulty.

Pony is vingt-et-un. The person on the right-hand of the dealer, whose duty it is to collect the cards for the dealer; so called from the Latin ponere, "behind," being behind the dealer.

Poons. A sovereign. Lingua Franca for pound.

Poor. Poor as Job. The allusion is to Job, who was by Satan deprived of everything he possessed.

Poor as Lazarus. This is the beggar Lazarus, full of sores, who was laid at the rich man's gate, and desired to be fed from the crumbs that fell from Divs' table (Luke xvi. 13-31).

Poor as a church mouse. In a church there is no cupboard or pantry, where mice most do congregate.

There are none poor but those whom God hates. This does not mean that poverty is a punishment, but that the only poverty worthy of the name is poverty of God's grace. In this sense Divs may be the poor man, and Lazarus the beggar abounding in that "blessing of the Lord which maketh rich."

Poor Jack or John (A). Dried hake. We have "john-dory," a "jack" (pike), a "jack shark," and a "jack of Dover." Probably the word Jack is a mere play on the word "Hake," and John a substitute for Jack.

"This well thou art not fish; if thou badst, thou badst been poor-man." -Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, 1. 1.

"We have a similar perversion in the schoolboy proof that a pigeon-pee is a fish-pee. A pigeon-pee is a pre-john, and a pre-john is a jack-pee, and a jack-pee is a fish-pee."

Poor Man. The blade-bone of a shoulder of mutton, so called in Scotland. In some parts of England it is termed a "poor knight of Windsor," because it holds the same relation to Sir Loin as a Windsor knight does to a baronet. Sir Walter Scott tells of a Scotch laird who, being asked by an English landlord what he would have for dinner, produced the utmost consternation by saying, "I think I could relish a morsel of a poor man." (See Bride of Lammermuir, chap. xix.)

Poor Richard. The assumed name of Benjamin Franklin in a series of almanacks from 1732 to 1757. These almanacks contain maxims and precepts on temperance, economy, cleanliness, chastity, and other homely virtues; and to several of the maxims are added the words, "as poor Richard says." Nearly a century before Robert Herrick had brought out a series of almanacks under the name of Poor Robin's Almanack.

Poor Tassel (A). A poor hand, a bad workman, no great shakes. The tassel or tiercel was a male goshawk, restricted to princes, and called a "tassel gentle."

"Venturing this opinion to the brick-maker, he laughingly replied, 'Come, then, and try your hand at a brick.' The trial, however, proved me a poor tassel, among the jeers and laughter of the men." -C. Thompson: Autobiography, p. 52.

Poorer than Irus ("Iro pustervos"). Irus was the beggar employed by the suitors of Penelopen to carry to her their tokens of love. When Ulysses returned home, Irus attempted to prevent his entering the gates, but Ulysses told him to the ground, and threw the dead body into the road.

Pop the Question (To). To propose or make an offer of marriage. As this important demand is supposed to be unexpected, the question is said to be popped.

Pope lived at Twickenham. (1688-1744.)

"For though not sweeter his own Homer sings, Yet is his life the more endearing song.."

Thomson: Summer.

Pope (1 syl.), in Latin popa (plur. popae). A priest who knocked on the head the ox offered in sacrifice, and cut it up, a very small part being burnt, and all the rest distributed to those concerned in the sacrifice. Wine was poured between the horns, but the priest first sipped it, and all those who assisted him. After the beast had been stunned it was stabbed, and the blood was caught in a vessel used for the purpose, for the shedding of blood was indispensable in every sacrifice. It was the duty of the pope to see that the victim to be sacrificed was without spot or blemish, and to ascertain that it had never been yoked to the plough. The head was crowned with a fillet, and the horns gilt. Apparently the Roman soldiers of Pontius Pilate made a mockery imitation of those Roman and Greek sacrifices.
Pope

Pope. The Pope changing his name. According to Plutarch, Sergius II. was the first pope who changed his name on ascending the papal chair. His proper name was Hugon, and Chambers says his name was "Peter di Porca," and it was the name Peter he changed, out of deference to St. Peter, thinking it arrogant to style himself Peter II. (844-847).

I know no more about it than the Pope of Rome—than a man living as far off as the Cham of Tartary or Pope of Rome.

_Drink like a pope._ Benedict XII. was an enormous eater and such a wine-drinker that he gave rise to the bacchanalian expression, _benedictus populator._ (See DRUNK.)

Pope. Titles assumed by the popes. Universal Bishop. Prior to Gregory the Great.

_Servus Servorum._ Assumed by Gregory the Great in 591.

_The Lamb of God which taketh away the Sins of the World._ Martin IV. in 1281.

_Divine Majesty; Husband of the Church; Prince of the Apostles; Key of the whole Universe; the Pastor and Physician possessed of all Power both in Heaven and Earth._ Leo X. in 1513.

_Monarch of Christendom; Vice-God; Lord God the Pope._ Paul V. in 1635.

_Master of the World; the Universal Father; Viceregent of the Most High._ Subsequent to Paul V.

(See Brady: _Clavis Calendaria, 247._)

Pope Joan. Said to have succeeded Leo IV. Gibbon says, "Two Protestants, Blondel and Bayle, annulled her;" but Mosheim seems half-inclined to believe there was such a person. The vulgar tale is that Joan conceived a violent passion for the monk Fidia, and in order to get admission to him assumed the monastic habit. Being clever and popular, she got to be elected pope.

Pope’s Sermon (A). Only once has a pope been known to preach a sermon in three hundred years. In 1847 a great crowd had assembled to hear the famous Padre Ventura preach in Santa Andrea della Valle, of Rome, but the preacher failed to appear; whereupon Pius IX. ascended the pulpit, and gave a sermon. (De Lannoy: _History of Pius IX._)

_The Pope’s place._ So Cardinal Cajetan calls the Church. (Sixteenth century.)

Pope’s Tiara (The). He calls himself (1) Head of the Catholic or Universal Church; (2) Sole Arbiter of its Rights; and (3) Sovereign Father of all the kings of the earth. From these assumptions he wears a triple crown—one as High Priest, one as Emperor, and one as King. (See Brady, 250, 251.)

For the first five centuries the Bishops of Rome wore a bonnet, like other ecclesiastics.

_Pope_ Hormannus (514-523) placed on his bonnet the crown sent him by Clovis.

John XXII. (1110-115) assumed the third crown.

Popofigland. An island inhabited by the Guillardets (French, guillard, gay people), rich and free, till, being shown one day the pope’s image, they exclaimed, "A fig for the pope!" whereupon the whole island was put to the sword. Its name was then changed to Popofigland, and the people were called Popofigs.

Popinjay. A butterfly man, a fop; so called from the popinjay or figure of a bird shot at for practice. The jay was decked with parti-coloured feathers so as to resemble a parrot, and, being suspended on a pole, served as a target. He whose ball or arrow brought down the bird by cutting the string by which it was hung, received the proud title of 'Captain Popinjay," or "Captain of the Popinjay," for the rest of the day, and was escorted home in triumph. (See _Old Mortality_, ch. ii.)

"I then, all smaarting with my wounds being cold, To be so pestered with a popinjay, Answered negligently I know not what, He should or he should not."

_Shakespeare: Henry IV_, i. 3.

_The Festival of the Popinjay._ The first Sunday in May. (See above.)
Popish Plot. A plot in the reign of Charles II. to massacre the Protestants, burn London, and assassinate the king. Titus Oates invented this "wise" scheme, and obtained great wealth by revealing it; but ultimately he was pilloried, whipped, and imprisoned. (See Gunpowder Plot.)

Poplar (The). (Latin, populus, from populus, the people.) Being symbolic of the people, both because its leaves are dark on one side and white on the other, and also because they are never still, but blown about by the least gust of wind. In France, to the present day, the poplar is an emblem of democracy. There are black and white poplars, and the aspen-tree is one of the species.

The white poplar was consecrated to Herë-culës, because he destroyed Kå-kos in a cavern of Mount Aventine, which was covered with poplars. In the moment of triumph the hero plucked a branch from one of the trees and bound it round his head. When he descended to the infernal regions, the heat caused a profuse perspiration which blanched the under surface of the leaves, while the smoke of the eternal flames blackened the upper surface. Hence the Herculean poplar has its leaves black on one side and white on the other.

Porcelain (3 syl.), from porcellana, "a little pig." So called by the Portuguese traders, from its resemblance to cowrie-shells, the shape of which is not unlike a pig's back. The Chinese earthenware being white and glossy, like the inside of the shells, suggested the application of the name. (See Maryutt's History of Pottery and Porcelain.)

Porch (The). A philosophic sect, generally called Stoics (Greek, stoà, a porch), because Zenos, the founder, gave his lectures in the Athenian picture gallery, called the porch Phædrës.

"The successors of Socrate formed societies which lasted several centuries, the Academy, the Porch, the Garden."—Prot. in Schol. Fragment.

Porcupine. (See Peter.)

Porcup. The Latins call me "poreus." A sly reproach to anyone boasting, showing off, or trying to make himself appear greater than he is. The fable says that a wolf was going to devour a pig when the pig observed that it was Friday, and no good Catholic would eat meat on a Friday. Going on together, the wolf said to the pig, "They seem to call you by many names." "Yes," said the pig,

"I am called swine, grunter, hog, and I know not what besides. The Latins call me poreus." "Porpus, do they?" said the wolf, making an intentional blunder. "Well, porpoise is a fish, and we may eat fish on a Friday." So saying, he devoured him without another word.

Porcus Litterarum. A literary glutton, one who devours books without regard to quality.

Porz! Pork! Sylvester, in his translation of Du Bartas, gives this instead of car, cae, as the cry of the raven.

*Pork. Sir Thomas Browne says that the Jews abstain from pork not from fear of leprosy, asTacitus alleges, but because the swine is an emblem of impurity. (Vulgar Errors.)

Pork, Pig. The former is Norman-French, the latter Saxon.

"Pork, I think, is good Norman-French: and so, when the brute lives, and is in charge of a Saxon slave she goes by her Saxon name; but becomes a Norman, and is called pork, when she is carried to the castle-hall."—Sir Walter Scott. Ivanhoe.

Porphyron. One of the giants who made war with the gods. He hurled the island of Delos against Zeus (Jupiter); but Zeus, with the aid of Hercules, overcame him. (Greek fable.) (See Giants.)

Porridge. Everything tastes of porridge. However we may deceive ourselves, whatever castles in the air we may construct, the fact of home life will always intrude. Sir Walter Scott tells us of an insane man who thought the asylum his castle, the servants his own monials, the inmates his guests. "Although," said he, "I am provided with a first-rate cook and proper assistants, and although my table is regularly furnished with every delicacy of the season, yet so depraved is my palate that everything I eat tastes of porridge." His palate was less vitiated than his imagination.

Port, meaning larder or left side, is an abbreviation of porta il timone (carry the helm). Porting arms is carrying them on the left hand.

"To heel to port" is to lean on the left side (Saxon, hyldan, to incline). "To lurch to port" is to leap or roll over on the left side (Welsh, lleian).

"She gave a heel, and then a lurch to port.
And, going down head foremost, sunk in short."—Ivydon: Don Juan.

Port. An air of music; martial music. Hence Ttyler says, "I have never been able to meet with any of the ports here referred to” (Dissertation on Scotch Music). The word is Gaelic.

Port Royal Society. In 1637, Le Maitre, a celebrated advocate, resigned the honour of being Conseiller d'Etat, and with his brother de Sericourt consecrated himself to the service of religion. The two brothers retired to a small house near the Port Royal of Paris, where in time they were joined by their three other brothers—De Sacy, De St. Elme, and De Valmont. Afterwards, being obliged to remove, they fixed their residence a short distance from the city, and called it Port Royal des Champs. These illustrious recluses were subsequently joined by other distinguished persons, and the community was called the Society of Port Royal.

Port Wine. Lord Pembroke’s port wine. This renowned wine is thus made—

17 gallons of ruche doré,
18 gallons of Bone Carlo wine,
3 gallons of brandy.

Porto (The) or The Sublime Porte. The Ottoman Empire. In the Byzantine Empire, the gates of the palace were the place of assembly for judicial and legal administration. The word sublime is French for ‘lofty,’ and the term was adopted naturally, as French has long been the language of diplomacy. The whole building contains four Turkish departments of state—viz. (1) the Grand Vizierat; (2) the Foreign Office; (3) the Interior; and (4) the State Council.

“...The government is to blame for not having done all in its power, like the Porte.” —The Times

Porteous Riot. This notorious tumult took place at Edinburgh in September, 1736. Porteous was captain of the city guard. At the examination of a criminal named Wilson, Captain Porteous, fearing a rescue, ordered the guards to fire on the mob, which had become tumultuous; in this discharge six persons were killed, and eleven wounded. Porteous was tried for this attack and condemned to death, but reprieved. The mob, at his reprieve, burst into the jail where he was confined, and, dragging him to the Grassmarket (the usual place of execution), hanged him by torchlight on a dyer’s pole.

Portia. A rich heiress in The Merchant of Venice, in love with Bassanio. Her father had ordained that three caskets should be offered to all who sought her hand—one of gold, one of silver, and one of lead—with this proviso: he only who selected the casket which contained the portrait of the lady should possess her hand and fortune. (Shakespeare.)

Portland Stone. So called from the island of Portland, where it is quarried. It hardens by exposure to the atmosphere. St. Paul’s Cathedral and Somerset House (London) are built of this stone.

Portland Vase. A cinerary urn of transparent dark-blue glass, long in possession of the Barberini family. In 1770 it was purchased by Sir William Hamilton, for 1,000 guineas, and came afterwards into the possession of the Duchess of Portland. In 1810, the Duke of Portland, one of the trustees of the British Museum, allowed it to be placed in that institution for exhibition. William Lloyd, in 1815, dashed it to pieces; it has since been carefully repaired, but is not now shown to the public. It is ten inches high, and six in diameter at the broadest part.

Portmanteau Word. (J.). A word, like post, which contains several meanings packed together; as, post (a state), post for letters, post paper, slow as a post, fast as a post, post-horses, and so on.

Portobello Arms. A public-house sign. The Mirror says: “In 1739, after the capture of Portobello, Admiral Vernon’s portrait dangled from every sign-post, and he may figuratively be said to have sold the ale, beer, porter, and purl of England for six years.” The Portobello Arms is a mere substitution for the admiral.

Portsooken Ward. (London). The taken or franchise at the port or gate. It was formerly a guild called the “English Knighten Guild,” because it was given by King Edgar to thirteen knights for services done by them. (See Knighten-Guild.)

Portuguese. (3 syl.). A native of Portugal, the language of Portugal, pertaining to Portugal, etc.; as Camoens was a Portuguese, and wrote in Portuguese.

Poser. The bishop’s examining chaplain; the examiner at Eton for the King’s College fellowship. (Welsh, posio, to examine; French, poser; Latin, ponere.) Hence, a puzzling question.

Posse. A whole posse of men. A large number; a crowd. (See next article.)
Posse Comitatus (Latin). Power of the county. The whole force of the county—that is, all the male members of a county over fifteen, who may be summoned by a sheriff to assist in preventing a riot, the rescue of prisoners, or other unlawful disorders. Clergymen, peers, and the infirm are exempt.

Posset properly means a drink taken before going to bed; it was milk curdled with wine.

"In his morning’s draught... his convives or cates... and when he goeth to bede his posset smoaking hot."—Man in the Moon (1543).

Post means placed. (Latin, positus.)

Post. A piece of timber placed in the ground.

A military post. A station where a man is placed, with instructions not to quit it without orders.

An official post is where a man is placed in office.

To post accounts is to place them under certain heads in methodical order.

(Turkish.)

Post haste. Travelling by relays of horses, or where horses are placed on the road to expedite the journey.

Post office. An office where letters are posted.

Post paper. So called from its water-mark, a post-horn, or a post-boy blowing his horn.

"The old original post (paper) with the stamp in the corner representing a post-boy riding for life and twanging his horn."—Mrs. Gaskell: Cranford, chap. 1.

Stiff as a post. That is, stiff [in the ground] like a gate-post.

To run your head against a post. To go to work heedlessly and stupidly, or as if you had no eyes.

Post Factum (Latin). After the act has been committed.

Post Meridian (Latin). After noon.

"Tres post meridian half-post four.
By signal 1 from Nancy parted."—Vimala: Six Songs

Post-mortem (Latin). After death; as a post-mortem examination for the purpose of ascertaining the cause of death.

Post-mortem Degree (A.). A degree after having failed at the poll.

"He had not even the merit of being a plodding man, and he finally took what used to be called a post-mortem degree."—My Rectors, p. 63.

Post Obit. An agreement to pay for a loan a larger sum of money, together with interest at death. (Latin post obitum, after the death of the person named in the bond.)

Poste Restante (French). To remain at the post till called for. In the British post-office letters so addressed are kept one month, and then returned to the writer.

Posted. Well posted up in the subject. Thoroughly informed. The metaphor is from posting up accounts, where one can see everything at a glance.

Poterio'si. An argument a poterio'si is one from effects to cause. Thus, to prove the existence of God a poterio'si, we take the works of creation and show how they manifest power, wisdom, goodness, and so on; and then we claim the inference that the maker of these things is powerful, wise, and good. Robinson Crusoe found the footprints of a man on the sand, and inferred that there must be a man on the island besides himself. (See Priori.)

Posthumus (Posthumus). Husband of Imogen. Under the erroneous persuasion of his wife’s infidelity, he plots her death, but his plot miscarries. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Posting-Bills. Before the Great Fire the space for foot-passengers in London was defended by rails and posts; the latter served for theatrical placards and general announcements, which were therefore called posters or posting-bills.

Posy properly means a copy of verses presented with a bouquet. It now means the verses without the flowers, as the "posy of a ring," or the flowers without the verses, as a "pretty posy."

"He could make anything in poetry, from the posy of a ring to the chronicle of the most heroic weaver."—Sedgewick: Victorian Novels (Lauder), p. 47.

Gone to pot. Ruined, gone to the bad. The allusion is to the pot into which refuse metal is cast to be remelted, or to be discarded as waste.

"Now and then a farm went to pot."—Dr. Arbuthnot.

The pot calls the kettle black. This is said of a person who accuses another of faults committed by himself. The French say, "The shovel mocks the poker." (La pelle se moque du fourgon).

To betray the pot to the玫瑰. To betray the rose pot—that is, the pot
Pot-boilers. Articles written for periodicals or publishers, and pictures of small merit drawn or painted for the sake of earning daily bread, or making the pot supply needed food.

Pot-luck. Come and take pot-luck with me. Come and take a family dinner at my house. The French pot au feu is the ordinary dinner of those who dine at home.

Pot Paper. A Dutch paper; so called from its bearing a pot as its water-mark.

Pot-Pourri (French). A mixture of dried sweet-smelling flower-petals and herbs preserved in a vase. Also a hotch-potch or olla podrida. In music, a medley of favourite tunes strung together. (See PASTICCIO.)

Potter. To go poking about, meddling and making, in a listless, purposeless manner. Pudder, pudding, potter, bother, and pudde are varieties of the same word. To puddle is to stir with a puddering-pole; hence, to confuse. Lear says of the tempest—"May the great gods that keep this dreadful pudder o'er our head," meaning confusion. To puddle iron is to stir it about with a puddering-pole.

Potwallopers, before the passing of the Reform Bill (1832), were those who claimed a vote because they had boiled their own pot in the parish for six months. (Saxon, wealde to boil; Dutch, opweelden; our wallop.)

Pot-au-feu. French for an Englishman.

Pot of Hospitality (The). The pot au feu which in Ireland used to be shared with anyone who dropped in at meal-times, or required refreshment.

Potage (Jean). The Jack Pudding of the French stage; very like the German "Hanswurst," the Dutch "Pickel herring," and the Italian "Macaro'ni."

Potato-bogle. So the Scotch call a scarecrow. The head of these bodbogies being a big potato or a turnip.

Potato-bury (A). A pit or trench for preserving potatoes for winter use. A turnip-bury is a similar pit for turnips.

Pota-to-talk. (German, Kartoffel gespräuch.) That chit-chat common in Germany at the five o'clock tea-drinkings, when neighbours of the "gentler sex" take their work to the house of muster and talk chiefly of the dainties of the table, their ingredients, admixture, and the methods of cooking them.

Potéen (pron. po-teen). Whisky that has not paid duty. (Irish poitin, diminutive of potte, a pot.)

Pother or Bother. Mr. Garnett states this to be a Celtic word, and says it often occurs in the Irish translations of the Bible, in the sense of to grieve or troubled in mind. (Greek, pætheo, to regret.)

Pothooks. The 77th Foot; so called because the two sevens resemble two pot-hooks. Now called the Second Battalion of the Middlesex Regiment. The first battalion is the old 57th.

Pot'iphæ's Wife. According to the Koran her name was Zuleika, but some Arabian writers call her Rall.

Pot. A Stock Exchange term, signifying the "North Staffordshire Railway stock." Of course, the word means "the potteries." (See STOCK EXCHANGE SLANG.)

Pound. The unit of weight (Latin, pondus, weight); also cash to the value of twenty shillings sterling, because in the Carlovingian period the Roman pound (twelve ounces) of pure silver was coined into 240 silver pence.
Pound of Flesh. The whole bargain, the exact terms of the agreement, the bond litteratim et verbatim. The allusion is to Shylock, in The Merchant of Venice, who bargained with Antonio for a "pound of flesh," but was foiled in his suit by Portia, who said the bond was expressly a pound of flesh, and therefore (1) the Jew must cut the exact quantity, neither more nor less than a just pound; and (2) in so doing he must not shed a drop of blood.

Poundtext (Peter). An "indulged pastor" with the Covenanters' army. (Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality.)

Poureaugnac (Monsieur de) (pron. Pou-eau-yak). A pompous country gentleman who comes to Paris to marry Julie, but the lady has a lover of her own choice, and Monsieur is so mystified and played upon by Julie and her ami de coeur that he relinquishes his suit in despair. (Molière: Poureaugnac.)

Poussin. The British Poussin, Richard Cooper, painter and engraver, well known for his Views of Windsor, (1806).

French Poussin. So Gaspard Dughet, the French painter, is called. (1613-1675.)

Pouting Place of Princes (The). Leicester Square is so called by Pennant, because George II., when Prince of Wales, having quarrelled with his father, retired to Leicester House; and his son Frederick, Prince of Wales, did the same, for the very same reason.

Poverty...Love. "When poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window." "Sine Cerere et Baccho friget Venus."

Powder. I'll powder your jacket for you. A corruption of pouder (to dust). (See Dust.)

"Le jour en pouder [must] ye schall dye For out of pouder first ye came Quoted by Halliwell under "Powder."

Nay, worth powder and shot, "Je ne jou vont pas la chandelure." The thing shot won't pay the cost of powder and shot.

Poyning's Law or Statute of Poyning (pron. Droo-dah). An Act of Parliament made in Ireland in 1495 (10 Henry VII., chap. 22), declaring all general statutes hitherto made in England to be in force in Ireland also. It received its name from Sir Edward Poyning, Lieutenant of Ireland at the time.

P.P., Clerk of this Parish. The name given to a volume of memoirs, written by Dr. Arbuthnot, as a satire on Bishop Burnet's Own Times.

Premonstratensian Monks. (See Premonstratensian.)

Preamunire. A barbarous word from the Latin præmunire (to be forewarned). The words of the writ begin "Preamunire Jurias A.B. ... i.e. 'Cause A.B. to be forewarned," to appear before us to answer the contempt wherewith he stands charged. If A.B. refuses to do so, he loses all civil rights, and before the reign of Elizabeth might have been slain by anyone with impunity.

Pragmatic Sanction. Sanctio in Latin means a "decree or ordinance with a penalty attached," or, in other words, a "penal statute." Pragmaticus means "relating to state affairs," so that Pragmatic Sanction is a penal statute bearing on some important question of state. The term was first applied by the Romans to those statutes which related to their provinces. The French applied the phrase to certain statutes which limited the jurisdiction of the Pope, but generally it is applied to an ordinance fixing the succession in a certain line.

Pragmatic Sanction of Charles VII. (of France), 1438, defining and limiting the power of the Pope in France. By this ordinance, the authority of a general council was declared superior to the dictum of the Pope; the clergy were forbidden to appeal to Rome on any point affecting the secular condition of the nation; and the Roman pontiff was forbidden to appropriate a vacant benefice, or to appoint either bishop or parish priest.

Pragmatic Sanction of St. Louis, 1268, forbade the court of Rome to levy taxes or collect subscriptions in France without the express sanction of the king. It also gave plaintiffs in the ecclesiastical courts the right to appeal to the civil courts. The "Constitutions of Clarendon" were to England what the "Pragmatic Sanction" was to France.

Pragmatic Sanction of Germany, 1713. Whereby the succession of the empire was made hereditary in the female line, in order to transmit the crown to Maria Theresa, the daughter of Charles VI.

This is emphatically the Pragmatic Sanction, unless some qualifying word or date is added to restrict it to some other instrument.
Prairie Fever

Prairie Fever. An enthusiastic love of prairie life, which seems to be part of our being, to strengthen our strength, invigorate our spirit, and endow us with new life.

Praying-wheels. It is said that the Buddhists pray by machinery; that they put prayers into a wheel, and unroll them by the length. This notion arises from a misconception. Saky-a-muni, the Buddha, is said to have turned the wheel of the law—i.e. to have preached Buddhism incessantly. We should say as a horse in a mill.

Pre-Raphaelites. A term introduced by Hunt and his friends, who wished to intimate that they preferred the simplicity and truthfulness of the painters who preceded Raphael. The term now signifies a very minute imitation of nature, brilliant colouring, and not much shadow.

Preacher. Solomon, the author of Ecclesiastes (the Preacher).

Précieuses Ridicules. In Molière's comedy so called. Amintore and Polixène, who assume the airs of the Hôtel de Rambouillet, a coterie of savants of both sexes in the seventeenth century. The members of this society were termed précieux—i.e. "persons of distinguished merit"—and the précieux ridicules means a ridiculous aspersion of their ways and manners.

Precioso. The heroine of Longfellow's Spanish Student, threatened with the vengeance of the Inquisition.

Precious Stones. (1) Each month, according to the Poles, is under the influence of a precious stone:

* The ancients divided precious stones into male and female. The darker stones were called the male, and the light ones called the females. Male saphires
Preocuous means ripened by the sun before it has attained its full growth; premature; a development of mind or body beyond one's age. (Latin, praecox.)

"Many precocious trees, and such as have their spring in winter, may be found." —Brown.

Prelate means simply a man preferred, a man promoted to an ecclesiastical office which gives him jurisdiction over other clergymen. Cardinals, bishops, abbots, and archdeacons were at one time so called, but the term is restricted in the Protestant Church to bishops. (Latin, prelatus, prelatus.)

Preliminary Canter (A). Metaphorically, means something which precedes the real business in hand. The reference is to the preliminary canter of horses before the race itself begins.

"The real business of the session commenced last night. Everything that has preceded the introduction of this measure has been a preliminary canter." —Newspaper paragraph, April 14th, 1884

Premier Pas. Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte. Pythagoras used to say, "The beginning is half the whole." "Prete Dominium factest coram." —Ammianus. "Dominium facti, qui curat, habet." —Horace. "Well begun is half done." ?

? The reverse of these proverbs is: "C'est le plus difficile que d'éviter la queue."

Presbommezian or Norbertine Order. Founded in the twelfth century by St. Norbert, who obtained permission, in 1120, to found a cloister in the diocese of Laon, in France. A spot was pointed out to him in a vision, and he named the spot Pré Montré or Pratum Monstratium (the meadow pointed out). The order might be called the reformed Augustine, or the White canons of the rule of St. Augustine.

Prendre un Rat par la Queue. To pick a pocket. This proverb is very old—it was popular in the reign of Louis XIII.

Prepense (2 syll.) Malevol prepense is malevol designed or before deliberated. (Latin, praepensum.)

Preponderous means "the cart before the horse." (Latin, praeporrect, the first last and the last first.)

Presbyterian. (See Blue.)

Prescott. A waistcoat. Rhyming slang. (See Chivy.)

Press-men and Press-money do not mean money given to impress men into the service and men so impressed; but ready money, and men ready for service. When a recruit has received the money, he binds himself to be ready for service whenever his attendance is required. Similarly, a press-gang is a gang to get ready men. (Old French prest, now prê; Italian presto.)

Prester John, according to Mande ville, a lineal descendant of Ogier the Dane. This Ogier penetrated into the north of India, with fifteen barons of his own country, among whom he divided the land. John was made sovereign of Teneduc, and was called Prester because he converted the natives. Another tradition says he had seventy kings for his vassals, and was seen by his subjects only three times in a year. In Much Ado about Nothing, Benedick says:—

"I will fetch you a tooth-pickcr from the fairest mouth of Asia, bring you the fourth of Prester John's foot, fetch on a hair off the great Cham's beard, rather than hold three words' conference with this harpy." —Act II. i.

Prester John (in Orlando Furioso, bk. xvii.), called by his subjects Senap'pus, King of Ethiopia. He was blind. Though the richest monarch of the world, he pinned "in plenty's lap with a less famine," for whenever his table was spread hell-born harpies flew away with the food. This was in punishment of his great pride and impidity in wishing to add Paradise to his dominion. The plague was to cease "when a stranger came to his kingdom on a winged horse." Astolpho came on his flying griffin, and with his magic horn chased the harpies into Cocytus. The king sent 100,000 Nubians to the aid of Charlemagne; they were provided with horses by Astolpho, who threw stones into the air, which became steeds fully equipped (bk. xviii.) and were transported to France by Astolpho, who filled his hands with leaves, which he cast into the sea, and they instantly became ships (bk. xix.). When Agramant was dead, the Nubians were sent back to their country, and the ships turned to leaves and the horses to stones again.
Prestige. This word has a strangely metamorphosed meaning. The Latin prestigia means juggling tricks, hence prestidigitation (French), one who juggles with his fingers. We use the word for that favourable impression which results from good antecedents. The history of the change is this: Juggling tricks were once considered a sort of enchantment; to enchant is to charm, and to charm is to win the heart.

Presto. Quick. A name given to Swift by the Duchess of Shrewsbury, a foreigner. Of course, the pun is obvious: presto means swift (or quick).

Preston and his Mastiffs. To oppose Preston and his mastiffs is to be foolhardy, to resist what is irresistible. Christopher Preston established the Bear Garden at Hackley-in-the-Hole in the time of Charles II. The Bible says he employs the sword “shall perish by the sword,” and Preston was killed in 1709 by one of his own bears.

“... I'd as good oppose Myself to Preston and his mastiffs house,”

Pretender. The Old Pretender. James F. E. Stuart, son of James II. (1684-1766.)

The Young Pretender. Charles Edward Stuart, son of the “Old Pretender.” (1720-1788.)

“God bless the king, I mean the faith's defender:
God bless no man in his way—the Pretender.
Who that Pretender is, and who is king—
God bless us all! that's quite another thing.”
John Browne.

Pretenders. Tanyoxarkés, in the time of Cumby'ses, King of Persia, pretended to be Smerdis; but one of his wives felt his head while he was asleep, and discovered that he had no ears.

Lambert Simnel and Perkin Warbeck, in the reign of Henry VIII.

Otreffe, a monk, pretended to be Demetrius, younger son of Czar Ivan Basilowitz II., murdered by Boris in 1588. In 1605 Demetrius “the False” became Czar, but was killed at Moscow the year following, in an insurrection.

Pre'text. A pretence. From the Latin pretexit, a dress embroidered in the front worn by the Roman magistrates, priests, and children of the aristocracy between the age of thirteen and seventeen. The pretexitae were dramas in which actors personated those who wore the pretexita; hence persons who pretend to be what they are not.

Prettyman (Priner), who figures sometimes as a fisherman's son, and sometimes as a prince, to gain the heart of Cloris. (Buckingham: The Rehearsed.)

Prevarication. The Latin word varice is to straddle, and prevaricari to zigzag or crooked. The verb, says Pliny, was first applied to men who ploughed crooked ridges, and afterwards to men who gave crooked answers in the law courts, or deviated from the straight line of truth. (See Delirium.)

Prevent. Precede, anticipate. (Latin pra-veni, to go before.) And as what goes before us may hinder us, so prevent means to hinder or keep back.

“... My eyes prevent the night watches.”—Psalm CXXX. 10.

“Prevent us, O Lord, in all our doings.”—Common Prayer Book.

Previous Question. (See Question.)

Pri'am. King of Troy when that city was sacked by the allied Greeks. His wife's name was Hecuba; she was the mother of nineteen children, the eldest of whom was Hector. When the gate of Troy was blown open by the Greeks concealed in the Wooden Horse, Pyrrhos, the son of Achilles, slew the aged Priam. (*See Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Eneid.)

Pr'smond. Son of Ag'apē, a fairy. He was very daring, and fought on foot with battle-axe and spear. He was slain by Cambalo. (Spenser's Faerie Queene, bk. iv.). (See Diamond.)

Priapos, in classical mythology, is a hideous, sensuous, disgusting deity, the impersonation of the principle of fertility. (See Baal Peor, etc.)

Prick-eared. So the Roundheads were called, because they covered their heads with a black skull-cap drawn down tight, leaving the ears exposed.

Prick the Garter. (See Fast and Loose.)

Pride, meaning ostentation, finery, or that which persons are proud of. Spenser talks of “lofty trees yclead in summer's pride” (verdure). Pope, of a “sword whose ivory sheath [was] inwrought with envious pride” (ornamentation); and in this sense the word is used by Jacques in that celebrated passage—

“... Why, who cares out on pride [dress]
That can thereon tax any private party?
What woman in the city do I name
When that I say 'the city woman bears
The cost of princes on unworthy shoulders?'

. . . What is he of lesser function
That says his bravery [finery] is not of my cost?”—Shakespeare: As You Like It, II. 7.
Fly pride, says the peacock, proverbial for pride. (Shakespeare: Comedy ofErrors, iv. 3.) The pot calling the kettle "black face."

Sir Pride. First a drayman, then a colonel in the Parliamentary army. (Butler: Hudibras.)

Pride of the Morning. That early mist or shower which promises a fine day. The Morning is too proud to come out in her glory all at once—so the proud beauty being thwarted weeps and pouts awhile. Kedle uses the phrase in a different sense when he says:—

"Pride of the dewy day.
The swain's experienced eye
Perceives takes timely warning,
Nor trusts the gorgeous sky.
Kedle: 5th Sunday after Trinity."

Pride's Purge. The Long Parliament, not proving itself willing to condemn Charles I., was purged of its unruly members by Colonel Pride, who entered the House with two regiments of soldiers, imprisoned sixty members, drove one hundred and sixty out into the streets, and left only sixty of the most compliant.

Pridwen. The name of Prince Arthur's shield.

"he begge an his swere [neck] 4me scold dore, His home on Brutiss [in British] Pridwen thate [called]."
Layamon: Brut (twelfth century).

Pridwin. Same as pridwen. This shield had represented on it a picture of the Virgin.

"the temper of his sword, the trial: 'Kenneth.' The handsome and the length of 'Rom,' its noble speeck. With 'Pridwin,' his great shield, and what the proof could bear."—Bunyan Priest . . . Knight. I would rather walk with Sir Priest than Sir Knight. I prefer peace to strife.

Priest of the Blue-bag. A barrister. A blue-bag is a cant name for a barrister. (See Barrister's Bag.)

"he [Prynn] had twice pleased his own cause, without help of attorney, and showed himself as practised in every law quibble, as if he had been a regularly ordained priest of the blue-bag."—C. Kingsley: Alton Locke, chap xx.

Prig. A coxcomb, a conceited person, probably the Anglo-Saxon prynt or prynd.

Prix. To flinch or steal. Also a pickpocket or thief. The clown calls At tol' yee a "prig that haunts wakes, fairs, and bear - baitings." (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.)

In Scotch, to priug means to cheapen, or blunder over the price asked: progin means cheapening.

Prima Donna (Italian). A first-class lady; applied to public singers.

Prima Facie (Latin). At first sight. A prima facie case is a case or statement which, without minute examination into its merits, seems plausible and correct.

It would be easy to make out a strong prima facie case but I should advise the more cautious policy of andra beatum partem

Primary Colours. (See COLOURS.)

Prime (I syl.). In the Catholic Church the first canonical hour after Mass. Milton terms sunrise "that sweet hour of prime." (Paradise Lost, bk. v. 170.)

All night long . . . came the sound of chanting . . . as the monks sang the service of matins, lauds, and prime."—Shakespeare: John Ingomart, chap i. p. 10.

Primed. Full and ready to deliver a speech. We say of a man whose head is full of his subject, "He is primed to the muzzle." Of course, the allusion is to firearms.

Primero. A game at cards.

'I left him at primero with the Duke of Suffolk.'—Shakespeare: Henry VIII, ii. 2

... Four cards were dealt to each player, the principal groups being flush, prime, and point. Flushed was the same as 'poker'; prime was a card of each suit, and point was reckoned as a 'pajek.'—Culpepper: Of Games, p. 550.

Primitive Fathers (The). The five Christian fathers supposed to be contemporary with the Apostles: viz., Clement of Rome (30-102); Barnabas, cousin of Mark the Evangelist, and schoolfellow of Paul the Apostle; Hermas, author of The Shepherd; Ignatius, martyred A.D. 115; and Polycarp (85-169).

The first two Epistles to the Corinthians are probably by Clement Romote, but everything else ascribed to him is undoubtedly spurious.

The epistle ascribed to Barnabas is of very doubtful authenticity. Hermas.—It is very doubtful whether this is a proper name at all, and, if a proper name, many think it ir a Roman in the second century, brother of Paul. Polycarp, some say, was a pupil of John the Evangelist, by whom he was made Bishop of Smyrna, addressed in the Revelation; but if the Revelation was written in 96, Polycarp was not eleven years old at the time, and could not possibly have been a bishop. It is extremely doubtful whether he knew the Evangelist at all, and certainly he did not know either the Fourth Gospel or the Book of the Revelation.

Primrose (George). Son of the worthy Vicar of Wakefield. He went to Amsterdam to teach the people English, but forgot that he could not do so till he knew something of Dutch himself. (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Moses Primrose. Brother of the above, noted for giving in barter a good horse for a gross of worthless green spectacles with copper rims and shagreen cases. (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Mrs. Deborah Primrose. Mother of the above; noted for her motherly vanity, her skill in housewifery, and her desire to be genteel. Her wedding gown is a standing simile for things that "wear well." Her daughters' names are Olivia and Sophia. (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

The Rev. Dr. Primrose. Husband of Mrs. Deborah, and Vicar of Wakefield. As simple-minded and unskilled in the world as Goldsmith himself, unacceptably pious, and beloved by all who knew him. (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Primrose. A curious corruption of the French prunier roule, Italian prim-ercola, compounds of the Latin prima ræva (first spring flower). Chaucer calls the word prunier, which is a contraction of the Italian primera. The flower is no rose at all.

Primum Mobile. In the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, was the tenth (not ninth) sphere, supposed to revolve from east to west in twenty-four hours, carrying with it all the other spheres. The eleven spheres are: (1) Diana or the Moon, (2) Mercury, (3) Venus, (4) Apollo or the Sun, (5) Mars, (6) Jupiter, (7) Saturn, (8) the starry sphere or that of the fixed stars, (9) the crystalline, (10) the primum mobile, and (11) the empyrean. Ptolemy himself acknowledged only the first nine; the two latter were devised by his disciples. The motion of the crystalline, according to this system, causes the precession of the equinoxes, its axis being that of the ecliptic. The motion of the primum mobile produces the alternation of day and night; its axis is that of the equator, and its extremities the poles of the heavens.

"They move the planets seven, and pass the 'fixed' [starry] sphere," And that [crystalline sphere] . . . and that: First-Moved." Milton: Paradise Lost, III. 54.

Primum Mobile is figuratively applied to that machine which communicates motion to several others; and also to persons and ideas suggestive of complicated systems. Socrates was the primum mobile of the Dialectic, Megaric, Cyrenaic, and Cynic systems of philosophy.

Primus. The archbishop, or rather "presiding bishop," of the Episcopal Church of Scotland. He is elected by the other six bishops, and presides in Convocation, or meetings relative to church matters.

Prince. The Latin principes formed one of the great divisions of the Roman infantry; so called because they were originally the first to begin the fight. After the Haast'i were instituted, this privilege was transferred to the new division.

Prince. (See Black.) Prince of alchemy. Rudolph II., Emperor of Germany, also called The German Hermes Trismegistus.

Prince of wits. Samuel Pepys, noted for his gossiping Diary, commencing January 1st, 1659, and continued for nine years. (1632-1703.)

Prince of grammarians. (See Gramarians.)

Prince of Peace. The Messiah (Isaiah ix. 6). Prince of the Power of the Air. Satan (Eph. ii. 2).

Prince of the vegetable kingdom. So Linnaeus calls the palm-tree.

Prince of Wales. (The). This title arose thus: When Edward I. subdued Wales, he promised the Welsh, if they would lay down their arms, that he would give them a native prince. His queen having given birth to a son in Wales, the new-born child was entitled Edward, Prince of Wales: and ever since then the eldest son of the British sovereign has retained the title.

Prince of Wales Dragon Guards. The 3rd Dragon Guards.

Prince Rupert's Drops. Drops of molten glass, consolidated by falling into water. Their form is that of a tumpole. The thick end may be hammered pretty smartly without its breaking, but if the smallest portion of the thin end is nipped off, the whole flies into fine dust with explosive violence. These toys, if not invented by Prince Rupert, were introduced by him into England.

Prince's Peers. A term of contempt applied to peers of low birth. The son of Charles VII. of France (afterwards Louis XI.), in order to weaken the influence of the aristocracy, created a host of ruff-raff peers, such as tradesmen, farmers, and mechanics, who were tools in his hands.

Princix or Princocks. (Probably from prince and cock.) Capulet calls Tybalt a princix, or wilful spoilt boy. (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.)

Prink. She was prinked in all her finery. Adorned. Prink and prank. Dutch prunken, to make a show; German prangen, Danish prange, Swedish pranka.

Printer's Devil. The newest apprentice lad in the press-room, whose duty it is to run errands, and to help the pressmen.

Printing used to be called the Black Art, and the boys who assisted the pressmen were called imps. (See under Devil.)

Printers' Marks.
? is 2— that is, the first and last letters of question (question).
! is !. Io in Latin is the interjection of joy.
§ is a Greek p (φ), the initial letter of paragraph.
* is used by the Greek grammarians to arrest attention to something striking (asterisk or star).
† is used by the Greek grammarians to indicate something objectionable (obelisk or dagger).
(See Marks in Grammar.)

Printing. (See Em.)
* It is a mistake to suppose that Caxton (1471) was the first printer in England. A book has been accidentally discovered with the date 1478 (Oxford). The Rev. T. Wilson says, "The press at Oxford existed ten years before there was any press in Europe, except those at Haarlem and Mentz. The person who set up the Oxford press was Corsellis."

Prio'ri. An argument a priori is one from cause to effect. To prove the existence of God a priori, you must show that every other hypothesis is more unlikely, and therefore this hypothesis is the most likely. All mathematical proofs are of this kind. (See Posteriori.)

Priscian's Head. To break Priscian's head (in Latin, "Domunaudy Prasianci caput"). To violate the rules of grammar. Priscian was a great grammarian of the fifth century, whose name is almost synonymous with grammar.

"Priscian's head is often bruised without remorse."—P. Thompson.

"And held an aim so deeply red
As that of breaking Priscian's head."
Bosler: Hadriana, p. 112.

Priscil'tianists. Followers of Priscillian, a Spaniard; an heretical sect which sprang up in Spain in the fourth century. They were a branch of the Manicheans.

Prisoner at the Bar. The prisoner in the dock, who is on his trial; so called because anciently he stood at the bar which separated the barristers from the common pleaders.

Prisoner of Chillon. François de Bonnivard, a Frenchman confined for six years in the dungeon of the Château de Chillon, by Charles III. of Savoy. Lord Byron, in his poem so called, has welded together this incident with Dante's Count Ugo di Vico. (See CHILLON.)

Prithu. The favourite hero of the Indian Purānas. Vena having been slain for his wickedness, and leaving no offspring, the saints rubbed his right arm, and the friction brought forth Prithu. Being told that the earth had suspended for a time its fertility, Prithu went forth to punish it, and the Earth, under the form of a cow, fled at his approach; but being unable to escape, promised that in future "seed-time and harvest should never fail."

Prin'li. Senator of Venice, noted for his unbending pride, and his unnatural harshness to his daughter Belvide'ra. (Othway: Venice Preserved.)

Privolva'ns. The antagonists of the Subvolvans, in S. Butler's satirical poem called The Elephant in the Moon.

"These, only wanting Privolvans
Have every summer their campaigns,
And muster like the warring sons of raw head and of bloody homes."

v. 35 etc.

Privy Council. The council chosen by the sovereign to administer public affairs. It consists of the Royal Family, the two Primates, the Bishop of London, the great officers of State, the Lord Chancellor and Judges of the Courts of Equity, the Chief Justices of the Courts of Common Law, the Judge Advocate, some of the Puine Judges, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Ambassadors, Governors of Colonies, Commander-in-Chief, Master-General of the Ordnance, First Lord of the Admiralty, Vice-President of the Board of Trade, Paymaster of the Forces, President of the Poor-law Board, etc. etc.; a committee of which forms the Cabinet or Ministry. The number of neither the Privy Council nor Cabinet is fixed, but the latter generally includes about fifteen or sixteen gentlemen specially qualified to advise on different departments of state business. Much of the business of the Privy Council is performed by Boards or subdivisions, as the Board of Trade, the Board of Quarantine, the Committee of Council on Education, etc.

Privy Seal. The seal which the sovereign uses in proof of assent to a document. In matters of minor importance it is sufficient to pass the privy seal, but instruments of greater moment must have the great seal also.
Pro and Con. (Latin). For and against. "Con." is a contraction of contra.

Pro Tanto. As an instalment, good enough as far as it goes, but not final; for what it is worth.

"I heard Mr. Parnell accept the Bill of 1866 as a measure that would close the differences between the two countries; but since then he stated that he had accepted it as a pro tanto measure. . . . It was a parliamentary bet, and he hoped to make future amendments on it."—Mr. Chamberlain’s speech, April 10th, 1863.

Pro Tempore (3 syl.). Temporarily; for the time being, till something is permanently settled. Contracted into pro tem.

Probate of a Will. A certified copy of a will by an officer whose duty it is to attest it. The original is retained in the court registry, and executors act on the proved copy. Anyone may see an official copy of any will at the registry office on payment of a shilling.

Probate. I must prove that matter to the bottom—must narrowly examine into it. The allusion is to a surgeon probing a wound, or searching for some extraneous substance in the body.

Probole (3 syl.), as applied to Jesus Christ, is this: that He was divine only because He was divinely begotten; in fact, He was a shoot of the divine stem. This heterodox notion was combated by Irenæus, but was subsequently revived by Montanists and Tertullian. The word is properly applied to the process of a bone—that is, a bone growing out of a normal bone. (Greek, pro-ballo.)

Procès-Verbal. A minute and official statement of some fact.

"We (say the procès-verbal) asked him what use he had made of the pistol (i.e. We, says the official report, etc.)"—The Times (Law Report).

Procession of the Black Breeches. This is the heading of a chapter in Vol. II of Carlyle’s French Revolution. The chapter contains a description of the mob procession, headed by Santerre carrying a pair of black satin breeches on a pole. The mob forced its way into the Tuileries on June 20th, 1792, and presented the king (Louis XVI.) with the bonnet rouge and a tricolour cockade.

Proclaim on the Housetop. To proclaim or make known to everyone: to blab in public. Dr. John says that the ancient Jews “ascended their roofs to announce anything to the multitude, to pray to God, and to perform sacrifices” (Matt. x. 27).

"No secret can escape being proclaimed from the housetop."—London Review.

Proclivity. His proclivities are all evil. His tendencies or propensities have a wrong bias. The word means down-hill tendency. (Latin, proclivitas.)

Procurs. Wearing as the dart of Procurs. When Procurs fled from Cephalus out of shame, Diana gave her a dog that never failed to secure its prey, and a dart which not only never missed aim, but which always returned of its own accord to the shooter. (See CEPHALUS.)

Procrustean. Pertaining to Procrustes, and his mode of procedure. (See above.)

Prodigal. Festus says the Romans called victims wholly consumed by fire prodigia hostiae (victims proddigalised), and adds that those who waste their substance are therefore called prodigals. This derivation can hardly be considered correct. Prodigal is pro-ug or prod-ug (to drive forth), and persons who had spent all their patrimony were “driven forth” to be sold as slaves to their creditors.

Prodigal (The). Albert VI., Duke of Austria. (1418-1463.)

Prodigy. The prodigy of France. Guillaume Budé; so called by Erasmus. (1467-1540.)

The prodigy of learning. Samuel Hahnemann, the German, was so called by J. Paul Richter. (1745-1843.)

Profane means literally before the temple (Latin, profanum). Those persons who came to the temple and were not initiated were called profane by the Romans.

Profile (2 syl.) means shown by a thread. (Italian, profilo; Latin, filum, a thread.) A profile is an outline. In sculpture or painting it means to give the contour or side-face.

Profound (The). Richard Middleton, theologian. (* 1604.)
Promethean. Capable of producing fire; pertaining to Prometheus (q.v.).

Promethean Fire. The vital principle; the fire with which Prometheus quickened into life his clay images. (See Prometheus.)

"I know not where is that Promethean heat That can thy life relieve."

Promethean Unguent (The). Made from a herb on which some of the blood of Prometheus (3 syl.) had fallen. Medea gave Jason some of this unguent, which rendered his body proof against fire and warlike instruments.

Prometheus. The first invention which developed into Bryant and May's "safety matches." They were originally made in 1805 by Chancel, a French chemist, who tipped cedar splints with paste of chlorate of potash and sugar. On dipping one of these matches into a little bottle containing asbestos wetted with sulphuric acid, it burst into flame on drawing it out. It was not introduced into England till after the battle of Waterloo. (See Hugh Perry.)

Promise of Odin (The). The most binding of all promises to a Scandinavian. In making this promise the person passed his hand through a massive silver ring kept for the purpose; or through a sacrificial stone, like that called the "Circle of Sennin."

"I will bind myself to you... by the promise of Odin, the most sacred of our northern rites." — W. Scott: The Parel, chap. xxii.

Promised Land or Land of Promise. Canaan; so called because God promised Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob that their offspring should possess it.

Proco'sia (in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her wisdom.

Proof. A printed sheet to be examined and approved before it is finally printed. The first proof is that which contains all the workman's errors; when these are corrected the impression next taken is called a clean proof and is submitted to the author; the final impression, which is corrected by the reader ad unguem, is termed the press proof.

Proof Prints. The first impressions of an engraving. India-proofs are those taken off on India-paper. Proofs before lettering are those taken off before the plate is sent to the writing engraver. After the proofs the orders of merit are —(1) the prints which have the letters only in outline; (2) those in which the letters are shaded with a black line; (3) those in which some slight ornament is introduced into the letters; (4) those in which the letters are filled up quite black.

Proof Spirit. A mixture of equal parts (by weight) of alcohol and water. The proof of spirit consists in little bubbles or beads which appear on the top of the liquor after agitation. When any mixture has more alcohol than water it is called over proof, and when less it is termed under proof.

Proshan Blue (My). A term of great endearment. After the battle of Waterloo the Prussians were immensely popular in England, and in connection with the Loyal True Blue Club gave rise to the toasts: "The True Blue" and the "Prussian Blue." Sam Weller addresses his father as "Vell, my Proshan Blue."

Propagan’d’a. The name given to the "congregation" de propaganda fide, established at Rome by Gregory XV. in 1622, for propagating throughout the world the Roman Catholic religion. Any institution for making religious or political proselytes.

Proper Names used as Common Nouns.

- Ubaldus — terrible
- Damns — imaginative
- Enron — fabulous
- Le Sagre — humorous
- Mathe — comic
- Montaque — thoughtful
- Burbon — noble
- Roussein — amorous
- Victor Hugo — incoherent
- Zola — incoherent

Zola's name was used in the manner of 2 - the French poet.

Property Plot (Th). In theatrical language, means a list of all the "properties" or articles which will be required in the play produced. Such as the bell, when Mercia says, "He bell invites me;" the knock, when it is said, "Heard you that knocking?" tables, chairs, banquet, tankards, etc., etc.

Prophecy upon Velvet (To). To prophesy what is already a known fact. Thus, the issue of a battle flashed to an individual may, by some chance, get to the knowledge of a "sibyl," who may secretly prophesy the issue to others; but such a prediction would be a prophecy on velvet: it goes on velvet slippers without fear of stumbling.

"If one of those three had spoken the news over again. . . . the old lady for sibyll prophesies upon velvet." — Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, Ch. xxi.

Prophet (Th). Mahomet is so called. (570-632.)

The Koran says there have been 200,000 prophets, only six of whom have brought new laws or dispensations; Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mahomet. The Prophet. Joachim, Abbot of Ficore. (1130-1202.)

Prophet of the Syrants, Ephraem Syrus (4th century).

The Great Prophets. Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; so called because their writings are more extensive than the prophecies of the other twelve.

The Minor or Lesser Prophets. Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Micah, Jonah, Nahum, Habakuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi; so called because their writings are less extensive than those of the four Great Prophets.

Prophetess (Th). Ay-e-yashah, the second wife of Mahomet; so called, not because she had any gift of prophecy, but simply because she was the favourite wife of the "prophet;" she was, therefore, emphatically "Mrs. Prophet."

Propositions, in logic, are of four kinds, called A, E, I, O. "A" is a universal affirmative, and "E" a universal negative; "I" a particular affirmative, and "O" a particular negative.

- Assent A, noli E, venire genti orbis amisce.
- Assent I, noli O, sed partem audenti amisce.

A assents and E denies some universal proposition.

I assents and O denies, but with particular precision.

Props, in theatrical slang, means properties, of which it is a contraction. Everything stored in a theatre for general use on the stage is a "prop," but these stores are the manager's props. An actor's "props" are the clothing and other articles which he provides for his own use on the stage. In many good theatres, the manager provides everything but tights and a few minor articles; but in minor theatres each actor must provide a wardrobe and properties.

Prorogae (2 syl.). The Parliament was prorogued. Dismissed for the holidays, or suspended for a time. (Latin, pro-rogare, to prolong.) If dismissed entirely it is said to be "dissolved."

Pro's. Professionals—that is, actors by profession.

- "A big crowd slowly gathers."
- "And stretches across the street,"
- "The put door opens sharply,"
- "And I hear the trumping feet."
- "And the quiet pro's pure upward."
- "To the stage-door up the court."

Sims: Ballads of Babylon; Forgotten, etc.
Proscenium. The front part of the stage, between the drop-curtain and orchestra. (Greek, proskenion; Latin, prosēnēnum.)

Proscription. A sort of hue and cry: so called because among the Romans the names of the persons proscribed were written out, and the tablets bearing their names were fixed up in the public forum, sometimes with the offer of a reward for those who should aid in bringing them before the court. If the proscripted did not answer the summons, their goods were confiscated and their persons outlawed. In this case the name was engraved on brass or marble, the offence stated, and the tablet placed conspicuously in the market-place.

Prose means straightforward speaking or writing (Latin, oratio proem—i.e., proferens), in opposition to foot-bound speaking or writing, oratio enuclea (fettered speech—i.e., poetry).

Prose. Il y a plus de vrai ans que je dis de la prose, sans que j'en susse rien. I have known this these twenty years without being conscious of it. (Molière: Le Bourgeoys Gentilhomme.)

"Really," exclaimed Lady Ambrose brightly, "It y a plus devint, mais que je dis de la prose, sans que j'en susse rien." And so it seems that I have known history without suspecting it. Just as Mons Jourdain talked prose. (Molière: The New Republic, bk iii. chap. 2.)

Father of Greek prose. Herodotos (b.c. 484-404).

Father of English prose. Wycliffe (1324-1384) and Roger Ascham (1515-1568).

Father of French prose. Villlehardouin (1167-1213).

Proselutes (3 syll.) among Jewish writers were of two kinds—viz. "The proselyte of righteousness" and the "stranger of the gate." The former submitted to circumcision and conformed to the laws of Moses. The latter abstained from offering sacrifice to heathen gods, and from working on the Sabbath. "The stranger that is within thy gate" = the stranger of the gate.

"I must confess that his society was at first irksome; but... I now have hope that he may become a stranger of the gate."—Bland the Pilgrim, ch. in.

Prosperina or Pros'erpine (3 syll.), One day, as she was amusing herself in the meadows of Sicily, Pluto seized her and carried her off in his chariot to the infernal regions for his bride. In her terror she dropped some of the lilies she had been gathering, and they turned to daffodils.

"O Prosperina, for the flowers now, that frightened thou left at fall. From Dis's waggon! daffodills. That came before the swallow darts, and take The winds of March with beauty."—Shakespeare: A Winter's Tale, iv. 1.

Prosperine's Divine Calidore. Sleep. In the beautiful legend of Cupid and Psyche, by Apuleius, after Psyche had long wandered about searching for her lost Cupid, she is sent to Prosperine for "the casket of divine beauty," which she was not to open till she came into the light of day. Psyche received the casket, but just as she was about to step on earth, she thought how much more Cupid would love her if she was divinely beautiful; so she opened the casket and found the calidore it contained was sleep, which instantly filled all her limbs with drowsiness, and she slept as it were the sleep of death.

This is the very perfection of allegory. Of course, sleep is the only beautifier of the weary and heart-sick, and this calidore Psyche found before Cupid again came to her.

Prosperity Robinson. Viscount Goderich, Earl of Ripon, Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1823. In 1825 he boasted in the House of the prosperity of the nation, and his boast was not yet cold when the great financial crisis occurred. It was Cobbett who gave him the name of "Prosperity Robinson."

Pros'pero. Rightful Duke of Milan, deposed by his brother. Drifted on a desert island, he practised magic, and raised a tempest in which his brother was shipwrecked. Ultimately Prospero broke his wand, and his daughter married the son of the King of Naples. (Shakespeare: Tempest.)

Protag'oras of Abde'ra. The first who took the name of "Sophist." (b.c. 480-411.)

Prote'an. Having the aptitude to change its form; ready to assume different shapes. (See Proteus.)

Protectionist. One who advocates the imposition of import duties, to "protect" home produce or manufactures.

Protesilaos. In Fénélon's Télémaque, is meant to represent Louvois, the French Minister of State.

Protestant. One of the party who adhered to Luther at the Reformation. These Lutherans, in 1529, "protested" against the decree of Charles V. of Germany, and appealed from the Diet of Spire to a general council. A Protestant now means one of the Reformed Church.

Protestant Pope. Clement XIV.

Proteus (pron. Pro'teas). As many shapes as Proteus—i.e., full of shifts, aliases, disguises, etc. Proteus was Neptune's herdsman, an old man and a prophet. He lived in a vast cave, and his custom was to tell over his hordes of sea-calves at noon, and then to sleep. There was no way of catching him but by stealing upon him during sleep, which was all the breaks his eyes and ears allowed him; if not so captured, he would elude anyone who came to consult him by changing his shape, for he had the power of changing it in an instant into any form he chose.

The changeable Proteus, whose prophetic mind The secret cause of much of this diversity, Attending, left the haunts, his eyes, no charge, To waze the latter words found at last."

COTT, Laced. VI.

Proteus. One of the two gentlemen of Verona; his serving-man is Launce. Valentine is the other gentleman, whose serving-man is Speed. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Prothalamion. Marriage song by Edmund Spenser, peculiarly exquisite—probably the noblest ever sung.

Protestant. The first martyr. Stephen the deacon is so called (Acts V. vii.).

Protocol. The first rough draft or original copy of a despatch, which is to form the basis of a treaty. (Greek, proto-kōleon, a sheet glued to the front of a manuscript, and bearing an abstract of the contents and purport. (Har-molous Barbraes.)

Protoplasam, Sarcode. The material or cells of which all living things are built up. Each is a jelly-like substance, the former being the nucleus of plants and the latter of animals. Max Schultz proved the identity of these substances.

"Protoplasam is not a simple but a complicated structure, sometimes called a "colony of plaques," or nuclear granules. (Greek, proto-plasma, the first model; proto-sarcoïdes, the first flesh-like entity.)"

Prozena. The lowest class of animal life (Greek, protos zoën). In a figurative sense, a young aspirant for literary honours: "They were young intellectual protozoa."

Proud. Otho IV., Emperor of Germany. (1175, 1209-1218.)

Tarquin II. of Rome. Superbus. (Reigned B.C. 335-310, died 490.)

The proud Duke. Charles Seymour, Duke of Somerset. He would never suffer his children to sit in his presence, and would never speak to his servants except by signs. (Died 1748.)

Proud as Lucifer; proud as a peacock.

Proud'stane. (Oliver). A boasting bonnet-maker of Perth. His widow is Magdalen or Maudie. (Sir Walter Scott: Fair Maid of Perth.)

Prou. (See under Father.)

Province means a country previously conquered. (Latin, pro vinc.)

Provincial. Like or in the manner of those who live in the provinces. Provincial of an Order. The superior of all the monastic houses of a province.

Prudent Tree. (The). Pliny calls the mulberry the most prudent of all trees, because it waits till winter is well over before it puts forth its leaves. Ludovico Sforza, who prided himself on his prudence, chose a mulberry-tree for his device, and was called "Il Moro."

Prud'homme. A Mons. Prud'homme. A man of experience and great prudence, of estimable character and practical good sense. Your Mons. Prud'homme is never a man of genius and originality, but what we in England should term a "Quaker of the old school."

The council of prud'hommes. A council of arbitrers to settle disputes between masters and workmen.

Prunello. Stuff. Prunello really means that swollen stuff of which common ecclesiastical gowns used to be made; it was also employed for the uppers of women's boots and shoes; everlasting. A corruption of Brimsoles. "Worth makes the man, and want of it the fellow; The rest is all but leather or prunello," (Pop.: Essay on Man, iv.)

Prussia. The country bordering on Russia. In Neo-Latin, Borussia; in Slavonic, Porenssia; in Slavonic signifying "near."

Prussian Blue. So called because it was discovered by a Prussian, viz.
Prussic Acid

Diesbach, a colourman of Berlin, in 1710. It is sometimes called Berlin blue.

Prussic Acid means the acid of Prussian blue. It is now termed in science hydrocyanic acid, because it is made from a cyanide of iron.

Psalm cv. 26. The Prayer Book version is: “They were not obedient unto his word.”

The Bible version and the new version is: “They rebelled not against his word.”

Psalms. Seventy-three psalms are inscribed with David’s name, twelve with that of Asaph the singer; eleven go under the name of the Sons of Korah, a family of singers; one (i.e. Ps. xc.) is attributed to Moses. The whole compilation is divided into five books: bk. 1, from i. to xxi.; bk. 2, from xlii. to lxxii.; bk. 3, from lxxiii. to lxxxix.; bk. 4, from xc. to cvi.; bk. 5, from cvii. to cl.

Psalmist. The sweet psalmist of Israel. King David, who composed many of the Bible Psalms. (See Psalm lxxix. 20.)

Psalter of Tara (The). It contains a narrative of the early kings of Ireland from Ollam Fodhla to n.c. 900.

“Thier truth they said that had a decree,
Was none in Tara’s Psalter.”

Campbell: O’Connor’s Child

Psaphon’s Birds (Psaphon’s acres). Puffers, flatters. Psaphon, in order to attract the attention of the world, reared a multitude of birds, and having taught them a pronunciation of his name, let them fly.

“To what far region have his songs not flown,
Like Psaphon’s birds, speaking their master’s name.”

Moore: Rynag on the Road, i.

Psycoarpax [granary thief]. Son of Troxartas, King of the Mice. The Frogking offered to carry the young prince over a lake, but scarcely had he got midway when a water-hydra appeared, and King Frog, to save himself, dived under water. The mouse, being thus left on the surface, was drowned, and this catastrophe brought about the battle of the Frogs and Mice.

“The soul of great Psychoarpax lives in me.
Of great Troxartas’ line.”

Parnell: Battle of the Frogs and Mice, i.

Psyche [Sy’ke]. A beautiful maiden beloved by Cupid, who visited her every night, but left her at sunrise. Cupid bade her never seek to know he was, but one night curiosity overcame her prudence, and she went to look at him. A drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder, awoke him, and he fled. Psyche next became the slave of Venus, who treated her most cruelly; but ultimately she was married to Cupid, and became immortal, Mrs. Henry Tighe has embodied in six cantos this exquisite allegory from Apulians.

This subject was represented by Raphael in a suite of thirty-two pictures, and numerous artists have taken the legends of Cupid and Psyche for their subject; as, for example, Canova, Gerard, Chantel., etc. The names of the Duke of Marlborough is said to have been the work of Tityus of Athens.

“Fair Psyche, kneeling at the ethereal throne, Warmed the fond bosom of unconquered love.”

Barrett: Economy of Vegetation, iv.

Psychography. Spirit-writing; writing said by spiritualists to be done by spirits.

Ptolemaic System. The system of Claudius Ptolemaeus, a celebrated astronomer of Ptolema, in Egypt, of the eleventh century. He taught that the earth is fixed in the centre of the universe, and the heavens revolve round it from east to west, carrying with them the sun, planets, and fixed stars, in their respective spheres. He said that the Moon was next above the earth, then Mercury, then Venus; the Sun he placed between Venus and Mars, and after Mars, Jupiter and Saturn, beyond which came the two crystalline spheres.

“...This system was accepted, till it was replaced in the sixteenth century by the Copernican system.”

Public. The people generally and collectively; the members generally of a state, nation, or community.

Public-house Signs. Much of a nation’s history, and more of its manners and feelings, may be gleaned from its public-house signs. A very large number of them are selected out of compliment to the lord of the manor, either because he is the “great man” of the neighbourhood, or because the proprietor is some servant whom “it delighted the lord to honour;” thus we have the Earl of March, in compliment to the Duke of Richmond: the Green Man or game-keeper, married and promoted “to a public.” When the name and titles of the lord have been exhausted, we get his cognisance or his favourite pursuit, as the Bear and Ragged Staff, the Fox and Hounds. As the object of the sign is to speak to the feelings and attract, another fruitful source is either some national hero or great battle; thus we get the Marquis of Granby and the Duke of Wellington, the Waterloo and the Alma. The proverbial loyalty of our nation has naturally shown itself in our tavern signs, giving us the Victoria, Prince of Wales, the Albert, the Crown, and so on. Some signs indicate a speciality of the house, as the Bowling Green, the Skittles; some a political bias, as the Royal Oak; some are an attempt at wit, as the Five Ashes; and some are purely fanciful. The following list will serve to exemplify the subject.

The Angel. In allusion to the angel that saluted the Virgin Mary.

The Bag o’Nails. A corruption of the “Bacchanales.”

The Bear. From the popular sport of bear-baiting.

The Bear and Bacchus, in High Street, Warwick. A corruption of Bear and Bacchus—i.e. Bear and Ragged Staff, the badge of the Earl of Warwick.

The Bear and Ragged Staff. The cognisance of the Earl of Warwick, the Earl of Leicester, etc.

The Bell. In allusion to races, a silver bell having been the winner’s prize up to the reign of Charles II.

La Belle Sauvage. (See Bell Savary.)

The Blue Boar. The cognisance of Richard III.

The Boar’s Head. The cognisance of the Gordons, etc.

The Bolt-in-Two. The punning heraldic badge of Prior Bolton, last of the clerical rulers of Bartholomew’s, previous to the Reformation.

Blossom’s Inn. A public-house sign in St. Lawrence Lane, London; a corruption of Blossom’s Inn, as it is now called, in allusion to the hawthorn blossoms surrounding the effigy of St. Lawrence on the sign.

The Bowling Green. Signifying that there are arrangements on the premises for playing bowls.

The Bull’s Head. The cognisance of Henry VIII.

The Bally Buffalo. A corruption of the Bellerophion (a ship).

The Castle. This being the arms of Spain, symbolises that Spanish wines are to be obtained within. In some cases, without doubt, it is a complimentary sign of the manor castle.

The Cat and Fiddle. A corruption of Cat o’Fiddle—i.e. Caton, the faithful governor of Calais. In Farringdon (Devon) is the sign of La Chatte Fiddle, in commemoration of a faithful cat. Without scanning the phrase so nicely, it may simply indicate that the game of cat (trap-ball) and a fiddle for dancing are provided for customers.

The Cat and Mutton, Hackney, which gives name to the Cat and Mutton Fields.

The Cat and Wheel. A corruption of “St. Catherine’s Wheel;” or an announcement that cat and balance-wheels are provided for the amusement of customers.

The Chequers. (1) In honour of the Stuarts, whose shield was “checky,” like a Scotch plaid. (2) In commemoration of the licence granted by the Earls of Arundel or Lords Warreane. (3) An intimation that a room is set apart for merchants and accountants, where they can be private and make up their accounts, or use their “chequers” undisturbed. (See Lattice.)

The Coach and Horses. This sign signifies that it is a posting-house, a stage-coach house, or both.

The Cock and Bottle. By some said to be a corruption of the “Cork and Bottle,” meaning that wine is sold there in bottles. (See suggested explanation on p. 267.)

The Cow and Skittle. The cow is the real sign, and alludes to the dairy of the hostess, or some noted dairy in the neighbourhood. Skittles is added to indicate that there is a skittle ground on the premises.

The Cross Keys. Common in the medieval ages, and in allusion to St. Peter, or one of the bishops whose cognisance it is—probably the lord of the manor or the patron saint of the parish church. The cross keys are emblems of the papacy, St. Peter, the Bishop of Gloucester, St. Servatus, St. Hippolytus, St. Genevieve, St. Petronilla, St. Osyth, St. Martha, and St. Germanus.

The Devil. A public-house sign two doors from Temple Bar, Fleet Street. The sign represents St. Dunstan seizing the devil by the nose. (See under Devil, Proverbial Phrases.)

The Dog and Duck. Tea gardens at Lambeth (suppressed): to signify that the sport so called could be seen there. A duck was put into water, and a dog set to hunt it: the fun was to see the duck diving and the dog following it under water.
The Red Dragon. The cognisance of Henry VII. or the principality of Wales.

The Spread Eagle. The arms of Germany; to indicate that German wines may be obtained within.

The Fox and Goose. To signify that there are arrangements within for playing the royal game of Fox and Goose.

St. George and the Dragon. In compliment to the patron saint of England, and his combat with the dragon. The legend is still stamped upon our gold coin.

The George and Cannon. A corruption of "George Canning."

The Globe. The cognisance of Alfonso, King of Portugal; and intimating that Portuguese wines may be obtained within.

The Goat in Golden Boots. A corruption of the Dutch Goud in der Gouden Boots (the god Mercury in his golden sandals).

The Goat and Compasses. A Puritan sign, a corrupt hieroglyphic reading of God compasses us.

The Black Goats. A public-house sign, High Bridge, Lincoln, formerly The Three Goats—i.e. three goats (gutters or drains), by which the water from the Swan Pool (a large lake that formerly existed to the west of the city) was conducted into the bed of the Witham.

The Golden Cross. This refers to the ensigns carried by the Crusaders.

The Green Man. A corruption of "The Greese or Stains" (Greaseen is gree, a step, our de-gree). The allusion is to a flight of steps from the New Road to the Minster Yard. In Wickeley's Bible, Acts xxii. 40 is rendered—"Paul stood on the greenen."

"Let me speak like yourself, and lay a sentence Which, like a grizz or step, may help these lovers into your favour."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

The Green Man. The late game-keeper of the lord of the manor turned publican. At one time these servants were dressed in green.

The Green Man and Still—i.e. the herbalist bringing his herbs to be distilled.

The Hare and Hounds. In compliment to the sporting squire or lord of the manor.

The Hole-in-the-Wall (London). So called because it was approached by a passage or "hole" in the wall of the house standing in front of the tavern.

The Iron Devil. A corruption of "Hirondelle" (the swallow). There are numerous public-house signs referring to birds; as, the Blackbird, the Thrush, the Peacock, the Martin, the Bird-in-the-Hand, etc. etc.

The Three Kings. A public-house sign of the medieval ages, in allusion to the three kings of Cologne, the Magi who presented offerings to the infant Jesus. Very many public-house signs of the medieval period had a reference to ecclesiastical matters, either because their landlords were ecclesiastics, or else from a superstitious reverence for "saints" and "holy things."

The Man Laden with Mischief. A public-house sign, Oxford Street, nearly opposite to Hanway Yard. The sign is said to have been painted by Hogarth, andrepresents a man carrying a woman and a good many other creatures on his back.

The Marquess of Granby (London, etc.). In compliment to John Manners, eldest son of John, third Duke of Rutland—a bluff, brave soldier, generous, and greatly beloved by his men.

"What conquers now will Britain boast,
Or where display her banners?
Ach! in Granby she has lost
True courage and good Manners."

The Packhorse. To signify that pack-horses could be hired there.

The Palgrave's Head. A public-house sign near Temple Bar, in honour of Frederick, Palgrave of the Rhine.

The Pig and Tinder-Box. A corrupt rendering of The Elephant and Castle; the "pig" is really an elephant, and the "tinder-box" the castle on its back.

The Pig and Whistle. Wassail is made of apples, sugar, and ale.

The Queen of Bohemia. In honour of Lady Elizabeth Stuart. (See Bohemia.)

The Queen Door. A corruption of Coron-Door (Golden Heart).

The Rose. A symbol of England, as the Thistle is of Scotland, and the Shamrock of Ireland.

The Red Rose. The badge of the Lancastrians in the Civil War of the Roses.

The White Rose. The badge of the Yorkists in the Civil War of the Roses.

The Rose of the Quarter Sessions. A corruption of La Rose des Quatre Saisons.

The Salutation and Cat. The "Salutation" (which refers to the angel saluting the Virgin Mary) is the sign of the house, and the "Cat" is added to signify that arrangements are made for playing cat or tipcat.

The Saracen's Head. In allusion to what are preposterously termed "The Holy Wars;" adopted probably by some Crusader after his return home, or at any rate to flatter the natural sympathy for these Quixotic expeditions.

The Ship, near Temple Bar, and opposite The Pulverer's Head; in honour of Sir Francis Drake, the circumnavigator.

The Ship and Shovel. Referring to Sir Cloudesley Shovel, a favourite admiral in Queen Anne's reign.

The Seven Stars. An astrological sign of the mediæval ages.

The Three Nuns. The cognisance of Edward IV.

The Swine with Three Necks. A public-house sign in Lad Lane, etc.; a corruption of "three nicks" (on the bill).

The Swan and Antelope. The cognisance of Henry V.

The Talbot [a hound]. The arms of the Talbot family.

The Turk's Head. Alluding to the Holy Wars, when the Crusaders fought against the Turks.

The Unicorn. The Scottish supporter in the royal arms of Great Britain.

The White Hart. The cognisance of Richard II.; the White Lion, of Edward IV., as Earl of March; the White Swan, of Henry IV. and Edward III.

Publicans of the New Testament were the provincial underlings of the Magister or master collector who resided at Rome. The taxes were farmed by a contractor called the Manceps; this Manceps divided his contract into different societies; each society had a Magister, under whom were a number of underlings called Publicani or servants of the state.

Pucelle (La). The Maid of Orleans, Jeanne d'Arc (1410-1431). (See Shakespeare's 1 Henry V., v. 4.)

Puck or Robin Goodfellow. A fairy and merry wanderer of the night, "rough, knurly-limbed, faun-faced, and shock-pated, a very Shetlander among the gossamer-winged" fairies around him. (See Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 1; iii. 1.)

Pucka, an Indian word in very common use, means real, bona fide; as, "He is a commander, but not a pucca one" (i.e. not officially appointed, but only acting as such, pro tempore). "The queen reigns, but her ministers are the pucka rulers." A suffragan bishop, an honorary canon, a Lynch-judge, a lieutenant-colonel, the temporary editor of a journal, are not "pucka," or bona fide so.

Pudding. (See Jack.)

Pudding-time properly means just as dinner is about to begin, for our forefathers took their pudding before their meat. It also means in the nick of time.

"But Mark... in pudding-time came to his aid." Butler: Hudibras, i. 2.

Pudena. A soldier in the Roman army, mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 21, in connection with Linus and Claudia. According to tradition, Claudia, the wife of Pudena, was a British lady: Linus, otherwise called Cyilen, was her brother; and Lucius, "the British king," the grandson of Linus. Tradition further adds that Lucius wrote to Eleutherus, Bishop of Rome, to send missionaries to Britain to convert the people.

Puff. Exaggerated praise. The most popular etymology of this word is ponnf, a coiffure employed by the ladies of France in the reign of the Grand Monarque to announce events of interest, or render persons patronised by them popular. Thus, Madame d'Égmont, Duke of Richelieu's daughter, wore on her head a little diamond fortress, with moving sentinels, after her father had taken Port Mahon; and the Duchess of Orleans wore a little nursery, with cradle, baby, and toys complete, after the birth of her son and heir. These, no doubt, were puffs and puffs, but Lord Bacon uses the word puff a century before the head-gear was brought into fashion. Two other etymons present themselves: the old pictures of Fame puffing forth the praises of some hero with her trumpet: and the puffing out of slain beasts and birds in order to make them look plumper and better for food—a plan universally adopted in the abattoirs of Paris. (Gorman, puffen, to brag or make a noise; and French, pouf, our puff.)

Puff-ball. A sort of fungus. The word is a corruption of Puck or Pouk ball, anciently called Puck-fist. The Irish name is Pooka-foot. (Saxon,朴k耶-fist, a toadstool.) Shakespeare alludes Puffed Up. Conceited; elated with conceit or praise; filled with wind. A puff is a tartlet with a very light or fluffy crust.

"That no one of you be puffed up one against another."—1 Cor. iv. 6.

Pug, a variant of puck, is used to a child, monkey, dog, etc., as a pet term. You mischievous little pug. A playful reproof to a favourite.

Pug. A mischievous little goblin in Ben Jonson's drama of The Devil is an Ape.

Pugna Porco'rum (Battle of the Pigs). The most celebrated poem of alliterative verse, extending to 253 Latin hexameters, in which every word begins with p.

Puisne Judges means the younger-born judges, at one time called pynge judges. They are the four inferior judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, and the four inferior judges of the Court of Common Pleas. (French, puisné, subsequently born; Latin, post natus.)

Pukwana (North American Indian). The curling smoke of the Peace-pipe; a signal or beacon.

Pull. A long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together—i.e. a steady, energetic, and systematic co-operation. The reference may be either to a boat, where all the oarsmen pull together with a long and strong pull at the oars; or it may be to the act of hauling with a rope, when a simultaneous strong pull is indispensable.

Pull Bacon (Tb). To spread the fingers out after having placed one's thumb on the nose.

"The officers spoke to him, when the man put his fingers to his nose and pulled bacon."—Leete's Report, Oct. 6, 1613.

Pull Devil, Pull Baker. Let each one do the best for himself in his own line of business, but let not one man interfere in that of another.

"It's all fair pulling, pull devil, pull baker... someone has to get the worst of it. Now it's us [the beggars], now it's them [the bakers] that gets... rubbed out."—Holdcroft: Robbery under Arms, chap. xxviii.

Pulling. A jockey trick, which used to be called "playing booty"—i.e. appearing to use every effort to come in first, but really determined to lose the race.

"Mr. Kolby [in the Iron Chest] gave a slight touch of the jockey, and 'played booty.' He seemed to do justice to the play, but really ruined its success."—George Colman the Younger.

Pumblechook (Eecele). He bullied Pip when only a poor boy, but when the boy became wealthy was his lick-spittle, fawning on him most servilely with his "May I, Mr. Pip" [have the honour of shaking hands with you]; "Might I, Mr. Pip" [take the liberty of saluting you]. (Dickens: Great Expectations.)

Pummel or Pommel. To beat black and blue. (French, pommeler, to dapple.)

Pump. To sift, to extract information by indirect questions. In allusion to pumping up water.

"But pump not me for politics."—Owney.

Pumpnickel. Brown George or rye-bread used by Westphalian peasants. His Transparency of Pumpnickel. So the Times satirised the minor German princes, "whose ninety men and ten drummers constituted their whole embattled host on the parade-ground before their palace; and whose revenue was supplied by a percentage on the tax levied on strangers at the Pumpnickel Karssal." (July 18, 1806.)

Thackeray was author of the phrase.

Pun is the Welsh pun, equivalent; it means a word equally applicable to two things. The application should be remote and odd in order to give piquancy to the play. (See CALEMBOURG.)

Pun and Pickpocket. He who would make a pun would pick a pocket. Dr. Johnson is generally credited with this silly dictum (1769-1784), but Dennis had said before to Purcell, "Any man who would make such an execrable pun would not scruple to pick my pocket" (1657-1734). (Sir W. H. Pyne: Wine and Walnuts, vol. ii. p. 277.)

The "execrable pun" was this: Purcell rang the bell for the dinner or water, but none answered it. Purcell, tapping the table, asked Dennis "why the table was like the tavern?"—Ans. "Because there is no dinner in it."

Punch, from the Indian word pun (five); so called from its five ingredients—viz. spirit, water, lemon, sugar, and spice. It was introduced into England from Spain, where it is called ponche. It is called "Contradiction," because it is composed of spirits to make it strong, and water to make it weak; of lemon-piace to make it sour, and sugar to make it sweet.
Mr. Punch. A Roman mime called Maccus was the original of Punch. A statuette of this buffoon was discovered in 1727, containing all the well-known features of our friend—the long nose and goggle eyes, the hunch back and protruding breast.

The most popular derivation of Punch and Judy is Pontius cum Judas (Matt. xxvii. 19), an old mystery play of Pontius Pilate and the Jews; but the Italian polizelino seems to be from pollici, a thumb (Tom-thumb figures), and our Punch is from punch.

The drama or story of our Punch and Judy is attributed to Silvio Fiorello, an Italian comedian of the seventeenth century. The tale is this: Punch, in a fit of jealousy, strangles his infant child, when Judy flies to her revenge. She fetches a bludgeon, with which she beheads her husband, till Punch, exasperated, seizes another bludgeon and beats her to death, then flings into the street the two dead bodies. The bodies attract the notice of a police officer, who enters the house. Punch flees for his life: being arrested by an officer of the Inquisition, he is shut up in prison, from which he escapes by means of a golden key. The rest is an allegory, showing how Punch triumphs over all the ills that flesh is heir to. (1) Ennui, in the shape of a dog, is overcome; (2) Disease, in the disguise of a doctor, is kicked out; (3) Death is beaten to death; and (4) the Devil himself is outwitted.

Pleasant as Punch. (See PLEASED.)

"I did hear them call their child Punch, which pleased me mightily, that word having become a word of common use for everything that is thick and short."—Pepys’s Diary.

Punctual. No bigger than a point, exact to a point or moment. (Latin, ad punctum.) Hence the angel, describing this earth to Adam, calls it "This spacious earth, this punctual spot"—i.e., a spot no bigger than a point. (Milton: Paradise Lost, viii. 28.)

Punctuality. Punctuality is the politeness of kings. Attributed to Louis XVIII.

Punctuation. The following advice of Bishop Orleton to Gourney and Maltravers in 1327 is an excellent example of the importance of punctuation:—Eccardum occidere voluit timere hunc est:—"Refrain not to kill King Edward is right." If the point is placed after the first word, the sentence reads, "Not to kill the king is right:" but if after the second word, the direction becomes, "Refrain not; to kill the king is right." (See Oracle.)

Punidit. An East Indian scholar, skilled in Sanskrit, and learned in law, divinity, and science. We use the word for a porridgulum, one more stocked with book lore than deep erudition.

Punice Apple. A pomegranate; so called because it is the pomum or "apple" belonging to the genus Punica.

Punice Faith. Treachery, violation of faith. "Punic faith" is about equal to "Spanish honesty." The Punid (a corruption of Persian) were accused by the Romans of breaking faith with them, a most extraordinary instance of the "put calling the kettle black:" for whatever infidelity the Carthaginians were guilty of, it could scarcely equal that of their accusers.

The Roman Porci is the word Phoeo (Phoenicians), the Carthaginians being of Phoenician descent.

Punish a Bottle (7). To drink a bottle of wine or spirits. When the contents have been punished, the empty bottles are "dead men.

"After we’d punished a couple of bottles of old Crow whisky... he cried in grief.

Punjab [su pay]. They are the Jelum, Chenah, Ravee, Beas, and Sutlej, called by the Greeks pante-potamia.

Pup properly means a little boy or girl. A little dog is so called because it is a pet. An insect in the third stage of existence. (Latin, pupes, fem. pupa; French, poupee, a doll; German, puppe.)

Purbeck (Dorsetshire). Noted for a marble used in ecclesiastical ornaments. Chichester cathedral has a row of columns of this limestone. The columns of the Temple church, London; the tomb of Queen Eleanor, in Westminster Abbey; and the throne of the archbishop in Canterbury cathedral, are other specimens.

Purgatory. The Jewish Rabbi believed that the soul of the deceased was consigned to a sort of purgatory for twelve months after death, during which time it was allowed to visit its dead body and the places or persons it especially loved. This intermediate state they called by various names, as "the bosom of Abraham,” “the garden of Eden,” “upper Gehenna.” The Sabbath was always a free day, and prayer was supposed to benefit those in this intermediate state.

Puritan (J). The Puritans, Elvira, daughter of Lord Walton, a Puritan, is affianced to Lord Arthur Talbot, a Cavalier. On the day of espousals, Lord Arthur aids Henrietta, the widow of Charles I., to escape; and Elvira, thinking him faithless, loses her reason. On his return to England, Lord Arthur explains the circumstances, and the two lovers vow that nothing on earth shall part them more. The vow is scarcely uttered, when Cromwell’s soldiers enter and arrest Lord Talbot for treason; but as they lead him forth to execution a herald announces the defeat of the Stuarts, and free pardon to all political prisoners, whereupon Lord Arthur is liberated, and marries Elvira. (Bellini: *Puritani; libretto by C. Puppi.)

Puritans. Seeders from the Reformed Church; so called because they rejected all human traditions and interference in religion, acknowledging the sole authority of the “pore Word of God,” without “note or comment.” Their motto was: “The Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible.” The English Puritans were sometimes by the Reformers called Prerogatives from their preciseness in matters called “indifferent.” Andrew Fuller named them Non-conformists, because they refused to subscribe to the Act of Uniformity.

Purkinge’s Figures. In optics, figures produced on a wall of uniform colour when a person entering a dark room with a candle moves it up and down approximately on a level with the eyes. From the eye near the candle an image of the retinal vessels will appear projected on the wall.

Purler (A). A cropper, or heavy fall from one’s horse in a steeplechase or in the hunting-field (probably allied to hurl and whirl).

"Screaps a white horse ... cleaned it, but falling with a mighty crash, gave him a purler on the opposite side."—Gaudé: Under Two Flags, chap. vi.

Purline (2 syl.). French pourallière (a place free from the forest laws). Henry II., Richard I., and John made certain lands forest lands; Henry III. allowed certain portions all round to be severed. These “rues,” or forest borders were fared from that servitude which was laid on the royal forests. The "perambulation" by which this was effected was technically called pouraller.

"In the purloin of this forest stands
A scope, a fence about with olive-trees"—Shakespeare; As You Like It, iv. 3.

Purple (blue and red) indicates the love of truth even unto martyrdom. (See under Colour, for its symbolisms, etc.)

Purple (Promotion to the). Promotion to the rank of cardinal in the Roman Catholic Church.

Dr. Moran’s pro motio to the purple is certain—Newspaper paragraph.

Purpore [purple]. One of the colours of an heraldic escutcheon. It is expressed by vertical lines running down towards the left hand (as you look at the shield lying before you); “Vert” runs the contrary way.

Purura’vas and Urva’si. An Indian myth similar to that of Apollo and Daphne. Pururava is a legendary king who fell in love with Urvasi, a heavenly nymph, who consented to become his wife on certain conditions. These conditions being violated, Urvasi disappeared, and Pururava, inconsolable, wandered everywhere to find her. Ultimately he succeeded, and they were indissolubly united. (See Psyche.)

Pusseyite (3 syl.). A High Churchman; so called from Dr. Pusey, of Oxford, a chief contributor to the Tracts for the Times. (See Tractarians.)

Puss. A cat, hare, or rabbit. (Irish, pus, a cat.) It is said that the word, applied to a hare or rabbit, is from the Latin lapus, Frenchified into le pus. True or not, the pun may pass muster.

"Oh, puss, it bores thee dire disgrace.
When I defy thee to the race.
Come, let a heft; may, no denial;
I’ll lay my shield upon the truel—The Hare and the Tortoise.

Puss in Boots [Le Chat Botté], from the Eleventh Night of Straparola’s
Italian fairy tales, where Constantine's cat procures his master a fine castle and the king's heiress. First translated into French in 1885. Our version is taken from that of Charles Perrault. There is a similar one in the Scandinavian nursery tales. This clever cat secures a fortune and a royal partner for his master, who passes off as the Marquis of Carabas, but is in reality a young miller without a penny in the world.

Put. A clown, a silly shallow-pate, a butt, one easily "put upon."
"Quer country puts evol queen Bees a regn."—Browne.

Put the Cart before the Horse. (See Cart.)

Put up the Shutters (To). To announce oneself a bankrupt.
"Do you think I am going to put up the shutters if we can manage to keep going."

Putney and Mortlake Race. The annual eight-oared boat-race between the two universities of Cambridge and Oxford.

Putting on Frills (American). Giving oneself airs.

Putting on Side. Giving oneself airs. Side is an archaic word for a train or trailing gown; also long, as "his beard was side." A side-coat means a long trailing coat. (Anglo-Saxon sid, great, wide, long—as side-fear, long hair.)
"I do not like side locks for little girls."—Shakespeare.

Pygmalion. A statue of Cyprus, who hated women and resolved never to marry, but fell in love with his own statue of the goddess Venus. At his earnest prayer the statue was vivified, and he married it. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, x.; Earthly Paradise, August.)
"'Few like Pygmalion that on hollow charms,
Or care to clasp a statue in their arms,'"
X. J. Juv. Art of Dancing, cant. i.

"In Gilbert's comedy of Pygmalion and Galatea, the sculptor is a married man, whose wife (Cynisca) was jealous of the animated statue (Galatea), which, after enduring great misery, voluntarily returned to its original state. This, of course, is mixing up two Pygmalions, while the poles apart.

John Martain wrote certain satires called The Metamorphoses of Pygmalion's Image. These satires were suppressed, and are now very rare.

Pygmies (2 syl.). A nation of dwarfs on the banks of the Upper Nile. Every spring the canoes made war upon them and devoured them. They cut down every corn-ear with an axe.

When Hercules went to the country they climbed up his goblet by ladders to drink from it; and while he was asleep two whole armies of them fell upon his right hand, and two upon his left; but Hercules rolled them all in his lion's skin. It is easy to see how Swift has availed himself of this Grecian legend in his Gulliver's Travels. Stanley met with a race of Pygmies in his search for Emin Pasha.

Py'ladès and Orestes. Two model friends, whose names have become proverbial for friendship, like those of Damon and Pythias, David and Jonathan.

Pyramid. The largest is that of Cheops, in Egypt; it is the tomb of Cheops, near Cairo, which covers thirteen acres. Sir William Tite tells us it contains ninety million cubic feet of stone, and could not be now built for less than thirty millions of money (sterling).

Pyramus. The lover of Thisbe. Supposing Thisbe to be torn to pieces by a lion, he stabbed himself, and Thisbe, finding the dead body, stabbed herself also. Both fell dead under a mulberry-tree, which has ever since borne blood-red fruit. Shakespeare has a travesty of this tale in his Midsummer Night's Dream. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, bk. iv.)

Pyrocles and Musidorus. Heroes whose exploits, previous to their arrival in Arcadia, are detailed in the Arcadia of Sir Philip Sidney.

Pyrodes (3 syl.), son of Clias was so called, according to Pliny (vii. 50), because he was the first to strike fire from flint. (Greek, pur, fire; = pyrites.)

Pyrrha. Secutor Pyrrha. The Flood. Pyrrha was the wife of Deucalion (Homer: 1 Odys., ii. 6). So much rain had fallen, it looks as if the days of Pyrrha were about to return.

Pyrrhic Dance, the most famous war-dance of antiquity, received its name from Pyrrhios, a Dorian. It was danced to the flute, and its time was very quick. Julius Cæsar introduced it into Rome. The Roman, still danced in Greece, is a relic of the ancient Pyrrhic dance.

"Ye have the Pyrrhic dance as often. Where is the Pyrrhic phalanx gone?"
—Byron

Pyrrhic Victory (A). A ruinous victory. Pyrrhus, after his victory over the Romans, near the river Sirs, said to those sent to congratulate him, "One more such victory and Pyrrhus is undone."

"The railway companies see that in fighting their customers they gain has a very Pyrrhic sort of victory."—Newspaper article, Feb. 1863.

Pyrrho. A skeptic. Pyrrho was the founder of the scepitical school of philosophy. He was a native of Elis, in Peloponnese.

"Blessed be the day I escaped the wrangling crew From Pyrrho's name and Euphranor's etc.

Pyrrhonian School. The sceptical platform founded by Pyrrho.

Pyrrhonism. Infidelity. (See above.)

Pythagoras, son of Mnesarchus, was called son of Apollo or Pythios, from the first two syllables of his name; but he was called Pytha-goras because the Pythian oracle predicted his birth.

Pythagoras, generally called The Long-haired Samian. A native of Samos, noted for his manly beauty and long hair. The Greeks applied the phrase to any venerable man or philosopher.

Pythagoras maintained that he distinctly recollected having occupied other human forms before his birth at Samos: (1) He was Ethel'ides, son of Mercury; (2) Euphorbos the Phrygan, son of Panthoos, in which form he ran Parthenos through with a lance, leaving Hector to dispatch the hateful friend of Achilles; (3) Hermotimos, the prophet of Clazone, and (4) a fisherman. To prove his Phrygan existence he was taken to the temple of Hera, in Argos, and asked to point out the shield of the son of Panthoos, which he did without hesitation. (See Ret.)

The golden thigh of Pythagoras. This thigh he showed to Alaxas, the Hyperborean priest, and exhibited it in the Olympic games.

Alaxas, priest of the Hyperboreans, gave him a dart, by which he was carried through the air, over inaccessible rivers, lakes and mountains; expelled pestilence; lulled storms; and performed other wonderful exploits.

Pythagoras maintained that the soul has three vehicles: (1) the other, which is luminous and celestial, in which the soul resides in a state of bliss in the stars; (2) the luminous, which suffers the punishment of sin after death; and (3) the terrestrial, which is the vehicle it occupies on this earth.

Pythagoras asserted he could write on the moon. His plan of operation was to write on a looking-glass in blood, and place it opposite the moon, when the inscription would appear photographed or reflected on the moon's disc.

Pythagorean System. Pythagoras practiced by Pythagoras, if we may credit Tarnnichus, who tells us that he tamed a savage Duonian bear by "stroking it gently with his hand;" subdued an eagle by the same means; and held absolute dominion over beasts and birds by "the power of his voice," or "influence of his touch."

Pythagorean System. Pythagoras taught that the sun is a movable sphere in the centre of the universe, and that all the planets revolve round it. This is substantially the same as the Copernican and Newtonian systems.

Pythian Games. The games held by the Greeks at Pytho, in Phocis, subsequently called Delphi. They took place every fourth year, the second of each Olympiad.

Pythias. (See Damon.)

Python. The monster serpent hatched from the mud of Deucalion's deluge, and slain near Delphi by Apollo.

Q. Q IN A CORNER. Something not seen at first, but subsequently brought to notice. The thing to which seals are attached in legal documents is in French called the queue; thus we have "lettres scellées sur simple queue or sur double queue," according to whether they bear one or two seals. In documents where the seal is attached to the deed itself, the corner where the seal is placed is called the queue, and when the document is sworn to the finger is laid on the queue.

In a merry Q (can). Humour, temper; thus Shakespeare says, "My cue is villanous melancholy" (King Lear, i. 2).

Old Q. The Fifth Earl of March, afterwards Duke of Queensberry.

Q.E.D. Quod erat demonstrandum. Three letters appended to the theorems of Euclid, meaning: Thus have we proved the proposition stated above, as we were required to do.

Q.E.F. Quod erat faciendum. Three letters appended to the problems of Euclid, meaning: Thus have we done or drawn the figure required by the proposition.
Q.P. Quantum placet. Two letters used in prescriptions, meaning the quantity may be as little or much as you like. Thus, in a cup of tea we might say “Milk and sugar q.p.”

Q.S. Quantum sufficient. Two letters appended to prescriptions, and meaning as much as is required to make the pills up. Thus, after giving the drugs in minute proportions, the apothecary is told to “mix these articles in liquorice g.c.”

Q.V. (Latin, quantum vis). As much as you like, or quantum ratus, as much as is proper.

g.r. (Latin, grad ruder). Which sec.

Quack or Quack Doctor: once called quack-salver. A puffer of salves. (Swedish, quenk-sulfare; Norwegian, quak-salver; German, quacksalber.)

Saltembancas, quack-salvers, and charlatans deserve the vulgar.”—St Thomas Browne.

Quacks. Queen Anne’s quack oculists were William Read (tailor), who was knighted, and Dr. Grant (tinker).

Quad. To be in quad. To be confined to your college-grounds or quadrangle; to be in prison.

Quadra. The border round a las-relief.

In the Santa Croce of Florence is a quadra round a las-relief representing the Madonna, in white terra-cotta. Several other figures are introduced.

Quadragesima Sunday. The first Sunday in Lent; so called because it is, in round numbers, the fortieth day before Easter.

Quadragesima. The furthlings or payments made in commutation of a personal visit to the mother-church on Mid-Lent Sunday; also called Whitsun furthlings.

Quadrilatral. The four fortresses of Peschiera and Mantua on the Mincio, with Verona and Legua’go on the Adige. Now demolished. The Persnian Quadrilateral. The fortresses of Luxemburg, Coblenz, Sarre- lous, and Mayence.

Quadrille (2 syl., French) means a small square, a dance in which the persons place themselves in a square. Introduced into England in 1813 by the Duke of Devonshire. (Latin, quadrin., a square.)

Le Pantalon. So called from the tune to which it used to be danced.

L’Éto. From a country-dance called pas d’été, very fashionable in 1800; which it resembles.

La pone. Derived from a country-dance produced by Julien in 1802, the second part of which began with the imitation of a cock-crow.

Tremuse. The name of a dancing-master who, in 1800, invented the figure.

La pastorella. So named from its melody and accompaniment, which are similar to the villanelles or peasants’ dances.

Quadrillage (3 syl.). Anything written in four parts or books, as Childe Harold. Anything compiled from four authors, as the Life of Thomas à Becket. Any history resting on the testimony of four independent authorities, as The Gospel History.

“The very authors of the Quadrillage Steele or song of four parts,—do all with one pen and mouth acknowledge the same.”—Lambert: Verbalambition, p. 55.

Quadrivium. The four higher subjects of scholastic philosophy up to the twelfth century. It embraced music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. The quadrivium was the “fourfold way” to knowledge; the triöon (g.r.) the “threefold way” to eloquence; both together comprehended the seven arts or sciences. The seven arts are enumerated in the following hexameron:

“Linens, Quaqua, Rato, Numein, Taum, Amulius, Vato.”

And in the two following:

“Gram, Aquiur, Inv. verit digni, sitior, vest verit colorat.
Mus catit, le numera, vis ponderat, Astold asta.”

Quadroon. A person with one-fourth of black blood; the offspring of a mulatto woman by a white man. The mulatto is half blooded, one parent being white and the other black. (Latin, qua- tun, four) (See Lamb.)

Quadrolo Alliance of 1074. Germany, Spain, Denmark, and Holland formed an alliance against France to resist the encroachments of Louis XIV., who had declared war against Holland. It terminated with the treaty of Niméguen in 1678.

Quadrolo Alliance of 1718-1719. An alliance between England, France, Germany, and Holland, to guarantee the succession in England to the House of Hanover; to secure the succession in France to the House of Bourbon; and to prohibit Spain and France from uniting under one crown. Signed at Paris.

Quadrolo Alliance of 1834. The alliance of England, France, Spain, and Portugal for the purpose of restoring peace to the Peninsula, by putting down the Carlists or partisans of Don Carlos.

Quæstio Vexata. An open question.

Quail. A bird, said to be very salacious, hence a prostitute or courteuse.

"Here's Agamemnon, an honest fellow enough, and one that loves quails."—Shakespeare. Troilus and Cressida, v. 1.

The Blind of Homer is based on the story that Agamemnon, being obliged to give up his mistress, took the mistress of Achilles to supply her place. This brought about a quarrel between Agamemnon and Achilles, and Achilles refused to have anything more to do with the sire de Troy.

Quaint means odd, peculiar. A quaint phrase means a fanciful phrase, one not expressed in the ordinary way.

"His garment was very quaint and odd. . . a long, long way behind the time."—Dickens. Christmas Stories; Cricket on the Heath, chap. 1.

Quaker. It appears from the Journal of George Fox, who was imprisoned for nearly twelve months in Derby, that the Quakers first obtained the appellation (1650) by which they are now known from the following circumstance:—

"Justice Bennet, of Derby," says Fox, "was the first to call us Quakers, because I bade him quake and tremble at the word of the Lord." The system of the Quakers is laid down by Robert Barclay in fifteen theses, called Barclay's Apology, addressed to Charles II.

"Quakers (that, like lanterns, bear Their light within them) will not swear."—Bull: Hobbes, ii. 2.

Qualm. A sudden fit of illness, or sickly languor. Hence, a qualm of conscience = a twinge or uneasiness of conscience.

Quandary. A perplexity; a state of hesitation.

Quanquam or Cauan. A slang manner of dancing quadrilles permitted in the public gardens of Paris, etc. The word cauau is a corruption of the Latin quanquam, a term applied to the exercises delivered by young theological students before the divinity professors. Hence it came to signify "babble," "jargon," anything crude, jeu-mie, etc.

Quarantine (3 syl.). The forty days that a ship suspected of being infected with some contagious disorder is obliged to lie off port. (Italian, quarantina, forty; French, quarantaine.)

To perform quarantine is to ride off port during the time of quarantine. (See Forty.)

Quarrell (Philip). A sort of Robinson Crusoe, who had a chimpanzee for his "man Friday." The story relates the adventures and sufferings of an English hermit named Philip Quarrell.

Quarrel. A short, stout arrow used in the crossbow. (A corruption of carrel; Welsh, chwereu, French, carreau. So called because the head was originally carré or four-sided. Hence also a quarrel or quarery of glass, meaning a square or diamond-shaped pane; quarrel, a square wax-candle, etc.)

"Quarrels quayntly swappe thrownes knyghts.*

With irony so weckly, that winche they never.'—*Morte d'Arthur."

Quarrel. To quarrel over the bishop's cope—over something which cannot possibly do you any good; over goat's wool. This is a French expression. The newly appointed Bishop of Bruges entered the town in his cope, which he gave to the people: and the people, to part it among themselves, tore it to shreds, each taking a piece.

Quarrel with your Bread and Butter (To). To act contrary to your best interest; to quarrel at that which procures your living, like a spoilid child, who shows its ill-temper by throwing its bread and butter to the ground. To cut off your nose to be avenged on your face.

Quarry. (A). The place where stone, marble, etc., are dug out and squared. (French, quarre, formed into square blocks.) (Toburnson.)

Quarry. Prey. This is a term in falconry. When a hawk struck the object of pursuit and clung to it, she was said to "bind;" but when she flew off with it, she was said to "carry." The "carry" or "quarry," therefore, means the prey carried off by the hawk. It is an error to derive this word from the Latin quero (to seek).

"To tell the manner of it,
Were on the quarry of those murdered deer
To add the death of you."—Shakespeare. Macbeth, i. 3.

Quart d’Heure (Mauvass.). A time of annoyance. The time between the arrival of the guests and the announcement of dinner is emphatically called the mauvass quart d’heure; but the phrase has a much larger application: thus we say the Cabinet Ministers must have had a mauvass quart d’heure when opening a number of telegrams of a troublesome character.

Quarter. To grant quarter. To spare the life of an enemy in your power. Dr. Tusiier says:—"It originated from an agreement anciently made between the Dutch and the Spaniards, that the ransom of a soldier should be the quarter of his pay." (French, donner and demander quarter.)

Quarter-days in England and Ireland:
(1) New Style: Lady Day (March 25th), Midsummer Day (June 24th), Michaelmas Day (September 29th), and Christmas Day (December 25th).
(2) Old Style: Old Lady Day (April 6th), Old Midsummer Day (July 6th), Old Michaelmas Day (October 11th), and Old Christmas Day (January 6th).

Quarter-deck. The upper deck of a ship from the main-mast to the poop; if no poop, then from the main-mast to the stern. In men-of-war it is used as a promenade by officers only.

Quartermaster. The officer whose duty it is to attend to the quarters of the soldiers. He superintends the issue of stores, food, and clothing. (See Quartees.)

As a nautical term, a quartermaster is a petty officer who, besides other duties, attends to the steering of the ship.

Quartered. (See Drawn.)

Quarto. A book half the size of folio—i.e. where each sheet is folded into quarters or four leaves. 4to is the contraction. (The Italian, libro in quarto; French, en quarto; from Latin quartus.)

Quarto-Daysmans, who, after the decision of the Nicene Council, maintained that Easter ought to be held on the fourteenth day of the first lunar month near the vernal equinox, whether that day fell on a Sunday or not.

Quashee. A cant generic name of a negro; so called from a negro named Quassi. (See Quassia.)

Quasi (Latin). Something which is not the real thing, but may be accepted in its place: thus a

Quasi contract is not a real contract, but something which may be accepted as a contract, and has the force of one.

Quasi tenant. The tenant of a house sub-let.

Quasimodo. A foundling, hideously deformed, but of amazing strength, in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris.

Quasimodo Sunday. The first Sunday after Easter; so called because the "Introit" of the day begins with these words:—"Quasi modo gentilis in infans" (1 Pet. ii. 2). Also called "Low Sunday," being the first Sunday after the grand ceremonies of Easter.

Quassia. An American plant, or rather genus of plants, named after Quassi, a negro.

"Linnæus applied this name to a tree of Siminam in honour of a negro, Quassi... who employed its bark as a remedy for fever; and enjoyed such a reputation among the natives as to be almost worshipped by some."—Lindley and Moore: Treatise of Botany, vol. ii. p. 947.

Quatorzienno (fourteeners). Persons of recognised position in society who hold themselves in readiness to accept an invitation to dinner when otherwise the number of guests would be thirteen. (See Thirteen.)

Queen. Greek, goa (a woman); Sanskrit, gnwr; Swedish, gynna; Gothic, gwmna; Anglo-Saxon, gninu. (See Sir.)

*Queen, "woman," is equivalent to "mother." In the translation of the Bible by Vulgate (fourth century), we meet with gum and gim ("wife" and "woman"); and in the Scandinavian languages kvin and kvinn still mean "man" and "wife." (See King.)

Queen (The White). Mary Queen of Scots; so called because she dressed in white mourning for her French husband.

Queen Anne is Dead. The reply made to the teller of stale news.

Queen Anne's Bounty. A fund created out of the firstfruits and tenths, which were part of the papal exactions before the Reformation. The firstfruits are the whole first year's profits of a clerical living, and the tenths are the tenth part annually of the profits of a living. Henry VIII. annexed both these to the Crown, but Queen Anne formed them into a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings and the building of parsonages. The sum equals about £14,000 a year.

Queen Anne's Style (of architecture). Noted for many angles, gables, quaint features, and irregularity of windows.

Queen Consort. Wife of a reigning king.

Queen Dick. Richard Cromwell is sometimes so called. (See Dick, Greek Calende.)

Queen Dowager. The widow of a deceased king.

Queen Passion (The Great). Love.

Of mortal hearts the great queen passion knew,
Peter Panatar; Portfolio; Donah.

Queen Quintessence. Sovereign of Eschol, in the romance of Gargantua and Pantagruel, by Rabelais.

Queen Regnant. A queen who holds the crown in her own right, in contradistinction to a Queen Consort, who is queen only because her husband is king.

Queen-Square Hermit. Jeremy Bentham, who lived at No. 1, Queen Square, London. He was the father of the political economists called Utilitarians, whose maxim is, “The greatest happiness of the greatest number.” (1748-1832.)

Queen of Hearts. Elizabeth, daughter of James I. This unfortunate Queen of Bohemia was so called in the Low Countries, from her amiable character and engaging manners, even in her lowest estate. (1596-1662.)

Queen of Heaven, with the ancient Phoenicians, was Astaraz; Greeks, Hera; Romans, Juno; Trivis, Hecate, Diana, the Egyptian Isis, etc., were all so called; but with the Roman Catholics it is the Virgin Mary.

In Jeremiah vii. 18: “The children gather wood... and the women knead dough to make cakes to the queen of heaven,” i.e., probably to the Moon, to which the Jews, at the time, made drink-offerings and presented cakes. (Compare chapter xlv, 16-18.)

Queen of the Dripping-pan. A cook.

Queen of the Eastern Archipelago. The island of Java.

Queen of the May. A village ball chosen to preside over the parish sports on May Day. Tennyson has a poem on the subject.

Queen of the North. Edinburgh. (Not the proper name for other queens.)

Queen of the Northern Seas. Elizabeth, who greatly increased the English navy, and was successful against the Spanish Armada, etc.

Queen's Bench or King's Bench. One of the courts of law, in which the monarch used to preside in person.

Queen's College (Oxford), founded in 1340 by Robert de Egesfield, and so called in compliment to Queen Philippa, whose confess he was.

Queen's College (Cambridge), founded in 1448 by Margaret of Anjou, consort of Henry VI. Refounded by Elizabeth Woodville.

Queen's Day. November 17th, the day of the accession of Queen Elizabeth, first publicly celebrated in 1570, and still kept as a holiday at the Exchequer, as it was at Westminster school. Nov. 17 at Merchant Taylor's school is a holiday also, now called Sir Thomas White's Founder's Day.

“Queen's Day” is spread in the court, and hath come to the ears of some of the most honourable persons, how that I on the Queen's day last past did forbid in our college an custom to her made, in praise of Her Majesty's government, etc.”—Dr. Whitaker to Lord Burghley (May 14th, 1590).

Queen's English (The). Dean Alford wrote a small book on this subject, whence it has arisen three or four phrases, such as “clipping the Queen's English,” “murdering the Queen's English,” etc. Queen's English means grammatical English.

Queen's Heads. Postage-stamps which bear a likeness of the Queen's [Victoria's] head. (1895.)

Queen's Pipe (The). An oven at the Victoria Docks for destroying (by the Inland Revenue authorities) refuse and worthless tobacco. In 1892 the oven was replaced by a furnace.

In the Queen's Warehouse, near the Monument, is a smaller pipe for the destruction of contraband articles.

Queen's Ware. Glazed earthenware of a creamy colour.
Queen's Weather

Queen's Weather. A fine day for a fête; so called because Queen Victoria is, for the most part, fortunate in having fine weather when she appears in public.

Queenhithe (London). The hithe or strand for lading and unlading barges and lighters in the city. Called "queen" from being part of the dowry of Eleanor, Queen of Henry II.

Queens-town (Ireland), formerly called the Cove of Cork. The name was changed in 1850, out of compliment to Queen Victoria, when she visited Ireland with her husband, and created her eldest son Earl of Dublin.

Queer. Counterfeit money. To show the queer. To pass counterfeit money.

Queer Card (A). A strange or eccentric person. In whist, etc., when a wrong card is played, the partner says to himself, "That is a queer card," which, being transferred to the player, means he is a queer card to play in such a manner. Hence any eccentric person, who does not act in accordance with social rules, is a "queer card."

Queer Chap is the German querkopp, a cross-grained fellow.

Queer Street. To live in Queer Street. To be of doubtful solvency. To be one marked in a tradesman's ledger with a quee (inquire), meaning, make inquiries about this customer. That has put me in Queer Street. That has posted or puzzled me queerly. In this phrase queer means to puzzle; and Queer Street = puzzledom.

Quercy. A corruption of quant'feud (five-leaved), the armorial device of the family.

Querelle d'Allemend. A contention about trifles, soon provoked and soon appeased. (See QUER.)

Quern-Biter. The sword of Haco I. of Norway. (See SWORD.)

"Quern-biter of Haco on the goad/When with a stroke he beaved/He made a furrow through and through./" Longfellow.

Querno. Camillo Querno, of Apulia, hearing that Leo X. was a great patron of poets, went to Rome with a harp in his hand, and sang his Actias, a poem containing 20,000 verses. He was introduced to the Pope as a buffoon, but was promoted to the laurel.

"Rome in her Capitol saw Querno sit/Throned on seven hills, the Ancestor of wit./" Dunciad, ii.

Querpo (2 syl.). Shril Querpo in Garth's Dispensary, was Dr. Howe.

In querpo. In one's shirt-sleeves; in undress. (Spanish, en cuerpo, without a cloak.)

"Boy, my clerk and riper; it fits not a gentleman of my rank to walk the streets in querpo."-Boonmont and Fletcher; Love's Cure, ii. 1.

Questa Cortesissima (Italian). Most courteous one; a love term used by Dante to Beatrice.

"I set myself to think of that most courteous one (questa cortesissima), and thinking of her there fell upon me sweet sleep."-Mrs. Oliphant: Makers of Florence (Dante's description).

Questa Gentilissima (Italian). Most gentle one; a love term used by Dante to Beatrice.

"Common mortals stand and wane with bated breath while that most gentle one (questa gentilissima) goes on her way."-Mrs. Oliphant: Makers of Florence, ii. 23.

Question. To move the previous question. No one seems able to give any clear and satisfactory explanation of this phrase. Erskine May, in his Parliamentary Practice, p. 363 (9th edition), says: "It is an ingenious method of avoiding a vote upon any question that has been proposed, but the technical phrase does little to elucidate its operation. When there is no debate, or after a debate is closed, the Speaker ordinarily puts the question as a matter of course,... but by a motion for the previous question, this act may be intercepted and forbidden. The custom ['used to be] that the question he now put,' but Arthur Wellesley Peel, while Speaker, changed the words 'be now put' into 'be not put.'" The former process was obviously absurd. To continue the quotation from Erskine May: "Those who wish to avoid the putting of the main question, vote against the previous (or later question); and if it be resolved in the negative, the Speaker is prevented from putting the main question, as the House has refused to allow it to be put. It may, however, be brought forward again another day."

Of course this is correct but what it means is quite another matter and why the term question as called the previous question is best understood.

Question. When members of the House of Commons or other debaters call out Question, they mean that the person speaking is wandering away from the subject under consideration.

Questionists. In the examinations for degrees in the University of Cambridge it was customary, at the beginning of the January term, to hold "Acts," and the candidates for the Questions

Bachelor’s degree were called “Questionists.” They were examined by a moderator, and afterwards the fathers of other colleges “questioned” them for three hours—i.e. one whole hour and parts of two others. (I began my Act about a quarter to eleven and finished about half-past one.) It was held altogether in Latin, and the words of dismissal uttered by the Regius Professor indicated what class you would be placed in, or whether the respondent was plucked, in which case the words were simply “Nullius auscultas domine.”

Questions and Commands. A Christmas game, in which the commander bids his subjects to answer a question which is asked. If the subject refuses, or fails to satisfy the commander, he must pay a forfeit or have his face smudged.

“While other young ladies in the house are dancing, or playing at questions and commands, she [the devotee] reads aloud in her closet.”—The Spectator, No. 334 (Hotspur’s Letter), April 16, 1712.

Quæbus. The equinoxial of Quæbus. This line has Utopia on one side and Medam’othi on the other. It was discovered on the Greek Koulens by Outis after his escape from the giant’s cave, and is ninety-one degrees from the poles.

“Thou wast in very gracious lodging last night, when thou spakest of Pterogomophus, the Vapians passing the equinoxial of Quæbus. ’Twas very good, I must say.”—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 3.

Queue. Gare la queue des Allemands. Before you quarrel, count the consequences. (See QUERELLE.)

Queux. The seneschal of King Arthur.

Quey Calves are dear Veal. Quey calves are female calves, which should be kept and reared for cows. Calves for the butcher are generally bull calves. The proverb is somewhat analogous to killing the goose which lays the golden egg. (Danish quie, a heifer.)

Qui. To give a man the qui. When a man in the printing business has had notice to quit, his fellow-workmen say they “have given him the qui.” Here qui is the contraction of quiesque (discharge). (See QUIETUS.)

Qui s’Excuse, s’Accuse. He who apologises condemns himself.

Qui-Tam. A lawyer; so called from the first two words in an action on a penal statute. Qui tam pro domi[n]é Regi[n]d, quam pro se-ipso, sequitur (Who sues on the Queen’s account as much as on his own).

Quis Vive? (French). Who goes there? The challenge of a sentinel.

To be on the qui vive. On the alert; to be quick and sharp; to be on the tip-toe of expectation, like a sentinel. (See above.)

Quis Emptores. A statute passed in the reign of Edward I., and directed against the formation of new manors, whereby feudal lords were deprived of their dues. It is so called from its first two words.

Quibble. An evasion; a juggling with words, is the Welsh chwirbwl (a trill), and not the Latin quid libet (what you please), as is generally given.

Quick at meat, quick at work. In French, “Bonne bête s’acharne en man-gant,” or “Hardi gagneur, hardi mangeur.” The opposite would certainly be true: A dawdle in one thing is a dawdle in all.

The quick and dead. The living and the dead.

Quick Sticks (In). Without more ado; quickly. To cut one’s stick (q.v.) is to start off, and to cut one’s stick quickly is to start off immediately.

Quickly (Dame). Hostess of a tavern in Eastcheap. (Shakespeare: Henry IV., parts i and 2.)

Mistress Quickly. Servant of all-work to Dr. Caius. She says: “I wash, wring, bake, scour, dress meat and drink, make the beds, and do all myself.” She is the go-between of three suitors to Anne Page, and to prove her disin- terestedness she says: “I would my master had Mistress Anne, or I would Master Slender had her, or in sooth I would Master Featon had her. I will do what I can for them all three, for so I have promised; and I’ll be as good as my word: but speciously for Master Featon.” (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Quicksand is sand which shifts its place as if it were alive. (See QUICK.)

Quickset is living hawthorn set in a hedge, instead of dead wood, hurdles, and palings. (See QUICK.)

Quicksilver is argentum vatum (living silver), silver that moves about.
like a living thing. (Anglo-Saxon, cwiccesu felon.)

"Swift as quicksilver
It courses through the natural gates
And alleys of the body."

Shakespeare : Hamlet. 1. 5

Quid, a sovereign; Half a Quid, half a sovereign; Quids, cash or money generally. A suggested derivation may be mentioned. Quo — anything, and Quid pro quo means an equivalent generally. If now a person is offered anything on sale he might say, I have not a quid for your quo, an equivalent in cash.

Then, look up at the old peer, she added, 'I guess you don't often get one of these quids.'—Lady Lovelace. Jumet, Jumet, p. 25.

Quid Libet. Quot-libets and quot-libets. Nice and knotty points, very subtle, but of no value. Quips and quirks. (Latin.)

Quid of Tobacco. A corruption of end (a morsel). We still say "chew the cud."

Quid pro Quo. Tit for tat; a return given as good as that received; a Roland for an Oliver; an equivalent.

Quid Rides. It is said that Landy Foot, a Dublin tobacconist, set up his carriage, and asked Emmett to furnish him with a motto. The words of the motto chosen were Quid vides. The witticism is, however, attributed to H. Callelde, also, who, we are assured, supplied it to one Brandon, a London tobacconist.

"Rides," in English, one syllable. In Latin (whv do you thank it) is a word of two syllables.

Quiddity. The essence of a thing, or that which differentiates it from other things. Schoolmen say Quid est (what is it?) and the reply is, the Quid is so and so, the What or the nature of the thing is as follows. The latter quid being formed into a barbarous Latin noun becomes Quidditas. Hence Quid est (what is it)? Answer: Talis est quidditas (its essence is as follows).

Quidditas. A crotchet, a trifling distinction. (See above.)

Quiddnunk. A political Paul Pry; a pragmatical village politician; a political butcher or jobber. Quiddnunk is the chief character in Murphy’s farce of The Upholsterer, or What News? The words are Latin, and mean “What now?”

“Quid has turned up?” The original of this political busybody was the father of Dr. Arne and his sister, Mrs. Cibber, who lived in King Street, Covent Garden. (See The Tatler, 1704, et al.)

“Familiar to a few quiddnunks.”—The Times.

The Quiddnunk s quiddnunks seem to lose sight of the fact that none of these gentlemen now hold office.”—The Times.

Quiddnunk. Monkey politicians.

Gay has a fable called The Quiddnunk, to show that the death not even of the duke regent will cause any real gap in nature. A monkey who had ventured higher than his neighbours fell from his estate into the river below. For a few seconds the whole tribe stood panic-struck, but as soon as the stream was carried off Master Pug, the monkeys went on with their gambols as if nothing had occurred.

“Ah, says the Never saw the Genesier;
There dwell the nation of Quiddnunks
(So Monomotapa calls monkeys)"

Gay: Tales.

Qui’tetist. (A). One who believes that the most perfect state of man is when the spirit ceases to exercise any of its functions, and is wholly passive. This sect has cropped up at sundry times; but the last who revived it was Michael Molinos, a Spanish priest, in the seventeenth century.

Qui’tenus. The writ of discharge formerly granted to those barons and knights who personally attended the king on a foreign expedition. At their discharge they were exempt from the claim of seigeage or knight’s fee. Subsequently the term was applied to the acquittance which a sheriff receives on settling his account at the Exchequer; and, later still, to any discharge of an account: thus Webster says

“Tou had the trick in mid life to be seek till l had service joint quitenus.”—Duchess of Malfy (1622)

Quietenus. A severe blow; a settler; death, or discharge from life.

“Who would fardle his fear . . .
When he himself might his quitenus make
With a bate lechery .”

Quidnene: In a\n
Quill-drivers. Writing clerks.

Quillot. An evasion. In French “pleadings” each separate allegation in the plaintiff’s charge, and every distinct plea in the defendant’s answer used to begin with qu’il est; whence our quillot, to signify a false charge, or an evasive answer.

“Oh, some authors how to proceed;”

Shakespeare : Love’s Labour’s Lost, iv. 2

Quillot. A hideous dwarf, both fierce and cunning, in The Old Curiosity Shop, by Dickens.

Quinap'alus. The Mrs. Harris of "authorities in citations." If anyone wishes to clench an argument by some quotation, let him cite this ponderous collection.

"What says Quinap'alus: 'Better a witty fool Than a foolish wit.'—Shakespeare: Tenth Night."

Quinbus Flestrin. The man-mountain. So the Lilliputians called Gulliver (chap. ii.). Gay has an ode to this giant.

"Mards of old of him told,
When they say'd Atlas head
Prop'd the skies."

Quinoe (Peter). A carpenter, and manager of the play in Midsummer Night's Dream. He is noted for some strange compounds, such as laughable tragedy, lamentable comedy, tragical mirth, etc.

Quinones (Suero de), in the reign of Juan II., with nine other cavaliers, held the bridge of Orbigo against all comers for thirty-six days, overthrowing in that time seventy-eight knights of Spain and France. Quinones had challenged the world, and such was the result.

Quinquagesima Sunday (Latin, fiftieth). Shrove Sunday, or the first day of the week which contains Ash-Wednesday. It is so called because in round numbers it is the fiftieth day before Easter.

Quinsy. This is a curious abbreviation. The Latin word is cynanche, and the Greek word kuananche, from kuananche, dog strangulation, because persons suffering from quinsy throw open the mouth like dogs, especially mad dogs. From kuananche comes ku'anchy, ku'ney, quisey.

Quintessence. The fifth essence. The ancient Greeks said there are four elements or forms in which matter can exist—fire, or the imponderable form; air, or the gaseous form; water, or the liquid form; and earth, or the solid form. The Pythagoreans added a fifth, which they called ether, more subtle and purer than fire, and possessed of an orbicular motion. This element, which flew upwards at creation, and out of which the stars were made, was called the fifth essence; quintessence therefore means the most subtle extract of a body that can be procured. It is quite an error to suppose that the word means an essence five times distilled, and that the term came from the alchemists. Horace speaks of "kisses which Venus has imbued with the quintessence of her own nectar."

"Swift to their several quarters haste then
The cumbersome elements—earth, blood, air, fire;
But this ethereal quintessence of heaven
Flew upward . . . and turned to stars.
Numberless as thou seest."

_Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 718._

Quintillians. Disciples of Quintilius, held to be a prophetess. These heretical Christians made the Eucharist of bread and cheese, and allowed women to become priests and bishops.

Quip Modest (Thy). Sir, it was done to please myself. Touchstone says: "If I sent a person word that his beard was not well cut, and he replied he cut it to please himself, he would answer with the quip modest, which is six removes from the lie direct; or, rather, the lie direct in the sixth degree.

Quis custodiet custodes? [The shepherds keep watch over the sheep], but who is there to keep watch over the shepherds?

Quisquiliae. Light, dry fragments of things; the small twigs and leaves which fall from trees; hence rubbish, refuse.

Quit. Discharged from an obligation, "acquitted."

"To John I owed great obligation;
But John unhappily thought fit
To publish it to all the nation—
Now John and I are fairly quit."—Prior.

Cry quits. When two boys quarrel, and one has had enough, he says, "Cry quits," meaning, "Let us leave off, and call it a drawn game." So in an unequal distribution, he who has the largest share restores a portion and "cries quits," meaning that he has made the distribution equal. Here quit means "acquittal" or discharge.

Double or quits. In gambling, especially in a small way, one of the players says to the other, "Double or quits?"—that is, the next stake shall be double the present one, and the winnings shall be returned to the loser, in which case both players would leave off as they began.

Quit Rent. A rent formerly paid by a tenant whereby he was released from feudal service.

Quixada (Gutierrez). Lord of Vila-garcia. He discharged a javelin at Sire de Haburdin with such force as to pierce the left shoulder, overthrow the knight, and pin him to the ground. Don Quixote calls himself a descendant of this brave knight.
Quixote (Don). The romance so called is a merciless satire by Cervantes on the chivalric romances of the Middle Ages, and had the excellent effect of putting an end to knight-errantry.

Don Quixote's horse. Rosaline (Spanish, rocinante, a jade previously). (See Horse.)

The wooden-pin wing-horse on which he and Sancho Panza mounted to achieve the liberation of Dolorida and her companions was called Algierin Chariam (wooden-pin wing-bearer).

Quixote of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, sometimes called the Madman. (1682, 1697-1718.)

Quixotis. Having foolish and unpractical ideas of honour, or schemes for the general good, like Don Quixote, a half-crazy reformer or knight of the supposed distressed.

Quix. One who banters or charta another. Daly, manager of the Dublin theatre, laid a wager that he would introduce into the language within twenty-four hours a new word of no meaning. Accordingly, on every wall, or all places accessible, were chalked up the four mystic letters, and all Dublin was inquiring what they meant. The wager was won, and the word remains current in our language.

Quo Warranto. A writ against a defendant (whether an individual or a corporation) who lays claim to something he has no right to; so named because the offender is called upon to show quo warranto [rem] unam paris [by what right or authority he lays claim to the matter of dispute).

Quod. To be in quod—in prison. A corruption of quod, which is a contraction of quadrangle. The quadrangle is the prison enclosure in which the prisoners are allowed to walk, and where whippings used to be inflicted.

Quodling (The Rev. Mr.). Chaplain to the Duke of Buckingham. (Sir Walter Scott: Perpetual of the Peak.)

"Why, said the duke, 'I had caused my little Quodling to go through his oration thus: That whatever evil reports had pervaded current during the lifetime of the worthy monarch whom they had restored to dust that day, Malice herself could not deny that she was born well, married well, bred well, and died well: since she was born in Shadowwell, married to Creswell, lived in Cumberwell and died in Bridewell."—Perpetual of the Peak, chap.

Quondam (Latin). Former. We say, He is a quondam schoolfellow—my former schoolfellow; my quondam friend, the quondam candidate, etc.; also the quondam chancellor, etc.

"My quondam master, but 'twas long since now."—Dryden.

Quor'um. Such a number of persons as are necessary to make up a committee or board; or certain justices without the presence of whom the rest cannot act. Thus, suppose the commission to be named A, B, C, D, E, etc., it would run—"Of these I wish [A, B, C, D, or E] to be one" (quorum minus esse columnae). These honoured names are called "Justices of the Quorum." Slander calls Justice Shallow justice of the peace and quorum. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 1.)

Quos Ego. A threat of punishment for disobedience. The words are from Virgil's Aenid (i. 135), and were uttered by Neptune to the disobedient and rebellious winds.

"Sic mute habuisti, et suasti et a quo ego nostrae sextus gentem subserivisti; sed non ad suavitatem publici servitutis."—Aenid, January, 1626.

Quot. Quo tinguis callis, tu homines tales. As many languages as you know, so many separate individuals you are worth. Attributed to Charles V.

Quota (Latin). The allotted portion or share: the rate assigned to each. Thus we say, "Every man is to pay his quota towards the feast."

Quotem (Caleb). A parish clerk and Jack-of-all-trades, in The Ways of Windsor, by Colman.
R. A. P. Rupees, annas, and pies, in India; corresponding to our £ s. d.

R. I. P. Requiescat in pace.

R. M. T. In the reign of William III, all child-stealers (comprendus) apprehended were branded with red-hot iron: R (rogue) on the shoulders; M (man-slayer) on the right-hand; and T (thief) on the left.

Rab'agas. A demagogue in the kingdom of the king of Monaco. He was won over to the court party by being invited to dine at the palace. (M. Sardou: Rabgas, 1872.)

Rab'bi Abron of Trent. A fictitious sage and wonderful linguist. "who knew the nature of all manner of herbs, beasts, and minerals." (Reynard the Fox, xii.)

Rabbi Bar-Coch'ba, in the reign of the Emperor Hadrian, made the Jews believe that he was the Messiah, because he had the art of breathing fire. (Bockmann: History of Inventions.)

Rabbit. A Welsh rabbit. Toasted cheese, or rather bread and cheese toasted together. (Qu. "rare-bit.")

Rabelais. The English Rabelais, Swift, Sterne, and Thomas Amory have been so called. Voltaire so calls Swift. The modern Rabelais. William Maguin (1794-1814).

Rabelais' Dodge. Rabelais one day was at a country inn, and finding he had no money to pay his score, got himself arrested as a traitor who was forming a project to poison the princes. He was immediately sent to Paris and brought before the magistrates, but, as no tittle of evidence was found against him, was liberated forthwith. By this artifice he not only got out of his difficulty at the inn, but he also got back to Paris free of expense. Fathered on Tarleton also.

Rabelais'ian Licence. The wild grotesque of Rabelais, whether in words or artistic illustrations.

Rabolino or Rablion. The name of Astolpho's horse. Its sire was Wind, and its dam Fire. It fed on unearthly food. (Orlando Furioso.)

Argalia's steed in Orlando Innamorato is called by the same name. (See Horse.)

Rabbin or Rabuno (French). The devil; so called from the Spanish rubo (a tail). In the medieval ages it was vulgarly asserted that the Jews were born with tails; this arose from a confusion of the word rabbi or rabbins with rabbin or rubuno.

Rabsheka, in the satiric of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Sir Thomas Pyn撇. Rabshakeh was the officer sent by Sennacherib to summon the Jews to surrender, and he told them insolently that resistance was in vain. (2 Kings xvii.)

"Next him, let nothing Rabsheka have place. So full of zeal, he has no need of grace." (P. H.)

Raby (Anuara). The model of this exquisite sketch was Miss Millbank, as she appeared to Lord Byron when he first knew her. Miss Millpond (a little farther on in the same canto) is the same lady after marriage. In canto i., Donna Ines is an enlarged portrait of the same person. Lord Byron describes himself in the first instance under the character of Don Juan, and in the last as Don José.

Races. Goodwood Races. So called from Goodwood Park, in which they are held. They begin the last Tuesday of July, and continue four days, of which Thursday (the "cup-day") is the principal. These races are very select, and admirably conducted. (Goodwood Park was purchased by Charles, first Duke of Richmond, of the Compton family, then resident in East Lavant, a village two miles north of Chichester.

The Newmarket Races. There are seven annual race meetings at Newmarket: (1) The Craven; (2) first spring; (3) second spring; (4) July; (5) first October; (6) second October; (7) the Houghton.

The Epsom. So called from Epsom Downs, where they are held. They last four days.

The Derby. The second day (Wednesday) of the great May meeting at Epsom, in Surrey; so called from the Earl of Derby, who instituted the stakes in 1780. This is the great "Classic Race" for colts and fillies three years old.

The Oaks. The fourth day (Friday) of the great Epsom races; so called from "Lambert's Oaks," erected on lease by the "Hunter's Club." The Oaks estate passed to the Derby family, and the twelfth earl established the stakes so called. This is the great "classic race" for fillies three years old.

The St. Leger. The great Doncaster race; so called from Colonel St. Leger, who founded the stakes in 1776. This is the great "classic race" for both colts and fillies of three years old. Horses that have competed in the Derby and Oaks may take part in the St. Leger.

Ascot Races, held on Ascot Heath, in Berks.

Races (Lengths run).

(i) Under a mile and a half

The Newmarket Stakes, 1 mile 2 furlongs.

The Prince of Wales's Stakes (at Leicester), rather less.

The Eclipse Stakes, 1 mile.

The Kemsley Park Stakes, 1 mile.

The Lancashire Plate (at the September Manchester meeting) is only 7 furlongs.

In 1860 the Duke of Portland won all these five races: Anglesea won two of them, and Dronaway the other three.

(ii) Long distances (between 1/4 and 3 miles)

The Great Northampton Stakes, 1 mile.

Ascot (Gold Vase), 2 miles.

Ascot (Gold Cup), 2 miles.

Ascot (Alexander Plate), 3 miles.

The Chester Cup, 2 miles.

The Great Metropolitan Stakes (in the Epsom Spring Meeting), 2 miles.

The Hardwicke Stakes, the Goodwood Cup, 2 miles (in July), and the Doncaster Cup, 2-63 miles (in September), are long races.

Rack'aders. The second tribe of giants or evil genii, who had frequently made the earth subject to their kings, but were ultimately punished by Shiva and Vishnou. (Indian mythology.)

Rack. A "setter," or rather a dog said to hunt wild beasts, birds, and even fishes by scent. The female was called a broach—i.e. bitch-rack. (Saxon, raec; French, brague.)

A "jack of ratches to reun an hare."—Shakespeare: Tempest, iv. 1.

Rack. The instrument of torture so called was a frame in which a man was fastened, and his arms and legs were stretched till the body was lifted by the tension several inches from the floor. Not unfrequently the limbs were forced thereby out of their sockets. Coke says that the rack was first introduced into the Tower by the Duke of Exeter, constable of the Tower, in 1447, whence it was called the "Duke of Exeter's daughter." (Dutch, rak; verb, raken, to stretch: Danish, ræg; Anglo-Saxon, reac.)

Rack-rent. The actual value or rent of a tenement, and not the modified form on which the rates and taxes are usually levied. (Saxon, ræces, to stretch; Dutch, raken.)

"A rent which is equivalent, or nearly equivalent in amount, to the full annual value of the land, is a rack-rent."—Encyclopaedia Britannica, vol. xx, p. 403.

Rack and Manger. Housekeeping. To live at rack and manger. To live at rack and mangle. "To live at rack and manger."—Life of Robin Goodfellow. (1626)

Rack and Ruin. Utter destruction. Here "rack" is a variety of wreck and ruin.

"The worst of all University scholars are those unfortunate who go to rack and run from their desire to ape their betters."—Thackeray: Book of Snobs, chap. xxx. p. 87.

Racket. Noise or confusion, like that of persons playing racket or tennis.

Racy. Having distinctive piquancy, as racy wine. It was first applied to wine, and, according to Cowley, comes to us from the Spanish and Portuguese raza (nodes), meaning having a radical or distinct flavour; but probably it is a corruption of "relishy" (French, releché, flavorful).

"Ruch, racy verse, in which we see

The soul from which they come, taste, smell, and see."—Cowley.

Racy Style. Imitation composition, the very opposite of mockish.

Radcliffe Library (Oxford). Founded by Dr. John Radcliffe, of Wakefield, Yorkshire, (1650-1714.)

"When Kinns William [111] consulted [Radcliffe] on how to swell ankles and thin both, Radcliffe said, 'I would not have your Majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms.'"—Leigh Hunt: The Town, chap. vi.

Redegast. A tutelary god of the Slavs. The head was that of a cow, the breast was covered with an aga, the left hand held a spear, and a cock surmounted its helmet. (Slavonic mythology.)

Radegund. Queen of the Am'azons, "half like a man." Getting the better of Sir Ar'tegal in a single combat, she compelled him to dress in "woman's weeds," with a white apron before him, and to spin flax. Brit'omart, being in- formed by Tulas of his captivity, went to the rescue, cut off the Amazon's head, and liberated her knight. (Spon'ser: Farie Queene, book v. 4-7.)

St. Radegonde or Radegund, wife of Clothaire, King of France.

St.Radegonde's lifted stone. A stone sixty feet in circumference, placed on five supporting stones, said by the historians of Fontou to have been so arranged in 1478, to commemorate a great fair held on the spot in the October of that year. The country people insist that Queen Radegonde brought the impost stone on her head, and the five uptirights in her apron, and arranged them all as they appear to this day.

Radèvere (3 syl.). Tapestry.

"This was a lady, her'd ha' a youth"—
So that she wenten and embroidered kente,
And wenken in stole (the room) the radèvere.
As lye of women's had be wrought sore.

(Chaucer.)

Radical. An ultra-Liberal, verging on republican opinions. The term was first applied as a party name in 1818 to Henry Hunt, Major Cartwright, and others of the same clique, who wished to introduce radical reform in the representative system, and not merely to disfranchise and enfranchise a borough or two. Lord Boilingbrooke, in his Discourses on Parties, says, "Such a remedy might have wrought a radical cure of the evil that threatens our constitution."

Radiometer. The name of an instrument invented by Crookes for measuring the mechanical effect of radiant energy. It is like a miniature anemometer, and is made to revolve by the action of light, the cups of the anemometer being replaced by discs coloured white on one side and black on the other. And the instrument is enclosed in a glass globe from which the air has been exhausted, so that no heat is transmitted.

Rati Usque ad Cuten. He fleeced him to the skin; he sucked him dry. He shaved all his hair (instead of only trimming it).

Rag. A tatter, hence a remnant, hence a vagabond or ragamuffin.

"Irsh hence these overweening rags of France."—Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3.
an imperishable basis. (Scandinavian mythology.)

"And, Frithoef, mayst thou sleep away Till Ragnarok, if such thy will." Frithoef-Saga: Frithoef's Joy.

Ragout is something "more-ish," something you will be served twice to.
(Latin, re-gustus, tasted again. French, re-gouter.)

Hahu. The demon that causes eclipses. One day Hahu stole into Valhalla to quaff some of the nectar of immortality. He was discovered by the Sun and Moon, who informed against him, and Vishnu cut off his head. As he had already taken some of the nectar into his mouth, the head was immortal, and he ever afterwards hunted the Sun and Moon, which he caught occasionally, causing eclipses. (Hindu mythology.)

Rail. To sit on the rail. To shuffle off a direct answer; to hedge or to fence; to reserve the decision of one's vote. Here rail means the fence, and "to sit on the rail" to sit on one side. A common American phrase.

"If he said 'Yes,' there was an end to any church support at once; if 'No,' he might as well go home at once. So he tried to sit on the rail again."—T. Terrell: 'Ladies' Delmar, Chap. 1.

Railway Abbreviations.
C. & D. Collected and delivered—i.e., the rate quoted includes the entire charge from sender to consignee. Such goods are collected by the railway company and delivered according to the address at the price stated.
S. to S. From station to station. This does not include collecting and delivering.
O. R. Owner's risk.
C. R. Company's risk.
O. C. On company's service; such parcels go free.
C. by B. Collection from the sender to the barge, both included.
O/C. Overcharged.
O/S. Outstanding.

Railway King. George Hudson, of Yorkshire, chairman of the North Midland Company, and for a time the Dictator of the railway speculative. In one day he cleared the large sum of £100,000. It was the Rev. Sydney Smith who gave him this designation. (1800-1871.)

Rain

Rainbow Chasers. Problematical politicians and reformers, who chase rainbows, which cannot possibly be caught, to "find the pot of gold at the foot thereof." This alludes to an old joke, that a pot of gold can be dug up where the rainbow touches the earth.

Raining Tree (Thr). The Til, a linden-tree of the Canaries, mentioned by a host of persons. Mandelolo describes it minutely, and tells us that the water which falls from this tree suffices for a plentiful supply for men and beasts of the whole island of Fierro, which contains no river. Glas assures us that "the existence of such a tree is firmly believed in the Canaries" (History of the Canary Islands). Corderyo (Historia Insulana, book ii. chap. v.) says it is an emblem of the Trinity, and that the rain is called Agua Santa. Without doubt a rain falls from some trees (as the line) in hot weather.

Rainy Day (A). Evil times. Lay by something for a rainy day. Save something against evil times.

Raise the Wind. To obtain ready money by hook or crook. A sea phrase. What wind is to a ship, money is to commerce.

"In a trice queer ways
The wind to raise.
But never had such a blow"

Judy (My Lost Dog), Mar. 27, 1886

Rajah. (Sanskrit for king, cognate with the Latin reg' or rca.) Maha-rajah means the "great rajah."

Rake. A libertine. A contraction of rakehell, used by Milton and others.

"And far away amid their rakehell bands
They spend a lady left all uncourteous"

Francis Quarles

Rakshas. Evil spirits who guard the treasures of Kukura, the god of riches. They haunt cemeteries and devour human beings: assume any shape at will, and their strength increases as the day declines. Some are hideously ugly, but others, especially the female spirits, allure by their beauty. (Hindu mythology.)

Rakshah. Rustem's horse in the Shah Nameh of Firdusi, the Homer of Korasan. (See Horse.)

Raleigh. Sir Walter Scott introduces in Kenilworth the tradition of his laying down his cloak on a miry spot for the queen to step on.

"Hark ye, Master Raleigh, see them fail not to wear thy muddy cloak, in token of reverence, till our pleasure be further known."—Sir Walter Scott: Kenilworth, chap. xv.
Rally is re-allow, to bind together again. (French allier.) In Spenser it is spelt re-allie—

"Before they could new consuls re-allie."

—Paulus Quemnae.

"Ye'll rally round the flag, boys, We'll rally once again."

Rally or Ralph. The squire of Hudibras. The model was Isaac Robinson, a zealous butcher in Moorfields, always contriving some queer art of church government. He represents the Independent party, and Hudibras the Presbyterian. Ralph rhymes with half and safe.

Ralph Roister Doister. The title of the earliest English comedy; so called from the chief character. Written by Nicholas Udall. (16th century.)

Ram. The usual prize at wrestling matches. Thus Chaucer says of his Mellerel. "At wrestylings he wolde bere away the ram." (Canterbury Tales: Prologue 530.)

Ram Feast (The). May morning is so called at Holbe, near Dartmoor, because on that day a ram is run down in the "Play Field." It is roasted whole, with its skin and fur, close by a granite pillar. At mid-day a scramble takes place for a slice, which is supposed to bring luck to those who get it. Said to be a relic of Baal worship in England.

Ram and Teazle (The). A public-house sign, is in compliment to the Clothiers' Company. The ram with the golden fleece is emblematical of wool, and the teazle is used for raising the nap of wool spun and woven into cloth.

Ram of the Zodiac (The). This is the famous Chrysomallion, whose golden fleece was stolen by Jason in his Argonautic expedition. It was transposed to the stars, and made the first sign of the Zodiac.

The legend says the Ram is less
Then comes the Bull, in May 11
The Crab in June; next Leo 6th
And Virgo sits the northern 21. C. B.

Ram's Horn. A loud, vulgar, unpollished speaker. A smooth-tongued orator is called a "silver trumpet."

Rama. The seventh incarnation of Vishnu.

The first was the fish; the second, the tortoise; the third, the boar; the fourth, the man-bosom; the fifth, the dwarf; the sixth, Parshu-Rama, son of Jamadagni; the seventh, Rama, son of Dasaratha, King of Ayodhya; the eighth, Krishna or Groshna; the ninth, Buddha; and the last (tenth) will be Kalki, and the consummation of all things—a kind of millennium.

Rama performed many wonderful exploits, such as killing giants, demons, and monsters. He won Sita to wife because he was able to bend the bow of Siva.

Rama-Yana. The history of Rama, the best great epic poem of ancient India, and worthy to be ranked with the Iliad of Homer.

Ramadan. The ninth month of the Mahometan year, and the Mussulman's Lent or Holy Month.

"November is the financial Ramadan of the Sublime Porte."—The Times.

That is, when the Turkish Government promises all kinds of financial reforms and curtailments of national expenses.

Rambouillet. Hôtel de Rambouillet. The r. aim of rank and literary genius on terms of equality; a colère where sparkling wit with polished manners prevails. The Marquise de Rambouillet, in the seventeenth century, reformed the French soirs, and purged them of the gross morals and licentious conversation which at that time prevailed. The present good taste, freedom without licentiousness, wit without double entendre, equality without familiarity, was due to this illustrious Italian. The Précieuses Ritolles of Mollière was a satire on those her imitators who had not her talent and good taste. Catherine, Marquise de Rambouillet (1588-1665).

Ramsass. The conjurer who swallowed swords, and could twist himself into a knot as if he had neither bones nor joints.

Rameses (3 syl). The title of an ancient Egyptian dynasty; it means "offspring of the Sun." This title was first assumed towards the close of the Eighteenth Dynasty, and ran through the Nineteenth. Rameses III. is called Rhampsisinos by Herodotus. Sesastis is supposed to be identical with Rameses the Great. (Ess., 6. Ias.)

Ram'siel (2 syl). One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means one that exalts himself against God.

Raminago'brius. A cat; a vile poet. La Fontaine in several of his fables gives this name to the cat. Rabelais under this name satirises Guillaume Crétin, an old French poet in the reigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and François I. (Rabelais : Pantagruel, iii. 21.)

Rampollian. A term of contempt; probably it means a rampant or wanton woman; hence in A New Trick to Cheat the Devil (1639) we have this line: "And bold rampollian-like, swear and drink drunk."

"Away, you scullion! you rampollian! you tavernman! I'll tackle your catastrophe!"—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., ii. 1.

Ramsay the Rich. Ramsay used to be called the Crosses of our English abbeys. It had only sixty monks of the Benedictine order to maintain, and its revenues allowed £1,000 a year to the abbot, and £100 a year for each of its monks.

David Ramsay. The old watchmaker near Temple Bar.

Margaret Ramsay. His daughter, who became the bride of Lord Nigel. (Sir Walter Scott: Fortunes of Nigel.)

Ramabottom (Mrs.). A vile speller of the Queen’s English. It was the signature of Theodoro Hook in his letters published in the John Bull newspaper, 1829.

Ra’ma. Goddess of the sea, and wife of the sea-god Auger. (Scandinavian mythology.)

"May Ram Auge keep them in the deep,
And no one save them from the grave;"
Cried Heilgenricht.

From any Saga : The Ranshant

Randem-Tandum. A tandem of three horses. (University term.)

Random (Roderick). A young Scotch scapegrace in quest of fortune; at one time banking in prosperity, at another in utter destitution. He is led into different countries, whose peculiarities are described; and into all sorts of society, as that of wits, sharpers, courtesans, and so on. Though occasionally lavish, he is inherently mean, and though possessing a dash of humour, is contemptibly revengeful. His treatment of Strap is revolting to a generous mind. Strap lends him money in his necessity, but the heartless Roderick wastes the loan, treats Strap as a mere servant, fleeces him at dice, and cuffs him when the game is adverse. (Smollett: Roderick Random.)

Rank and File. Soldiers of any grade below that of lance-sergeant are so called, collectively, in military phraseology, and any two soldiers of such grade are spoken of as "a file;" thus, 100 rank and file would equal 50 file, that is, 50 men standing behind each other in a row. No soldier ever talks of files in the plural, or about "a file of fours." As there are two in a "rank," there is a left file and a right file; and men may move in "single file" or in "double file." A line of soldiers drawn up side by side or abreast is a rank.

Rank distinguished by Colour. In China the emperor, empress, and prince imperial wear yellow; the other wives of the emperor wear violet; high state officers wear blue; officials of lower rank wear red; and the general public wear black or some dark shade.

Ranks. Risen from the ranks. From mean origin ; a self-made man. A military term applied to an officer who once served as a private soldier. Such an officer is now often called a "ranker."

Rantipole (3 syl.). A harum-scarum fellow, a madcap (Dutch, randelen, to be in a state of idiocy or insanity, and pole, a head or person). The late Emperor Napoleon III. was called Rantipole, for his escapades at Strasbourg and Boulogne. In 1852 I myself saw a man commanded by the police to leave Paris within twenty-four hours for calling his dog Rantipole.

"Dick, be a little rantipole."—Colman: Heav'n at Law.

Ranz des Vaches. Simple melodies played by the Swiss mountaineers on their Alp-horn when they drive their herds to pasture, or call them home (pour ranger des vaches, to bring the cows to their place).

Rap. Not worth a rap. The rap was a base halfpenny, intrinsically worth about half a farthing, issued for the nonce in Ireland in 1721, because small coin was so very scarce. There was also a coin in Switzerland called a ruppe, worth the seventh of a penny.

"Many counterfeiters passed about under the name of raps."—Swift: Draper’s Letters.

Rape (1 syl.). The division of a county. Sussex is divided into six rapes, each of which has its river, forest, and castle. Hreppr is Norwegian for a parish district, and rape in Doomsday Book is used for a district under military jurisdiction. (Icelandic hreppr, a district.)

Rape of the Lock. Lord Petre, in a thoughtless moment of frolic gallantry, cut off a lock of Arabella Fermor’s hair; and this liberty gave rise to a bitter feud between the two families, which Alexander Pope has worked up into the best heroic-comic poem of the language. The first sketch was published in 1712 in two cantos. The machinery of sylphs and gnomes is most happily conceived. Pope, under the name of Esdras Barnevell, apothecary, says the poem is a covert satire on Queen Anne and the Harrier Treaty. In the poem the lady is called Belinda, and the poet says she wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa. Belinda, in anger, demanded back the ringlet, but it had flown to the skies and become a meteor there. (See COMA BERENT's.)

"Say what strange motive, goddess, could compel
A well-bred lord to assault a gentle belle.
O sea, what stranger cause, yet unexplored,
Could make a gentle belle reverse a lord."

Introduction to the Poem.

Raphael. The sociable archangel who travelled with Tobias into Media and back again, instructing him on the way how to marry Sara and to drive away the wicked spirit. Milton introduces him as sent by God to advertise Adam of his danger. (See SEVEN SPIRITS.)

"Raphael, the sociable spirit, hath designed
To travel with Tobias, and secured
How to rescue with the seven-time-wicked Spirit. Paradise Lost, x 217-8.

Raphael, according to Longfellow, is the angel of the Sun, who brings to man the "gift of faith."

"I am the angel of the Sun,
Whose flaming wheels began to run
When God Almighty's breath
Sent to the darkness and the night,
'Let there be light!' and there was light—
I bring the gift of faith
St. Raphael, the archangel, is usually distinguished in Christian art by a pilgrim's staff, or carrying a fish, in allusion to his aiding Tobias to capture the fish which performed the miraculous cure of his father's eyesight.

Raphael of Cats (The). Godefroi Mind, a Swiss painter, noted for his cats. (1768-1814.)

Rapparee. A wild Irish plunderer; so called from his being armed with a rapier or half-pike. (Irish rappire, a robber.)

Rappee. A coarse species of snuff, manufactured from dried tobacco by an instrument called in French a rapec, "instrument en metal percé de plusieurs trous, dont on se sert pour reduire les corps en pulpe ou en fragments. On se sert surtout de la rapiè dans les ménages, pour le sucre, le chocolat, le poivre; et dans les usines, pour le tabac, les betteraves, les pommes de terre qu'on réduit en féculent."

(René: Dictionnaire des Sciences.)

Rara Avis (Latin, a rare bird). A phenomenon, a prodigy; a something quite out of the common course. Black swans are now familiar to us, they are natives of Australia, and have given its name to the "Swan river." At one time a black swan was emphatically a rara avis.

"Rara avis inedes hortorum similia cugae."

Rarey Ben. So Shakespeare called Ben Jonson, the dramatist. (1574-1637.) Aubrey says that this inscription on his tablet in the "Poets' Corner," Westminster Abbey, was done at the charge of Jack Young (afterwards knighted), who, walking there when the grave was covering, gave the fellow eighteenpence to cut it. At the late relaying of the paving at this stone was unhappily removed. When Sir William Davenant was interred in Westminster Abbey, the inscription on his covering-stone was, "O rare Sir William Davenant"—showing how nearly the sublime and the ridiculous often meet.

Rare Show. A prep-show, a show carried about in a box.

Rascal. Originally applied in the chase to a lean, worthless deer, then a collective term for the commonalty, the mob; and popularly to a base fellow. Shakespeare says, "Horns! the noblest deer hath them as huge as the rascal." [deer]. Palegrave calls a starveling animal, like the lean kine of Pharaoh, "a rascal ruffian beast." (1530). The French have racelle (ruff-ruff).

Rascal Counter. Pitiful or paltry £ 4 d. Brute; calls money paltry compared with friendship, etc.

"When Marcus Brutus grew so covetous, To lock such rascal counter from his friends, He read, I see, with all your thunderbolts, Bash him in the gores." - Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, v. 1.

Rasher. A slice, as a rasher of bacon.

Rashleigh Osbaldstone. An accomplished but deceitful villain, called "the scholar." He is the youngest of the six hopeful sons of Sir Hildebrand Osbaldstone. The six brothers were nicknamed "the set," "the bully," "the gamekeeper," "the horse-jockey,"
“the fool,” and the crafty “scholar.”
(Sir Walter Scott: Rob Roy.)

Rasiel. The angel who was the tutor of Adam. (Talmud.)

Raspberry. Rhyming slang for “heart,” as “it made my raspberry cheet.” (See Chivy.)

Rasselas. Prince of Abyssinia, in
Dr. Johnson’s romance so called.

"Rasselas is a mass of sense, and its moral precepts are certainly conveyed in striking and happy language. The mad astronomer who imagined that he possessed the regulation of the weather and the distribution of the seasons, is an original character in romance; and the happy valley in which Rasselas resides is sketched with poetical feeling."—Young.

Rat. The Egyptians and Phrygians deified rats. The people of Bassora and Cambay to the present time forbid their destruction. In Egypt the rat symbolised “utter destruction;” it also symbolised “judgment,” because rats always choose the best bread for their relish.

Rat. Pliny tells us (bk. viii. ch. lvii.) that the Romans drew presages from these animals, and to see a white rat foreboded good fortune. The bucklers at Lanuvium being gnawed by rats sagged ill-fortune, and the battle of the Marses, fought soon after, confirmed this superstition. Prosperine’s veil was embroidered with rats.

Irish rats rhymed to death. It was once a prevalent opinion that rats in pasturages could be extirpated by anathematising them in rhyming verse or by metrical charms.
This notion is frequently alluded to by ancient authors. Thus, Ben Jonson says: "Rhyme them to death, as they do Irish rats" (Poetaster); Sir Philip Sidney says: "Though I will not wish unto you . . . to be rimed to death, as is said to be done in Ireland" (Defence of Poesse); and Shakespeare makes Rosalind say: "I was never so berhymed since . . . I was an Irish rat," alluding to the Pythagorean doctrine of the transmigration of souls (As You Like It, ii. 2). (See Charm.)

I smell a rat. I perceive there is something concealed which is mischievous.
The allusion is to a cat smelling a rat.

Rat (To). To forsake a losing side for the stronger party. It is said that rats forsake ships not weatherproof. A rat is one who rats or deserts his party.
Hence workmen who work during a strike are called “rats.”

"Averting . . .
The cup of sorrow from their lips.
And fly like rats from sinking ships."
(Shakespeare: Sonnet to Mr. Fugent.)

Rat (Un). A purse. Hence, a young boy thief is called a Ratwh. A sort of pun on the word rapt from the Latin raptae, to carry off forcibly. Courir le rat, to rob or break into a house at night-time.

To take a rat by the tail, or Prendre un rat par la queue, is to cut a purse. A phrase dating back to the age of Louis XIII., and inserted in Cotgrave’s Dictionary. Of course, a cutpurse would cut the purse at the string or else he would spill the contents.

Rat, Cat, and Dog.
"The Rat, the Cat, and Lovel the Dog, Rule all England under the bow." (See Cat.

* The Rat, i.e., Rat-cliff: the Cat, i.e., Cat-esby; and Lovel the dog, is Francis,
Viscount Lovel, the king’s “spaniel.”
The bow or bough was the crest of Richard III. William Collingham, the author of this rhyme (1413), was put to death for his pregnant wit.

Rat-killer. Apollo received this aristocratic sobriquet from the following incident:—Cliness, one of his priests, having neglected his official duties, Apollo sent against him a swarm of rats; but the priest, seeing the invaders coming, repented and obtained forgiveness of the god, who annihilated the swarms which he had sent with his fardarting arrows. For this redoubtable exploit the sun-god received the appellation of Apollo the Rat-killer. (Classie mythology.)

Rat’s toek. The squirrel that runs up and down the mythological tree
Yggdrasil. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Ratten (To). To annoy for refusing to join a trade union, or for not submitting to its demands. This is done by destroying or taking away a workman’s tools, or otherwise incapacitating him from doing work. “To rat” is to desert one’s party; to work for less than the price fixed by a trade union; and “raten” is to act the part of a rat. (See Rat.)

Rattlin (Jack). A famous naval character in Smollett’s Onderick Raudoun.
Tom Bowling is another naval character in the same novel.

Raul. Sir Raul di Nangus, the Huguenot, in love with Valentina, daughter of the Comte de St. Bris, governor of the Louvre. Being sent for by Marguerite, he is offered the hand of Valentina in marriage, but rejects it, because he fancies she is betrothed to the Comte de Nevers. Nevers is slain in the Ravna

Bartholomew massacre, and Valentina confesses her love for Raul. They are united by Marcello, an old Puritan servant, but scarcely is the ceremony ended when both are shot by the musketeers under the command of St. Bris. (Meyerbeer: Gli Umorotti, an opera.)

Ravna, according to Indian mythology, was fastened down between heaven and earth for 10,000 years by Siva's leg, for attempting to move the hill of heaven to Ceylon. He is described as a demon giant with ten faces. (Hindu mythology.)

Ravelin (The) or demi-lune, in fortification. A work with two faces, forming a salient angle, placed beyond the main ditch, opposite the curtain (q.e.), and separated from the covered way (q.e.) by a ditch which runs into the main ditch.

Raven. A bird of ill omen. They are said to forebode death and bring infection. The former notion arises from their following an army under the expectation of finding dead bodies to ravens on; the latter notion is a mere offshoot of the former, seeing pestilence kills as fast as the sword.

"The hooding raven on her cottage sat,
And with her universal doom did dot.

Gay: Pastoriæ; The Darg."

"Like the soul-preserving raven that tells
The sick man's passport in her hollow beak,
And in the shadow of the silent night,
Does shake contraction from her silent wing;"

Mallore: Jes of Malta (1633).

Raven. Jovinianus Pontanus relates two skirmishes between ravens and kites near Beneventum, which prognosticated a great battle. Niceas speaks of a skirmish between crows and ravens as pressuring the interruption of the Scythians into Thrace. He also tells us that his friend Mr. Draper, in the flower of his age and robust health, knew he was at the point of death because two ravens flew into his chamber. Cicero was forewarned of his death by the fluttering of ravens, and Macaulay relates the legend that a raven entered the chamber of the great orator the very day of his murder, and pulled the clothes off his bed. Like many other birds, ravens indicate by their cries the approach of foul weather, but "it is ful unlyfeful to beleve that God sheweth His prey consouylie to crowes, as Isidore sayth."

He has the foresight of a raven. A raven was accounted at one time a prophetic bird. (See above.)

"Of inspired birds ravens are accounted the most prophetic. Accordingly, in the language of that district, 'to have the foresight of a raven' is equal to a proverbial expression. - Macaulay: History of St. Killa, p. 174.

Ravens bode famine. When a flock of ravens bear the characters of Saturn, the author of these calamities, and have a very early perception of the bad disposition of that planet." (See Athenian Oracle, Supplement, p. 476.)

"As if the great god Jupiter had nothing else to do, but to drive about jacks-daws and ravens."—Carmody.

Ravens were once as white as swans, and not inferior in size; but one day a raven told Apollo that Coro'nis, a Thessalian nymph whom he passionately loved, was faithless. The god shot the nymph with his dart; but, hating the tall-tale bird—

"He blacked the raven o'er,
And bad him prete in his white plumes no more."

Addison: Translation of Ovid, bk. ii.

Ravens in Christian art. Emblems of God's Providence, in allusion to the ravens which fed Elijah. St. Oswald holds in his hand a raven with a ring in its mouth; St. Benedict has a raven at his feet; St. Paul the Hermit is drawn with a raven bringing him a loaf of bread, etc.

The fatal raven, consecrated to Odin, the Danish war-god, was the emblem on the Danish standard. This raven was said to be possessed of necromantic power. The standard was termed Landerdala (the desolation of the country), and miraculous powers were attributed to it. The fatal raven was the device of Odin, god of war, and was said to have been woven and embroidered in one noontide by the daughters of Reguer Lobbrok, son of Sigurd, that dauntless warrior who chanted his death-song (the Kravamli) while being stung to death in a horrible pit filled with deadly serpents. If the Danish arms were destined to defeat, the raven hung his wings; if victory was to attend them, he stood erect and soaring, as if inviting the warriors to follow.

"The Danish raven, lured by annual prey, Hung over the land incessant."—Thomson: Liberty, p. iv.

The two ravens that sat on the shoulders of Odin are called Hugin and Muninn (Mind and Memory).

One raven will not pluck another's eyes out (German, "Keine krähé hacht der anderen die ungen aus"). Friends will not "peach" friends; you are not to take for granted all that a friend says of a friend.

Ravenglass (Cumberland). A corruption of Afon-glass (Blue river).
Ravenstone. The stone gibbet of Germany; so called from the ravens which are wont to perch on it. (German ravenstein.)

"Do you think I'll honour you so much as save your neck From the Ravenstone, by choking you myself?" Byron: Werner, II. 2.

Master Edgar Ravenwood. His son, who falls in love with Lucy Ashton, daughter of Sir William Ashton, Lord-Keeper of Scotland. The lovers plight their troth at the Mermaid's Fountain, but Lucy is compelled to marry Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklow. The bride, in a fit of insanity, attempts to murder the bridegroom and dies in convulsions. Bucklow recovers, and goes abroad. Colonel Ashton, seeing Edgar at the funeral of Lucy, appoints a hostile meeting; and Edgar, on his way to the place appointed, is lost in the quicksands of Kelpies-flow. (Sir Walter Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

In Donizetti's opera of Lucia di Lammermoor, Bucklow dies of the wound inflicted by the bride, and Edgar, heart-broken, comes on the stage and kills himself, that "his marriage with Lucy, forbidden on earth, may be consummated in heaven."

Raw. To touch one on the raw. To mention something that makes a person wince, like touching a horse on a raw place in cleaning him.

Raw Lobster (A). A policeman. Lobsters before they are boiled are a dark blue. A soldier dressed in scarlet is a lobster: a policeman, or sort of soldier, dressed in dark blue is a raw lobster. The name was given to the raw force by the Weekly Dispatch newspaper, which tried to write it down.

Rawhead and Bloody-Bones. A bogie at one time the terror of children.

"Servants saw children and keep them in subjection by telling them of Rawhead and Bloody-bones."—Locke.

Raymond (in Jerusalem Delivered). Master of 4,000 infantry, Count of Toulouse, equal to Godfrey in the "wisdom of cool debate" (bk. iii.). This Nestor of the Crusaders slew Aladine, the king of Jerusalem, and planted the Christian standard upon the tower of David (bk. xx.).

Rayne or Raine (Essex). Go and say your prayers at Raine. The old church of Raine, built in the time of Henry II., famous for its altar to the Virgin, and much frequented at one time by pregnant women, who went to implore the Virgin to give them safe deliverance.

Razel Shoes, referred to in Hamlet, are slashed shoes.

"Would not this suit, with two Provenal roses on my razed shoes, set me a fellowship in a ri of players, Mr. W?"—Act III. 2.

Razee (raz-e). A ship of war cut down to a smaller size, as a seventy-four reduced to a frigate. (French, raser.)

Razor. Having blocks with a razor. Livy relates how Tarquinus Priscus, defying the power of Attus Navius, the augur, said to him, "Tell me, if you are so wise, whether I can do what I am now thinking about." "Yes," said Navius. "Ha! ha!" cried the king; "I was thinking whether I could cut in twain that whetstone with a razor." "Cut boldly!" answered the augur, and the king clef it in twain at one blow.

Razia. An incursion made by the military into an enemy's country, for the purpose of carrying off cattle or slaves, or for enforcing tribute. It is an Arabic word much employed in connection with Algerine affairs.

"War is a razia rather than an art to the . . . merciless Pelasgus."—The Standard.

Reach of a river. The part which lies between two points or bends; so called because it reaches from point to point.

"When he drew near them he would turn from each, And loudly whistle till he passed the Reach." Crabbe: Borough.

Read between the Lines. (See under LINES.)

Reade or Read (Simon), alluded to by Ben Jonson in the Alchemist, i. 2, was Simon Read, of St. George's, Southwark, professor of physic, Rymer, in his Peadra, vol. xvi., says, "he was indicted for invoking evil spirits in order to find out the name of a person who, in 1608, stole £73 10s. from Tobias Mathews, of St. Mary Steyning, London.

Reader. In the University of Oxford, one who reads lectures on scientific subjects. In the Inns of Court, one who reads lectures in law. In printing, one who reads and corrects the proof-sheets of any work before publication; a corrector of the press.
Ready (The). An elliptical expression for ready-money. Goldsmith says, "As in present perfection formal"; ("Ready-money makes a man perfect"). (Etym Latin Grammar.)

"Lord Strat is not very flush in the 'ready.'"
—Dr. Arbuthnot.

Ready to - Halt. A pilgrim that journeyed to the Celestial city on crutches. He joined the party under the charge of Mr. Greatheart, but "when he was sent for" he threw away his crutches, and, lo! a chariot bore him into Paradise. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.)

Real Jam. Prime stuff, a real treat, something delightful. Of course, the allusion is to jam given to children for a treat.

"There must have been a charming climate in Paradise, and the cannibal blith [there]... was real jam."—Sam Stodd: Human Nature.

Real Presence. The doctrine that Christ Himself is really and substantially present in the bread and wine of the Eucharist after consecration.

Rear-mouse or Here-mouse. The bat. (Anglo-Saxon hære-mus, the fluttering-mouse; verb, hære-an, to flutter.) Of course, the "bat" is not a winged mouse.

Reason. The Goddess of Reason, November 10th, 1733. Mlle. Candeille, of the Opéra, was one of the earliest of these goddesses, but Mme. Momoro, wife of the printer, the Goddess of Liberty, was the most celebrated. On November 10th a festival was held in Notre Dame de Paris in honour of Reason and Liberty, when women represented these "goddesses." Mlle. Candeille wore a red Phrygian cap, a white frock, a blue mantle, and tricolour ribbons. Her head was filleted with oak-leaves, and in her hand she carried the pike of Jupiter-People. In the cathedral a sort of temple was erected on a mound, and in this "Temple of Philosophy" Mlle. Candeille was installed. Young girls crowned with oak-leaves were her attendants, and sang hymns in her honour. Similar installations were repeated at Lyons and other places. (See Liberty, Goddess of.)

Mlle. Maillard, the actress, is mentioned by Lamartine as one of these goddesses, but played the part much against her will.

Mlle. Aubry was another Goddess of Reason.

Rebec'a. Daughter of Isaac the Jew, in love with Ivanhoe. Rebecca, with her father and Ivanhoe, being taken prisoners, are confined in Front de Beauforton castle. Rebecca is taken to the turret chamber and left with the old sibyl there; but when Brian de Bois Guilbert comes and offers her insult she spurns him with heroic disdain, and, rushing to the verge of the battlements, threatens to throw herself over if he touches her. Ivanhoe, who was suffering from wounds received in a tournament, is nursed by Rebecca. Being again taken prisoner, the Grand Master commands the Jewish maiden to be tried for sorcery, and she demands a trial by combat. The demand is granted, when Brian de Bois Guilbert is appointed as the champion against her; and Ivanhoe undertakes her defence, says Brian, and Rebecca is set free. To the general disappointment of novel-readers, after all this excitement Ivanhoe tamely marries the lady Rowena, a "vapid piece of Still life," Rebecca pays the newly-married pair a wedding visit, and then goes abroad with her father to get out of the way. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Rebec'cates (4 syl.). Certain Welsh rioters in 1843, whose object was to demolish turnpike gates. The name was taken from Rebekah, the bride of Isaac. When she left her father's house, Laban and his family "blessed her," and said, "Let thy seed possess the gate of those that hate them." (Gen. xxiv. 60.)

Rebellion (The). The revolts in behalf of the House of Stuart in 1715 and 1745; the former in behalf of the Chevalier de St. George, son of James II., called the Old Pretender, and the latter in favour of Charles Edward, usually termed the Young Pretender.

The Great Revolt. The revolt of the Long Parliament against Charles I. (1642-1646.)

The Great Irish Rebellion, 1789. It was caused by the creation of numerous Irish societies hostile to England, especially that called "The United Irishmen." There have been eight or nine other rebellions. In 1665 the Irish applied to France for soldiers; in 1597 they offered the crown of Ireland to Spain; in 1796 they concluded a treaty with the French Directory.

Rebus (Latin, with things). A hieroglyphic riddle, "non verbis sed rebus." The origin of the word and custom is this: The basochiens of Paris, during the carnival, used to satirise the current follies of the day in squibs called De rebus quae graviter (on the current events). That these squibs might not be accounted libellous, they employed hieroglyphics either wholly or in part.
Reception (To get a), in theatrical language means to be welcomed with applause from the front, when you make your first appearance for the night. This signifies that the audience recognizes your established reputation.

Rechabites (3 syl.). A religious sect founded by Jonadab, son of Rechab, who enjoined his family to abstain from wine and to dwell in tents. (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7.)

Receipt is a direction for compounding or mixing together certain ingredients to make something required. It also means a written discharge to a debtor for the payment of a debt.

Recipe (3 syl.), Receipt. Recipe is Latin for take, and contractio of is used in doctor's prescriptions. The dash through the R is an abbreviated form of ρ, the symbol of Jupiter, and ρ means Recipe, deo volente.

Beck his own Rede (To). Give heed to his own counsel. (Old English, Rec[ean], to heed; Red, counsel, advice.)

Reckoning without your Host. To guess what your expenses at an hotel will be before the bill has been delivered: to enter upon an enterprise without knowing the cost.

"We thought that now our troubles were over... but we reckoned without our host."—Macmillan's Magazine, 1887.

Reels'tm (3 syl.). To turn from evil ways. This is a term in falconry, and means to call back the hawk to the wrist. This was done when it was unruly, that it might be smoothed and tamed. (Latin, re-claim.)

Recorded. Death recorded means that the sentence of death is recorded or written by the recorder against the criminal, but not verbally pronounced by the judge. This is done when capital punishment is likely to be remitted. It is the verbal sentence of the judge that is the only sufficient warrant of an execution. The sovereign is now not consulted about any capital punishment.

Rec'rrent is one who cries out (French, recruteur); alluding to the judicial combats, when the person who wished to give in cried for mercy, and was held a coward and infamous. (See CRAVEN.)

Rector. (See Clerical Titles.)

Reculer pour Mieux Sauter. To run back in order to give a better jump forwards; to give way a little in order to take up a stronger position.

"Where the empire sets its foot, it cannot withdraw without much loss of credit, whereas reculer peut mieux sauter must often be the most effective action in that tide of European civilization which is slowly, but surely, advancing into the heart of the Dark Continent."—Nineteenth Century, December, 1862, p. 190.

Reculver. The antiquities of this place are fully described in Antiquitates Rutupinae, by Dr. Batteley (1711). It was a Roman fort in the time of Claudius.

Red. The colour of magic.

"Red is the colour of magic in every country, and has been so from the very earliest times. The caps of magicians and musicians are well-nigh always red."—Essewes: Fairy and Folk Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 61.

Red applied to gold. Hence a gold watch is a "red kettle."

"Thou shin'st not an honest nature; ne'er speak for thy master; there's a red queen to do the hangman's work."—Bunyan and Fletcher: Nat Larv., v. 4.

Red Basque Cap. The cognizance of Don Carlos, pretender to the Spanish throne.

Red Book. The book which gave account of the court expenditure in France before the Revolution was so called because its covers were red. We have also a "Red Book" in manuscript, containing the names of all those who held lands per baroniam in the reign of Henry II., with other matters pertaining to the nation before the Conquest. (Ryley, 667.)

Red Book of the Exchequer (The). Liber Rubens Scaccarii in the Record Office. It was compiled in the reign of Henry III. (1246), and contains the returns of the tenants in capite in 1166, who certify how many knights' fees they hold, and the names of those who hold or held them, also much other matter from the Pipe Rolls and other sources. It has not yet (1895) been printed, but is described in Sims' Manual (p. 41), Thomas's Handbook (p. 255), and in the Record Report of 1887 (pp. 166-177). A separate account of it was printed by Hunter in 1837. It contains the only known fragment of the Pipe Roll of Henry II., and copies of the important Inquisition returned into the exchequer in 13 John. It is not written in red ink. (Communicated by A. Oldham.)

Red Boots. A pair of red boots. A Tartar phrase, referring to a custom of cutting the skin of a victim round the upper part of the ankles, and then stripping it off at the feet. A Tartar will say, “When you come my way again, I will give you a pair of red boots to go home in.”

Red-breasts. Bow Street runners, who wore a scarlet waistcoat.

“The Bow Street runners ceased out of the land soon after the introduction of the new police, I remember them very well as standing about the door of the office in Bow Street. They had no other uniform than a blue dress-coat, brass buttons... and a bright red cloth waistcoat... The slang name for them was ‘Red-breasts.’” —Dickens: Letters, vol. ii. p. 178.

Red Button (A). A mandarin of the first class, whose badge of honour is a red button in his cap.

“An interview was granted to the admiral (not by Kipling, the imperial commissioner, but) the third man in the empire, a mandarin of first class and red button.” —Howitt: History of England, 1841; p. 171.

Red Cap (Mother). An old nurse “at the Hungerford Stairs.” Dame Ursley or Ursula, another nurse, says of her rival—

“She may do very well for skipper’s wive, clandes’ daughter, and such like, but nobody shall wait on pretty Mistress Marjorie... except me and saving myself.” —Sir Walter Scott: Patter of Melrose.

Red Coats in fox-hunting (or scarlet) is a badge of royal livery, fox-hunting being ordained by Henry II. a royal sport.

Red Cock. The red cock will crow in his hour. His house will be set on fire.

“We’ll see if the red cock crow not in his hornie bargain, ne’er mornig.” What does she mean?” said Munroer. “Fine-maun” answered the... dominie.” —Sir Walter Scott: Guy Munroer, chap. iii.

Red Comyn. Sir John Comyn of Badenoch, son of Marjory, sister of King John Balliol; so called from his ruddy complexion and red hair, to distinguish him from his kinsman “Black Comyn,” whose complexion was swarthy and hair black. He was stabbed by Sir Robert Bruce in the church of the Minorites at Dumfries, and afterwards dispatched by Lindesay and Kirkpatrick.

Red Cross (The). The badge of the royal banner of England till those of St. Patrick and St. Andrew were added.

“The fall of Rouen (1419) was the fall of the whole province... and the red cross of England waved on all the towers of Normandy.” —Howitt: History of England, vol. i. p. 543.

Red Cross Knight, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene, is the impersonation of holiness, or rather the spirit of Christianity. Politically he typifies the Church of England. The knight is sent forth by the queen to slay a dragon which ravaged the kingdom of Una’s father. Having achieved this feat, he marries Una (q.e.d.). (Book i.)

Red Feathers (The). The Duke of Cornwall’s Light Infantry. They cut two pieces General Wayne’s brigade in the American War, and the Americans vowed to give them no quarter. So they mounted red feathers that no others might be subjected to this threat. They still wear red puggarees on Indian service. (See LACEDEMONIANS.)

Red Flag (A). (i) In the Roman empire it signified war and a call to arms.

Hoisted by British seamen, it indicates that no concession will be made.

As a railway signal, it intimates danger, and warns the engine-driver to stop.

(iii) In France, since 1791, it has been the symbol of insurrection and terrorism.

(iv) It is a synonym of Radicalism and Anarchy.

“Mr. Chamberlain sticks to the red flag, and apparently believes in its ultimate success.” —Newspaper paragraph, January, 1860.

Red Hand of Ulster. In an ancient expedition to Ireland, it was given out that whoever first touched the shore should possess the territory which he touched. O’Neill, seeing another boat likely to overstep his own, cut off his left hand and threw it on the coast. From this O’Neill the princes of Ulster were descended, and the motto of the O’Neills is to this day “Lamb drogy Erin” (red hand of Erin). (See HAND.)

Red-handed. In the very act; with red blood still on his hand.

“I had some trouble to save him from the fury of those who had caught him red-handed.” —The Times (a correspondent).

Red Hat (The). The cardinalate.

“David Beaton was born of good family... and was raised to a red hat by Pope Paul III. 1541:—France: Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 81.

Red Heads. (See SCHITZER.)

Red Herring (The) of a novel is a hint or statement in the early part of the story to put the reader on the wrong scent. In all detective stories a red herring is trailed across the scent. The allusion is to trailing a red herring on the ground to destroy the scent and set the dogs at fault. A “red herring” is a herring dried and smoked.

Red Herring. Drawing a red herring across the path. Trying to divert attention from the main question by some side-issue. A red herring drawn across a fox’s path destroys the scent and sets the dogs at fault.
Red Indians

Neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. Something insipid and not good eating. Neither one thing nor another.

Red Indians (of Newfoundland). So called because they daub their skin, garments, canoes, weapons, and almost everything with red ochre.

"Whether it is merely a custom, or whether they daub their skin with red ochre to protect it from the attacks of mosquitoes and black flies, which swarm by myriads in the woods and wilds during the summer, it is not possible to say."—Lady Blake: Nineteenth Century, Dec. 1868, p. 340.

Red Kettle (A). Properly a gold watch, but applied, in thieves' slang, to any watch.

Gold is often called red, hence "red ruddocks" (gold coin).

Red Land (The). The jurisdiction over which the Vehmgerecht of Westphalia extended.

Red-lattice Phrases. Pot-house talk. Red-lattice at the doors and windows was formerly the sign that an alehouse was duly licensed; hence our chequers. In some cases "lattice" has been converted into letter, and the colour of the alternate checks changed to green: such a sign used to be in Brownlow Street, Holborn. Sometimes, without doubt, the sign had another meaning, and announced that "tables" were played within; hence Gayton, in his Notes on Don Quixote (p. 340), in speaking of our public-house signs, refers to our notices of "billiards, kettlenoddy-boards, tables, truncks, showelboards, fox-and-goose, and the like." It is not certain that signs with the sign of the chequers were not uncommon among the Romans. (See a view of the left-hand street of Pompeii, presented by Sir William Hamilton to the Society of Antiquaries.) (See LATTICE.)

"1. I myself sometimes, leaving the fear of heaven on the left hand, ... am fail to shuffle, to hedge and to lurch; and yet you, rogue, will encourage your race... your red-lattice phrases... under the shelter of your honour."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Red Laws (The). The civil code of ancient Rome. Juvenal says, "Per legem rubras majoram legis" (Satires, xiv. 193). The civil laws, being written in vermilion, were called rubricae, and rubricae vetustae means, It is forbidden by the civil laws.

The praetor's laws were inscribed in white letters as Quintilian informs us (xii. 4, "praetores reliquiae sunt in alio propositos"). The imperial rescripts were written in purple.

Red-letter Day. A lucky day; a day to be recalled with delight. In almanacks, saints' days and holidays are printed in red ink, other days in black.

"That day... writes the doctor, was truly a red-letter day to us."—Wauchope: Stanley's EMU Expedition, chap. xi. p. 111.

Red Man. The French, say that a red man commands the elements, and wrecks off the coast of Britany those whom he dooms to death. The legend affirms that he appeared to Napoleon and foretold his downfall.

Red Men. W. Hepworth Dixon tells us that the Mormons regard the Red Indians as a branch of the Hebrew race, who lost their priesthood, and with it their colour, intelligence, and physiognomy, through disobedience. In time the wild-olive branch will be restored, become white in colour, and will act as a nation of priests. (New America, i. 15.)

Red Rag (The). The tongue. In French, Le chiffon rouge; and balancer le chiffon rouge means to prate.

"Discovering in his mouth a tongue, he must not his tale ever talk, so keeps it running all day long. And knows his red rag can talk."—Petr Pinder: Lord B. and his M:view.

Red Republicans. Those extreme republicans of France who scruple not to dye their hands in blood in order to accomplish their political object. They used to wear a red cap. (See CANNIBALS.)

Red Rose Knight (The). Tom Thumb or Tom-a-lin. Richard Johnson, in 1597, published a "history of this ever-remowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed the Boast of England..."

Red Rot (The). The Sun-dew (g.r.); so called because it occasions the rot in sheep.

Red Sea. The sea of the Red Man—i.e. Edom. Also called the "saggy sea," because of the sea-weed which collects there.

Red shanks. A Highlander; so called from a buskin formerly worn by them; it was made of undressed deer's hide, with the red hair outside.

Red Snow and Gory Dew. The latter is a slimy damp-like blood which appears on walls. Both are due to the presence of the algae called by botanists Phaeoblastus crustatus and Hematococcus sanguineus, which are of the lowest forms of vegetable life.
Red Tape. Official formality; so called because lawyers and government officials tie their papers together with red tape. Charles Dickens introduced the phrase.

"There is a good deal of red tape at Scotland Yard, as anyone may find who has any business to transact there."—W. Terrell: Lady Dedmar, bk. iii. 2.

Red Tape. Dressing Edward VI. "First a shirt was taken up by the Care Equerry-in-Waiting, who passed it to the First Lord of the Buckhounds, who passed it to the Second Gentleman of the Bedchamber, who passed it to the Head Ranger of Windsor Forest, who passed it to the Third Groom of the Stole, who passed it to the Chancellor Royal of the Duchy of Lancaster, who passed it to the Master of the Wardrobe, who passed it to Norroy King-of-Arms, who passed it to the Constable of the Tower, who passed it to the Chief Steward of the Household, who passed it to the Hereditary Grand Diaperer, who passed it to the Lord High Admiral of England, who passed it to the Archbishop of Canterbury, who placed it to the First Lord of the Bedchamber, who put it on the young king."—Mark Twain: The Prince and the Pauper, p. 143.

Red Tapism. The following is from Truth, Feb. 10th, 1887, p. 207:—There was an escape of gas at Cambridge Barracks, and this is the way of proceeding: The escape was discovered by a private, who reported it to his corporal; the corporal reported it to the colour-sergeant, and the colour-sergeant to the quartermaster-sergeant. The quartermaster-sergeant had to report it to the quartermaster, and the quartermaster to the colonel commanding the regiment. The colonel had to report it to the commissariat officer in charge of the barracks, and the commissariat officer to the barrack-sergeant, who had to report it to the divisional officer of engineers. This officer had to report it to the district officer of engineers, and he to the clerk of works, Royal Engineers, who sends for a gasman to see if there is an escape, and report back again. While the reporting is going on the barracks are burnt down.

Red Tincture. That preparation which the alchemists thought would convert any baser metal into gold. It is sometimes called the Philosopher's Stone, the Great Elixir, and the Great Magisterium. (See WHITE TINCTURE.)

Redan. The simplest of fieldworks, and very quickly constructed. It consists simply of two faces and an angle formed thus, the angle being towards the object of attack. A corruption of redon. (Latin.)

Redder (The). The adviser, the person who redes or interferes. Thus the proverb, "The redder gets the worst lick of the fray."

"Those that in quarrels interfere must wipe themselves a bloody nose."

Redding-strake (A). A blow received by a peacemaker, who interferes between two combatants to red or separate them; proverbially, the severest blow a man can receive.

"Say I not, 'tis a make not, meddle not; beware of the redding-strake."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxiv.

Redgauntlet. The sobriquet of Fitz-Aldin, given him from the great slaughter which he made of the Southron, and his reluctance to admit them to quarter. The sobriquet was adopted by him as a surname, and transmitted to his posterity. A novel by Sir W. Scott. (See chap. viii.)

Redgauntlet. A novel told in a series of letters by Sir Walter Scott. Sir Edward Hugh Redgauntlet, a Jacobite conspirator in favour of the Young Pretender, Charles Edward, is the hero. When George III. was crowned he persuaded his niece, Lilia Redgauntlet, to pick up the glove thrown down by the king's champion. The plot ripened, but when the prince positively refused to dismiss his mistress, Miss Walkinshaw—a sine qua non with the conspirators—the whole enterprise was given up. General Campbell arrived with the military, the prince left Scotland, Redgauntlet, who embarked with him, became a prior abroad, and Lilia, his niece, married her brother's friend, Allan Fairford, a young advocate.

Redgauntlet (Sir Aberc.) An ancestor of the family so called.

Sir Edward. Son of Sir Aberc, killed by his father's horse.

Sir Edward Hugh. A political enthusiast and Jacobite conspirator, uncle of Sir Arthur Darsie. He appears as "Laird of the Locks," "Mr. Herries, of Birrenswork," and "Mr. Ingoldsby." "When he frowned, the pucker of his brow formed a horseshoe, the special mark of his race." (Sir Walter Scott: Redgauntlet.)

Redlaw (Mr.). The haunted man, professor of chemistry in an ancient college. Being haunted, he bargained with his spectre to leave him, and the condition imposed was that Redlaw (go where he would) should give again "the gift of forgetfulness" bestowed by the spectre. From this moment the chemist carried in his touch the infection of sullenness, selfishness, discontent, and ingratitude. On Christmas Day the infection ceased, and all those who had suffered by it were restored to love and gratitude. (Dickens: The Haunted Man.)

Redmain. Magnus, Earl of Northumberland, was so called not from his red or bloody hand, but on account of his long red beard or mane. He was slain in the battle of Sark (1419).

"He was remarkable for his long red beard, and was therefore called by the English Magnus Redbeard: but the Scotch in derision called him 'Magnus with the Red Mane.'"—Godcroft, fol. 174.

Redmond O'Neale. Rokeby's page, who is beloved by Rokeby's daughter Matilda. Redmond turns out to be Northam's son and heir, and marries Matilda. (Sir Walter Scott: Rokeby.)

Reductor ad Absurdum. A proof of inference arising from the demonstration that every other hypothesis involves an absurdity. Thus, suppose I want to prove that the direct road from two given places is the shortest, I should say, "It must either be the shortest or not the shortest. If not the shortest, then some other road is the direct road; but there cannot be two shortest roads, therefore the direct road must be the shortest."

Reduplication or Ricochet Words, of intensifying force. Chit-chat, click-clack, chatter-clatter, dilly-dally, ding-dong, drip-drop, fal-lal, filum-flam, fiddle-faddle, flip-flop, flitty-fluffy, fipptilly-floppity, handy-pandy, harum-scarum, helter-skelter, hey-re-keyve (Halliwell), hibbledy-hobbledy, higgledy-piggledy, hob-nob, hodge-podge, hoity-toity, hury-bury, mish-mash, mixy-maxy (Brockett), namby-pamby, niddy-noddy, niminig-piminig, nosy-posey, pell-mell, pit-pat, pitter-patter, random-tandem, randy-dandy, ribble-rabble, riff-raff, roly-poly, rusty-fusty-crusty, see-saw, shilly-shally, slip-slop, slaish-slosh, snick-snack, splitter-spatter, splitter-splutter, squish-squash, teeny-tiny, tick-tack, tilly-Valley, tiny-totty, tip-top, titter-tattle, toe-toes, wee-gee, wiggle-waggle, widdly-waddly (Halliwell), widdle-waddle, wobble-wobble, wissel-wash, wisty-washy; besides a host of rhyming synonyms, as hawling-squawling, mewing-peuling, whisky-frisky, musty-fusty, gawkly-pawky, slippity-sloppy, rosie-posy, right and tight, wear and fear, high and mighty, etc.; and many more with the Anglo-Saxon letter-rhyme, as safe and sound, jag-trot, etc.

Ree. Right. Thus teammates say to a leading horse, "Ree!" when they want it to turn to the right, and "Hey!" for the contrary direction. (Saxon, reht; German, recht; Latin, rectus; various English dialects, reet, whence reptil, "to put to rights.")

"Who with a hey and ree the hearts command."—Macro-Cynemon (1646).

Ruddle me, viddle me ree. Expound my riddle rightly.

Reed. A broken reed. Something not to be trusted for support. Egypt is called a broken reed, to which Hezekiah could not trust if the Assyrians made war on Jerusalem, "which broken reed if a man leans on, it will go into his hand and pierce it." Reed walking sticks are referred to.

A bruised reed, in Bible language, means a believer weak in grace. A bruised reed [God] will not break.

Reed Shaken by the Wind (A), in Bible language, means a person blown about by every wind of doctrine. John the Baptist (said Christ) was not a "reed shaken by the wind," but from the very first had a firm belief in the Messiahship of the Son of Mary, and this conviction was not shaken by fear or favour.

Reef. He must take in a reef or so. He must reduce his expenses; he must retrench. A reef is that part of a sail which is between two rows of eyelet-holes. The object of these eyelet-holes is to reduce the sail reef by reef as it is required.

Reekie (Auld). Chambers says: "An old patriarchal laird (Durham of Largo) was in the habit of regulating the time of evening worship by the appearance of the smoke of Edinburgh. . . . When it increased in density, in consequence of the good folk preparing supper, he would . . . say, 'It is time now, bairns, to tak the buikis and gang to our beds, for yonder's auld Reekie, I see, putting on her night-cap."
"Yonder is auld Reekie. You may see the smoke hover over her at twenty miles' distance."

Reel. Right off the reel. Without intermission. A reel is a device for winding rope. A reel of cotton is a certain quantity wound on a bobbin. (Anglo-Saxon reel.)

"We've been travelling best part of twenty-four hours right off the reel."—Balderwood: Robbery under Arms, chap. xxxi.

Reel. A Scotch dance. (Gaelic, right.)

Receu's Tale. Thomas Wright says that this tale occurs frequently in the jest- and story-books of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Boccaccio has given it in the Decameron, evidently from a fabliau, which has been printed in Barbazan under the title of De Gombert et des Deux Clerks. Chaucer took the story from another fabliau, which Wright has given in his Anecdota Literaria, p. 15.

Refresh'er. A fee paid to a barrister daily in addition to his retaining fee, to remind him of the case intrusted to his charge.

Refreshments of public men, etc.
Brahma's favourite refreshment was bottled porter.
Byron almost lived on uncanny foods, such as garlic potage, raw artichokes and vinegar, broths of bitter herbs, saffron biscuits, eggs and lemons.
Catalan's favourite refreshment was sweetbreads.
Contrasto singers can indulge even in pork and pease-pudding.
Cook (G. F.) indulged in everything drinkable.
Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield), champagne.
Emery, cold brandy and water.
Glazstone, an egg beaten up in sherry.
Henderson, gum arabic and sherry.
Incledon (Mrs.), Madeira.
Jordan (Mrs.), Calves'-foot jelly dissolved in warm sherry.
Kean (Edmund), beef-tea for breakfast; brandy neat.
Kemble (both John and Charles), rump-steaks and kidneys. John indulged in opium.
Lewis, oysters and mulled wine.
Malibran, a dozen native oysters and a pint of half-and-half.
Siddons (Mrs.), mutton-chops, either neck or chump, and porter.

Smith (William), coffee.
Sofranos eschew much butcher's meat, which baritones may indulge in.
Tenzos rarely indulge in beef-steaks and sirloins.
Wood (Mrs.), draught porter.
Regale (2 syl.). To entertain like a king. (Latin, rega'lis, like a king, kingly.)
Re'gan and Gon'eril. Two of the daughters of King Lear, and types of unfilial daughters. (Shakespeare: King Lear.)

Regatta (Italian). Originally applied to the contests of the gondoliers at Venice.

Regent (The). (See Ships.)

Regent's Park (London). This park was originally attached to a palace of Queen Elizabeth, but at the beginning of the seventeenth century much of the land was let on long leases, which fell in early in the nineteenth century. The present park was formed under the direction of Mr. Nash, and received its name in compliment to George IV., then Prince Regent.

Regime de la Calotte. Administration of government by ecclesiastics. The calotte is the small skull-cap worn over the tonsure.

Regiment de la Calotte. A society of witty and satirical men in the reign of Louis XIV. When any public character made himself ridiculous, a calotte was sent to him to "cover the bald or brainless part of his noodle." (See above.)

Regina (St.), the virgin martyr, is depicted with lighted torches held to her sides, as she stands fast bound to the cross on which she suffered martyrdom.

Regiomontanus. The Latin equivalent of Königberger. The name adopted by Johann Müller, the mathematician. (1436-1476.)

Regiun Do'num (Latin). An annual grant of public money to the Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist ministers of Ireland. It began in 1672, and was commuted in 1869.

Regius Professor. One who holds in an English university a professorship founded by Henry VIII. Each of the five Regius Professors of Cambridge receives a royally-endowed stipend of about £40. In the universities of Scotland they are appointed by the Crown. The present stipend is about £400 or £500.
Regulars (Thes). All the British troops except the militia, the yeomanry, and the volunteers. There are no irregulars in the British army, but such a force exists among the black troops.

"He [Mr. Holstone] was short of stature [and ware] a rehoboam, or shovel hat, which he did not...remove."—Curver Bell: Shirley, chap. 1.

Rehoboam. A rehoboam of claret or red is a double jeroboam. (2 Chr. xiii. 3.)
1 rehoboam = 2 jeroboams or 53 pints.
1 jeroboam = 2 tappet-bens or 16 pints.
1 tappet-ben = 2 magnum or 8 pints.
1 magnum = 2 quarte or 4 pints.

Reign of Terror. The period in the French Revolution between the fall of the Girondists and overthrow of Robespierre. It lasted 420 days, from May 31st, 1793, to July 27th, 1794.

Reimkanar (A). A sorcerer, a pythoness; one skilled in numbers. Sorcery and Chaldean numbers are synonymous terms. The Anglo-Saxon rim-stafas means charms or conjuration, and the Norse reim-brammar means one skilled in numbers or charms. Norma of the Pitiful Head was a Reimkanar, "a controller of the elements."

Reins. To give the reins. To let go unrestrained; to give licence.
To take the reins. To assume the guidance or direction.

Reins (Thes). The kidneys, supposed by the Hebrews and others to be the seat of knowledge, pleasure, and pain. The Psalmist says (xiv. 7), "My reins instruct me in the night season," i.e., my kidneys, the seat of knowledge, instruct me how to turn in God. Solomon says (Prov. xxi. 16), "My reins shall rejoice when [men] speak right things," i.e., truth excites joy from my kidneys; and Jeremiah says (Lam. iii. 13), God "caused His arrows to enter into my reins," i.e., sent pain into my kidneys. (Latin, ren, a kidney.)

Reidresal. Principal secretary for private affairs in the court of Lilloput, and great friend of Gulliver. When it was proposed to put the Man-Mountain to death for high treason, Reidresal moved as an amendment, that the traitor should have both his eyes put out, and be suffered to live that he might serve the nation." (Swift: Gulliver's Travels; Voyage to Lilloput.)

Relics. A writer in the Twentieth Century (1892, article Rome) says: "Some of the most astounding relics are officially shown in Rome, and publicly adored by the highest dignitaries of the Christian Church, with all the magnificence of ecclesiastical pomp and ritual." The following are mentioned:

A BOTTLE OF THE VIRGIN'S MILK.
THE CROWN AND SWADDLING CLOTHES OF THE INFANT JESUS.
THE CROSS OF THE PENITENT THIEF.
THE CROWN OF THORNS.
THE FINGER OF THOMAS, with which he touched the wound in the side of Jesus.
HAIR OF THE VIRGIN MARY.
THE HANDKERCHIEF OF ST. VERONICA, on which the face of Jesus was miraculously pictured.
HAIR OF THE MANGER IN WHICH THE INFANT JESUS was laid.
HEADS OF PETER, PAUL, AND MATTHEW.
THE INSCRIPTION set over the cross by the order of Pilate.
NAILS USED IN THE CRUCIFICATION.
PIECE OF THE BURDEN OF THE VIRGIN MARY.
THE SILVER MONEY GIVEN TO JUDAS BY THE JEWISH PRINCE, WHICH HE DUG INTO THE TEMPLE, AND WAS EXPENDED IN BUYING THE POTTERS FIELD AS A CEMETERY FOR MOURNERS.
The table on which the soldiers cast lots for the coat of Jesus.

"Brady mentions many others, some of which are actually impossibilities, as, for example, a rib of the Verbum caro factum, a vial of the sweat of St. Michael when he contended with Satan, some of the rays of the star which guided the wise men. (See Claris Calendaria, p. 240.)"

Relief (Thes). In fortification, the general height to which the defensive masses of earth are raised. The directions in which the masses are laid out are called the lines.

Rem Acu. You have hit the mark; you have hit the nail on the head. Rem acu tetigisti (Plautus). A phrase in archery, meaning. You have hit the white, or the bull's-eye.
"Rem acu once again," said Sir Piercel:—The Middle Ages, chap. vii.

Remember. The last injunction of Charles I., on the scaffold, to Bishop Juxon. A probable solution of this mysterious word is given in Notes and Queries (February 24th, 1894, p. 144). The substance is this: Charles, who was really at heart a Catholic, felt persuaded that his misfortunes were a divine visitation on him for retaining the church property confiscated by Henry VIII., and made a vow that if God would restore him to the throne, he would restore this property to the Church. This vow may be seen in the British Museum. His injunction to the bishop was to re-member this vow, and enjoin his son Charles to carry it out. Charles II., however, wanted all the money he could get, and therefore the church lands were never restored.
Remigius. Remigius (St.). Rémy, bishop and confessor, is represented as carrying a vessel of holy oil, or in the act of anointing therewith Clovis, who kneels before him. When Clovis presented himself for baptism, Rémy said to him, "Sigambrian, henceforward burn what thou hast worshipped, and worship what thou hast burned." (438-433.)

Remis atque Velis (Lat.). With oars and sails. Tooth and nail; with all despatch.

"We were going remis atque velis into the interests of the Pretender, since a Scot had presented a Jacobite at court."—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet (Conclusion).

Renaissance (French). A term applied in the arts to that peculiar style of decoration revived by Raphael, and which resulted from ancient paintings exhumed in the pontificate of Leo X. (16th century). The French Renaissance is a Gothic skeleton with classic details.

Renaissance Period (Th.). That period in French history which began with the Italian wars in the reign of Charles VIII. and closed with the reign of Henri II. It was the intercourse with Italy, brought about by the Italian war (1494-1557), which "regenerated" the arts and sciences in France; but as everything was Italianised—the language, dress, architecture, poetry, prose, food, manners, etc.—it was a period of great false taste and national deformity.

Renard. Une quene de renard. A mockery. At one time a common practical joke was to fasten a fox's tail behind a person against whom a laugh was designed. "Panurge never refrained from attaching a fox's tail to the ears of a leveret, behind a Master of Arts or Doctor of Divinity, whenever he encountered them."—Rabelais: Gargantua ii. 16. (See Keynard.)

"Il n'y a que les vipers que de l'apprendre par son père. Et qui par nature ou par art sait apprendre la queene au renard."—Beaune: L'Emboitement de la Fonte.

Renard (French). To vomit, especially after too freely indulging in intoxicating drinks. Our word fox means also to be tipsy.

"Il lui suite la machoire, Quand l'aireur au renard se veut. L'amie qu'ils y veulent de haire. Pour se le rendre a qui mieux mieux."—Vieur de St. Amant: Chambre de Desbauche.

Renaute. Renée, daughter of Louis XII. and Anne of Bretagne, married Hercules, second son of Lucrecia Borgia and Alphonso.

Renaud. French form of Rinaldo (q.v.).

Renaud of Montauban. In the last chapter of the romance of Ayvon's Four Sons, Renaut, as an act of penance, carries the hods of mortar for the building of St. Peter's, at Cologne.

"Since I cannot improve our architecture, I am resolved to do like Renaut of Montauban, and I will wait on the masons. And as it was not in my own choice to be cut out for one of them, I will live and die the admirer of their divine works."—Rabelais: Prologue to Book V. of Pantagruel.

Rendezvous. The place to which you are to repair, a meeting, a place of muster or call. Also used as a verb. (French, rendez, betake; vous, yourself.)

His home is a grand rendezvous of the Alleys of Paris. The Imperial Guard was ordered to rendezvous in the Champs de Mars.

René (2 syl.). Le bon Roi René. Son of Louis II., Duc d'Anjou, Comte de Provence, father of Margaret of Anjou. The last minstrel monarch, just, joyous, and debonair; a friend to chase and hunt, but still more so to poetry and music. He gave in bargasses to knights-errant and musketeers (so says Thiebaut) more than he received in revenue. (1408-1460.)

"Studying to promote, as far as possible, the immediate north and good humour of his subjects, he was never mentioned by them excepting in Le bon Roi René, a distinction... due to him certainly by the qualities of his heart, if not by those of his head."—Sir Walter Scott: Anne of Gerusalem, chap. xxv.

René Leblanc. Notary-public of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), the father of twenty children and 159 grandchildren. (Longfellow: Evangeline.)

Rep'artee properly means a smart retort in fencing. (French, repartir, to return a blow.)

Repenter Curls. The long ringlets of a lady's hair. Repente is the French for a penitentiary, and les repentirs are the girls sent there for reformation. Repenter, therefore, is a Lock Hospital or Magdalen. Now, Mary Magdalen is represented to have had such long hair that she wiped off her tears therewith from the feet of Jesus. Hence, Magdalen curls would mean the long hair of a Mary Magdalen made into ringlets.

Reply Churlish (Th.). Sir, you are no judge; your opinion has no weight with me. Or, to use Touchstone's illustration: "If a courtier tell me my beard is not well cut, and I disable his judgment, I give him the reply churlish, which is the fifth remove from the lie direct, or, rather, the lie direct in the fifth degree."
Reproof Valiant (The). Sir, allow me to tell you that is not the truth. To use Touchstone’s illustration: "If a courtier tells me my beard is not well cut, and I answer, ‘That is not true,’ I give him the reply valiant, which is the fourth remove from the lie direct, or rather, the lie direct in the fourth degree."

The reproof valiant, the countercheck quarrelsome, the lie circumstantial, and the lie direct, are not clearly defined by Touchstone. The following, perhaps, will give the distinction required: that is not true; how dare you utter such a falsehood? if you said so, you are a liar; you are a liar, or you lie.

Republican Queen. Sophie Charlotte, wife of Frederick I. of Prussia.

Republicans. (See Black.)

Resolute (The). John Florio, the philologist, tutor to Prince Henry; the Holopherne of Shakespeare. (1545-1625.) The resolute doctor. John Baconthorp (*-1346).
The most resolute doctor. Guillaume Durandus de St. Poullain (*-1332).

Rest on One’s Oars. (See Oars.)

Res’tive (2 syl.) means inclined to resist, resist-ive, obstinate or self-willed. It has nothing to do with rest (quiet).

Restora’tionists. The followers of Oregen’s opinion that all persons, after a purgation proportioned to their demerits, will be restored to Divine favour and taken to Paradise. Mr. Ballow, of America, has introduced an extension of the term, and maintains that all retribution is limited to this life, and at the resurrection all will be restored to life, joy, and immortality.

Resurrection Men. Grave robbers. First applied to Burke and Hare, in 1829, who rifed graves to sell the bodies for dissection, and sometimes even murdered people for the same purpose.

Resurrection Pie is made of broken cooked meat. Meat richaune is sometimes called "resurrection meat."

Rotat’rius. A gladiator who made use of a net, which he threw over his adversary.

As in thronged amphitheatre of old.
The wary Rotat’rius trapped his foe.
Thomson: Castle of Indifference, canto ii.

Retort Courteous (The). Sir, I am not of your opinion; I beg to differ from you; or, to use Touchstone’s illustration, "if I said his beard was not well, he was in the mind it was." The lie seven times removed; or rather, the lie direct in the seventh degree.

Reuben Dixon. A village schoolmaster "of ragged lads."
"Mid noise, and dirt, and stench, and play, and..."
He calmly cuts the pen or views the slate. — Crabbé: Borough, letter xxiv.

Reveille (re-ray-yay). The beat of drum at daybreak to warn the sentries that they may forbear from challenging, as the troops are awake. (French, re-vailer, to awake.)

Revenons à nos Moutons. (See Moutons.)

Reverend. An archbishop is the Most Reverend [Father in God]; a bishop, the Right Reverend; a dean, the Very Reverend; an archdeacon, the Reverend; all the rest of the clergy, the Reverend.

Revetments, in fortifications. In "permanent fortification" the sides of ditches supported by walls of masonry are so called. (See COUNTERFORTS.)

Review. The British Review was nicknamed "My Grandmother." In Don Juan, Lord Byron says, he bribed "My Grandmother’s Review, the British." The editor took this in dudgeon and gave Byron the lie, but the poet turned the laugh against the reviewer.

A man I live, I tip My Grandmother’s; a bit of prose. — North American.

Revise (2 syl.). The second proof-sheet submitted to an author or "reader."

"I at length reached a vaulted room... and beheld, seated by a lamp and engrossed in reading a blitted review... the author of Waverley." — Sir Walter Scott: Fortunes of Nigel (Introduction).

Revival of Letters in England dates from the commencement of the eleventh century.

Revival of Painting and Sculpture began with Niccola Pisano, Giunta, Cimabue, and Giotto (2 syl.).

Revoke (2 syl.). When a player at cards can follow suit, but plays some other card, he makes a revoke, and by the laws of whist the adversaries are entitled to score three points.

Good heaven! Revoke? Remember, if the ace be lost, in honour you should pay the debt. — Crabbé: Borough.

Revulsion (in philosophy). Part of a substance set off and formed into a distinct existence; as when a slip is cut from a tree and planted to form a distinct plant of itself. Tertullian the Montanist taught that the second person of the Trinity was a jubilation of the Father. (Latin, verulic, re-vulio, to pull back.)

Rewe. A roll or slip; as Ragman’s Rewe. (See RAGMAN.)

"There is a whole world of curious history contained in the phrase ‘ragman’s rewes’, meaning a list, roll, catalogue, . . . charter, scroll of any kind. In Piers Plowman’s Voice it is used for the pope’s bull."—Edinburgh Review, July, 1850.

"In Fenestrum was first invented the joyrife of mystrelies and songe menne songs for making laughter, hence called ‘Fenestrum Carminum’, which I translate ‘Ragman’s Rewe’ or Rune."—Idem.

Reynard the Fox. The hero in the beast-epic of the fourteenth century. This prose poem is a satire on the state of Germany in the Middle Ages. Reynard typifies the church; his uncle, Isengrin the wolf, typifies the baronial element; and Nodel the lion, the regal. The word means deep counsel or wit. (Gothic, raguohart, cunning in counsel; Old Norse, hvoirm and ard; German, weishe.) Reynard is commonly used as a synonym of fox. (Heinrich von Alken.)

Reynard the Fox. Professedly by Hinrecc von Alecmere, tutor of the Duke of Lorraine. This name is generally supposed to be a pseudonym of Hermann Burkhausen, town clerk and book printer in Rostock. (1498.)

False Reynard. So Dryden describes the Unitarians in his Hind and Panther. (See RENARD.)

False Reynard fed on conserved spoil; The graceless hose of Athismain’s first Was chased from Nice, then by Aquis hushed." Part 1: 31-32.

Reynardeine (3 syl). The eldest son of Reynard the Fox, who assumed the names of Dr. Pedanto and Crabron. (Reynard the Fox.)

Reynold of Montalban. One of Charlemagne’s knights and paladins.

Renaio. (See DOCTOR REZIO.)

Rhadamantos. One of the three judges of hell; Minos and Aëacos being the other two. (Greek mythology.)

Rhampeinitos. The Greek form of Ramesses III., the richest of the Egyptian kings, who amassed seventy-seven millions sterling, which he secured in a treasury of stone, but by an artifice of the builder he was robbed every night.

Heredotus (bk. ii. chap. 121) tells us that two brothers were the architects of the treasury, and that they placed in the wall a removable stone, through which they crept every night to purloin the store. The king, after a time, noticed the diminution, and set a trap to catch the thieves. One of the brothers was caught in the trap, but the other brother, to prevent detection, cut off his head and made good his escape. This tale is almost identical with that of Trophonios, told by Pausanias Hyrieus (3 syl.); a Boeotian king employed Trophonios and his brother to build him a treasury. In so doing they also contrived to place in the wall a removable stone, through which they crept nightly to purloin the king’s treasures. Hyrieus also set a trap to catch the thief, and one of the brothers was caught; but Trophonios cut off his head to prevent detection, and made good his escape. There cannot be a doubt that the two tales are in reality one and the same.

Rhapsody means songs strung together. The term was originally applied to the books of the Iliad and Odyssey, which at one time were in fragments. Certain bards collected together a number of the fragments, enough to make a connected "ballad," and sang them as our minstrels sang the deeds of famous heroes. Those bards who sang the Iliad wore a red robe, and those who sang the Odyssey a blue one. Pausitras of Athens had all these fragments carefully compiled into their present form (Greek rapto, to sew or string together; odh, a song.)

Rheine (1 syl.). The Rhine. (Latin, Rhinums.)

"To pass Rheine or the Danau [Danube]!" Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. i. 333.

Rhine or Rhineland. The country of Gunther, King of Burgundy, is so called in the Nibelungen-Lied.

"Not a lord of Rhineland would follow where he flew." Lohengrin’s Nibelungen-Lied, st. 310.

Rhino. Ready money. (See NOSE.) May not this explain the phrase "paying through the nose" (par le nez), that is, paying ready rhino. Rhino = money is very old.

"Some as I know, Have parted with their ready rhino!" The Nunam và Adon (1670)

Rhod'ainlond. A princess famous for her "knighth" deeds; she would have been the wife of Gondibert, but he wisely preferred Birtha, a country girl, the daughter of the sage A'tragon.

Rhodian Bully (The). The colossus of Rhodes.

"Yet vain wouldst thou the crowning world bestride, Just like the Rhodian bully o'er the tile." Piero Pindar: The Lyciad, ca. 2.

Rhodian Law. The earliest system of marine law known to history; compiled by the Rhodians about 900 B.C.

Rhone. The Rhone of Christian eloquence. St. Hilary; so called from the vehement of his style. (300-368.)
Rhopalico Verse (wedge-verse). A line in which each successive word has more syllables than the one preceding it (Greek, ῥωπάζω, a club, which from the handle to the top grows bigger.)

Rhyme. Neither rhyme nor reason. Fit neither for amusement nor instruction. An author took his book to Sir Thomas More, chancellor in the reign of Henry VIII., and asked his opinion. Sir Thomas told the author to turn it into rhyme. He did so, and submitted it again to the lord chancellor. “Ay! ay!” said the witty satirist, “that will do, that will do. This rhyme now. But before it was neither rhyme nor reason.”

Rhymers. Thomas the Rhymers. Thomas Learmount, of Ercildoune, who lived in the thirteenth century. This was quite a different person to Thomas Rymer, the historiographer royal to William III. (who flourished 1289.) (See True Thomas.)

Rhymer at Death. The Irish at one time believed that their children and cattle could be “eybitten,” that is, bewitched by an evil eye. and that the “eybitter,” or witch could “rime” them to death. (R. Scott: Discovery of Witchcraft.) (See Rats.)

Ribaldry is the language of a ribald. (French, ribaud; Old French, ribaud; Italian, ribaldiera, the language of a vagabond or rogue.)

Ribbon Dodge (The). Plying a person secretly with threatening letters in order to drive him out of the neighbourhood, or to compel him to do something he objects to. The Irish Ribbon men sent threatening letters or letters containing coffins, cross-bones, or daggers, to obnoxious neighbours.

Ribbonism. A Catholic association organised in Ireland about 1808. Its two main objects were (1) to secure “fixity of tenure,” called the tenant-right; and (2) to deter anyone from taking land from which a tenant has been ejected. The name arises from a ribbon worn as a badge in the button-hole.

Ribston Pippin. So called from Ribston, in Yorkshire, where Sir Henry Goodricke planted three pips, sent to him from Rouen, in Normandy. Two pips died, but from the third came all the Ribston apple-trees in England.

Richard, in the opera of I Puritani, is Sir Richard Forth, a Puritan, commander of Plymouth fortress. Lord Walton promised to give him his daughter Elvira in marriage, but Elvira had engaged her affections to Lord Arthur Talbot, a Cavalier, to whom ultimately she was married.

Richard Auct. Son of Agmon and Brudanam. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Rice Christians. Converts to Christianity for worldly benefits, such as a supply of rice to Indians. Profession of Christianity born of lucre, not faith.

Rice thrown after a Bride. It was an Indian custom, rice being, with the Hindus, an emblem of fecundity. The bridegroom throws three handfuls over the bride, and the bride does the same over the bridegroom. With us the rice is thrown by neighbours and friends. (See Marriage Knot.)

Rice as Cressus. (See Cressus.)

Rice as a Jew. This expression arose in the Middle Ages, when Jews were almost the only merchants, and were certainly the most wealthy of the people. There are still the Rothschilds among them, and others of great wealth.

Richard Coeur de Lion. (See Boige.)

His tremendous name was employed by the Syrian mothers to silence their infants; and if a horse suddenly started from the way, his rider was wont to exclaim, “Don’t you think King Richard is in the bushes?”—Gibbon: Decline and Fall, etc., v. 146.

Richard II.’s Horse. Roan Barberry. (See Horse.)

When Being brooke rode on roan Barberry, That horse that thou so often hast bestridd, That horse that I so carefully have dressed.”—Shakespeare: Richard II., v. 5.

Richard III.’s Horse. White Surrey. (See Horse.)

Richard Roe. (See Dom.)

Richard is Himself again. These words are not in Shakespeare’s Richard III., but were interpolated from Colley Cibber by John Kemble.

Richard of Cirencester. Sometimes called “The Monk of Westminster,” an early English chronicler. His chronicle On the Ancient State of Britain was first brought to light by Dr. Charles Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen in 1747; but the original (like the original of Macpherson's Osian and of Joe Smith's Book of Mormon) does not exist, and grave suspicion prevails that all three are alike forgeries. (See SANCHONIATHO.)

Richardia, wife of Nicholas d'Este. A widow who, with her son Hercules, was dispossessed of her inheritance by Lionello and Borsa. Both were obliged to go into exile, but finally Hercules recovered his lordship.

Richborough, Richborough, or Batois (a Roman fort in the time of Claudius), called by Alfred of Beverley, Richberge; by the Saxons (according to Bede) Riptacester, and by others Ruptimuth; by Orosius, the port and city of Rhutubus; by Ammianus, Rhotupia Statio; by Antoninus, Rhotupia Portus; by Tacitus, Portus Trutulensis for Rhotupensis; by Ptolemey, Rhotupiae. (Casson.)

Rick Mould. This is an April fool joke transferred to hay-harvest. The joke is this: some greenhorn is sent a good long distance to borrow a rick-mould, with strict injunction not to drop it. The leader places something very heavy in a sack or bag, which he hoists on the greenhorn's back. He carries it carefully in the hot sun to the hayfield, and gets well laughed at for his pains.

Rickey Stock. Stock bought or sold for a man of straw. If the client cannot pay, the broker must.

Ricochet [riko-shay]. Anything repeated over and over again. The fabulous bird that had only one note was called the ricochet; and the rebound on water termed ducks and drakes has the same name. Marshal Vauban (1633-1707) invented a battery of rebound called the ricochet battery, the application of which was ricochet firing.

Riddle. Josephus relates how Hiram, King of Tyre, and Solomon had once a contest in riddles, when Solomon won a large sum of money; but he subsequently lost it to Abde'mon, one of Hiram's subjects.

Riddle. Plutarch states that Homer died of chagrin because he could not solve a certain riddle. (See SPHINX.)

Father of riddles. So the Abbé Cotin dubbed himself, but posterity has not confirmed his right to the title. (1604-1682.) (See RIC.)

Riddle of Claret (A). Thirteen bottles, a magnum and twelve quarts.

So called because in golf matches the magistrates invited to the celebration dinner presented to the club a "riddle of claret," sending it in a riddle or sieve.

Ride. To ride abroad with St. George, but at home with St. Michael; said of a hen-pecked braggart. St. George is represented as riding on a war charger whether he listed; St. Michael, on a dragon. Abroad a man rides, like St. George, on a horse which he can control and govern; but at home he has "a dragon" to manage, like St. Michael. (French.)

Ride for a Fall (To). To ride a race and lose it intentionally.

"There were not wanting people who said that government had 'ridden for a fall' in their despair of carrying out their police."—Newspaper paragraph, November, 1865.

Ride up Holborn Hill (To). To go to the gallows.

"I shall like to see you ride up Holborn Hill."—Congress: Love for Love.

Rider. An addition to a manuscript, like a codicil to a will; an additional clause tacked to a bill in parliament; so called because it over-rides the preceding matter when the two come into collision.

"Perhaps Mr. Kenneth will allow me to add the following as a rider to his suggestion."—Notes and Queries, "M.N."

Riderhood (Rogue). The villain in Dickens's Our Mutual Friend.

Ridicule (Father of). François Rabelais (1493-1553).

Riding [of Yorkshire]. Same as trithing in Lincolnshire; the jurisdiction of a third part of a county, under the government of a reeve (sherriff). The word ding or thing is Scandinavian, and means a legislative assembly; hence the great national diet of Norway is still called a stor-thing (great legislative assembly), and its two chambers are the lag-thing (law assembly) and the odel-thing (freeholders' assembly). Kent was divided into laths, Sussex into reps, Lincoln into parts. The person who presided over a trithing was called the trithing-man; he who presided in the lath was called a laith-grieve.

Ridolphus (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the band of adventurers that joined the Crusaders. He was slain by Argantes (bk. vii.).

Ridotto (Italian). An assembly where the company is first entertained to music, and then joins in dancing. The word originally meant music reduced to a full score. (Latin, reducitur.)
Rienzi (Niccolò Gabrielli). The Reformer at Rome (1813-1834). Bulwer Lytton (Lord Lytton) has a novel called Rienzi, and Wagner an opera.

Rif or Rife (French). Avoir rife et vafle. To have everything. Also, the negative, N’avoir ni rife ni raf (to have nothing).

"Relais, &c. aux gouttes minceissimes.
J’aurai rife et vafle, d’argile et de talcine."—Les Miracles de St. Genivieve.

Riff-raff. The scabbing of society, or rather, "refuse and sweepings." Riff is Anglo-Saxon, and means a rag; Raff is also Anglo-Saxon, and means sweepings. (Danish, rype-raps.) The French have the expression "Avoir rife et vafle," meaning to have everything; whence radouz (one who has everything), and the phrase "Il n’a laisse ni rife ni raf" (he has left nothing behind him).

"I have neither riff nor raff [rag to cover me nor roof over my head]."—Sharp. "Corel. y Most., p. 224.

"I’m no man down his and he can't
That he had lane with rife and raffe."
Quoted by Bannister in his Archicosc Dictionnary.

Rife is from the German riezen (to hollow into tubes). In 1851 the French mince rifle was partially supplied to the British army. In 1853 it was superseded by the Enfield rifle, which has three grooves. Sir William Armstrong’s gun, which has numerous small sharp grooves, was adopted by the government in 1859. The Whitworth gun has a polygonal bore, with a twist towards the muzzle. ("Rife" is Norwegian for a groove or flute.)

"Rifed are either "breach-loaders" or "magazine rifles." Breach-loading rifles load at the breech instead of at the muzzle: magazine rifles are those which contain a chamber with extra cartridges.

The chief breach-loaders are the Ballard, the Benja, the Parry, the Enfield, the Chasseur (a French needle-gun, 1850-1857), the Flint and others an improved Chasseur, 1834-1880, the Greene, the Hall, the Muzzle-Henry (Great Britain, 1860), the Martyn, the Maud, the Morey, the Meunier, the Peabody, the Peabody-Martini (Turkey), the Scott, the Sharp, the Springfield (United States, 1853), the Werther (Bavaria), the Wendt, the Whittome, the Westley-Richards, and the Winchester.

The magazine or repeating-rifed are also very numerous. The best known to the general public are Colt’s revolver and the Winchester repeating-rifle of 1862. They are of three classes: (1) those in which the magazine is in the lock; (2) those in which the magazine is in a tube parallel with the barrel (as in Colt’s revolver); and (3) those in which the magazine is either a fixed or detachable box near the lock. The once famous Enfield rifle was loaded at the muzzle. In Spencer’s rifle the magazine was in the stock.

Rift in the Lute (4). A small defect which mars the general result.

"Unfaith in ought is want of faith in all.
It is the little rift within the lute
At hand-by will make the music mute.
And, ever widening, slowly silence all."
Terence: "Hoonus and Viven; Visione Song."

Rig. A piece of fun, a practical joke. The Scotch say of a man who indulges in intoxication, "He goes the rig." The same word is applied in Scotland to a certain portion or division of a field. A wanton used to be called a rig. (French, se rigoler, to make merry.)

"He little thought when he set out Of running such a rig."—Cooper. John Gilpin.

Rig. To dress; whence riged out, to rig oneself, to rig a ship, well-riged, etc. (Anglo-Saxon, irigan, to dress; hrigel, a garment.)

"Jack was riged out in his gold and silver lace, with a feather in his cap."—L'Estrange.

Rig-Maria. Base coin. The word originated from one of the bullion coins struck in the reign of Queen Mary, which bore the words Reg. Mar. as part of the legend.

"Bullion is mixed metal for coining, especially silver largely alloyed with copper.

Rigadoon. A French figure-dance invented by Isaac Rigaudon.

"And Isaac’s Rigadoon shall live as long As Raphael’s painting, or an Virgin’s song."
—Jenius. "Art of Dancing, etc."

Rig’dum Fun’idos, in Carey’s burlesque of Chrysantholotologiae.

Rigadoon Funidos. A sobriquet given by Sir Walter Scott to John Ballantyne, his publisher. So called because he was full of fun. (1776-1821.)

"A quick, active, intrepid little fellow... full of fun and merriment, ... all over quaintness and humorous mimicry, ... a keen and skilful devotee of all manner of field-sports, from fox-hunting to hanger-lifting inclusive."—Lockhart.

Right Foot. Put the shoe on the right foot first. The twelfth symbol of the Protreptics of Iamblichus. This auditi is preserved in our word “awkward,” which means “left-handed” (arke, the left hand), seen also in the French gauche. Pythagoras meant to teach that his disciples should walk discreetly and wisely, not basely and feebly or gauchely.

Right Foot Foremost. In Rome a boy was stationed at the door of a mansion to caution visitors not to cross the threshold with their left foot, which would have been an ill omen.

Right Hand. The right-hand side of the Speaker, meaning the Ministerial benches. In the French Legislative Assembly the right meant the Monarchy men. In the National Convention the Girondists were called the right hand, because they occupied the Ministerial benches.

Right as a Trivet. The trivet is a metallic plate-stand with three legs. Some fasten to the fender and are designed to hold the plate of hot toast, etc. (Anglo-Saxon, thrysf, three-foot, tripod.)

Right of Way (The). The legal right to make use of a certain passage whether high-road, by-road, or private road. Watercourses, ferries, rivers, etc., are included in the word "ways." Private right of way may be claimed by immemorial usage, special permission, or necessity; but a funeral cortège or bridal party having passed over a certain field does not give to the public the right of way, as many suppose.

Rights. Declaration of Rights. An instrument submitted to William and Mary, on their being called to the throne, setting forth the fundamental principles of the constitution. The chief items are these: The Crown cannot levy taxes, nor keep a standing army in times of peace; the Members of Parliament are free to utter their thoughts, and a Parliament is to be convened every year; elections are to be free, trial by jury is to be inviolate, and the right of petition is not to be interfered with.

Riget. A thin piece of wood used for stretching the canvas of pictures; and in printing to regulate the margin, etc. (French, reglet, a rule or regulator; Latin, regula, a rule.)

Rigol. A circle or diadem. (Italian, rigolo, a little wheel.)

"[Sleep] That from this golden rigid hath disported so many English kings." [Shakespeare: *2 Henry IV., Act I."

Rigoletto (3 syl.) A griglette, a courtesan; so called from Rigolette, in Eugène Sue’s *Mysteries of Paris."

Rigoletto. An opera describing the agony of a father obliged to witness the prostitution of his own child. The libretto is borrowed from the drama called Le Roi s’Amuse, by Victor Hugo; the music is by Guiseppe Verdi.

Rigwoodie. Unyielding; stubborn. A rigwiddle is the chain which crosses the back of a horse to hold up the shafts of a cart (rig = back, withy = twig).

"Withered hedges, salt and droll, Rigwoodic bags."—Burns: Tam O’Shanter.

Rile. Don’t rile the water. Do not stir up the water and make it muddy. The water is riled—muddy and unfit to drink. Common Norfolk expressions; also, a boy is riled (out of temper). *‘Tis, together, Joe Smith was regularly riled, is quite Norfolk. The American roll has the same meaning. A corruption of bruil. (French, brouiller; our broil.) The adjective vily, turbid, angry, is more common.

Rim. Chief god of Damascus: so called from the word rim, a "pomegranate," because he held a pomegranate in his right hand. The people bore a pomegranate in their coat armour. The Romans called this god Jupiter Cassius, from Mount Cassius, near Damascus.

Rimfaxi [Root-name]. The horse of Night, the foam of whose bit causes dew. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Rimmon. A Syrian god, whose seat was Damascus.

"He followed Rimmon, whose delightful seat Was far Damascus, on the fertile bank Of Arvima and Phrapar, lucid streams."

Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. i. 167.

Rimthursar. Brother of Ymer. They were called the "Evil Ones." (Scandinavian mythology.)

Rinaldo (in Jerusalem Delivered). The Achilles of the Christian army. "He despises gold and power, but craves renown" (bk. i.). He was the son of Bertoldo and Sophia, and nephew of Guelpho, but was brought up by Matilda. At the age of fifteen he ran away and joined the Crusaders, where he was enrolled in the adventurers’ squadron. Having slain Fernando, he was summoned by Godfrey to public trial, but went into voluntary exile. The pedigree of Rinaldo, of the noble house of Este, is traced from Actius on the male side and Augustus on the female to Actius V. (bk. xvii.).

Rinaldo (of Orlando Furioso). Son of the fourth Marquis d’Este, cousin of Orlando, Lord of Mount Aubein or Albano, eldest son of Amon or Aymon, nephew of Charlemagne, and Bradamant’s brother. (See Alberno. He was the rival of his cousin Orlando, but Angelica detested him. He was called "Clarmont’s leader," and brought an auxiliary force of English and Scotch to Charlemagne, which "Silence" conducted into Paris.

Rinaldo or Renaud, one of the paladins of Charlemagne, is always painted with the characteristics of a borderer—valiant, ingenious, rapacious, and unscrupulous.

Ring. If a lady or gentleman is willing to marry, but not engaged, a ring should be worn on the index finger of the left hand; if engaged, on the second finger; if married, on the third finger; but if either has no desire to marry, on the little finger. (Mme. C. de la Tour.
A ring worn on the forefinger indicates a haughty, bold, and overbearing spirit; on the long finger, prudence, dignity, and discretion; on the marriage finger, love and affection; on the little finger, a masterful spirit.

Ring given in marriage, because it was essentially used as a seal, by which orders were signed (Gen. xxxviii. 18; Esther iii. 10-12), and the delivery of a ring was a sign that the giver endowed the person who received it with all the power he himself possessed (Gen. xlii. 42). The woman who had the ring could issue commands as her husband, and was in every respect his representative.

"In the Roman epistles, the man gave the woman a ring by way of pledge, and the woman put it on the third finger of her left hand, because it was believed that a nerve ran from that finger to the heart." — Macrobius: Sat. vii. 15.

Ring. The Ring and the Book. An idyllic epic by Robert Browning, founded on a cause célèbre of Italian history (1698). Guido Franceschi, a Florentine nobleman of shattered fortune, by the advice of his brother, Cardinal Paulo, marries Pomppilia, an heiress, to repair his state. Now Pomppilia was only a supposititious child of Pietro, supplied by Violante for the sake of preventing certain property from going to an heir not of his own. When the bride discovered the motive of the bridegroom, she revealed to him this fact, and the first trial occurs to settle the said property. The count treats his bride so brutally that she quits his roof under the protection of Caponacchi, a young priest, and takes refuge in Rome. Guido follows the fugitives and arrests them at an inn; a trial ensues, and a separation is permitted. Pomppilia pleads for a divorce, but, pending the suit, gives birth to a son at the house of her putative parents. The count, hearing thereof, murders Pietro, Violante, and Pomppilia; but, being taken red-handed, is executed.

Ring (The). The space set apart for prize-fighters, horse-racing, etc. So called because the spectators stand round in a ring.

Ring. To make a ring. To combine in order to control the price of a given article. Thus, if the chief merchants of any article (say salt, flour, or sugar) combine, they can fix the selling price, and thus secure enormous profits.

Ring. It has the true ring — has intrinsic merit; bears the mark of real talent. A metaphor taken from the custom of judging genuine money by its "ring" or sound. Ring, a circlet, is the Anglo-Saxon hring; ring, to sound a bell, etc., is the verb hring-an.

Ring Down. Conclude, end at once. A theatrical phrase, alluding to the custom of ringing a bell to give notice for the fall of the curtain. Charles Dickens says, "It is time to ring down on these remarks." (Speech at the Dramatic Fete.)

Ring Finger. Priests used to wear their ring on the fore-finger (which represents the Holy Ghost) in token of their spiritual office. (See Wedding Finger.)

The ring finger represents the humanity of Christ, and is used in matrimony, which has only to do with humanity. (See Finger Benediction.)

Ring finger. Aulus Gellius tells us that Apollonius asserts in his Egyptian books that a very delicate nerve runs from the fourth finger of the left hand to the heart, on which account this finger is used for the marriage ring. (Nector, x. 10.)

The fact has nothing to do with the question; that the ancients believed it is all we require to know. In the Roman Catholic Church, the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity; thus the bridegroom says, "In the name of the Father," and touches the thumb; "in the name of the Son," and touches the first finger; and "in the name of the Holy Ghost" he touches the long or second finger. The next finger is the husband's, to whom the woman owes allegiance next to God. The left hand is chosen to show that the woman is to be subject to the man. In the Hereford, York, and Salisbury missals, the ring is directed to be put first on the thumb, then on the first finger, then on the long finger, and lastly on the ring-finger, quia in ilio dextrato est quedam vena pro euss. The ring-finger, quia in illo dextrato est quedam vena procédens usque ad cor.

The ring finger. Mr. Henry Swinburne, in his Treatise of Spousals, printed 1680 (p. 206), says: "The finger on which this ring [the wedding-ring] is to be worn is the fourth finger of the left hand, next unto the little finger; because by the received opinion of the learned ... in ripping up and anatomising men's bodies, there is a vein of blood, called vena amoris, which passeth from that finger to the heart."

Ring Posies or mottoes.
1. A E I (Greek for "Always").
2. For ever and for eye.
3. In thee, my choice, I do rejoice.
4. Let love increase.
Ringing Changes

Bantering each other; turning the tables on a jester. The allusion is to bells. (See Prall.)
Ringing the Changes. A method of swindling by charging gold and silver in payment of goods. For example: A man goes to a tavern and asks for two-pennyworth of whisky. He lays on the counter half a sovereign, and receives nine shillings and tenpence in change. "Oh!" (says the man) "Give me the half-sovereign back, I have such a lot of change." He then takes up ten shillings in silver and receivces back the halfsovereign. The barmaid is about to take up the silver when the man says, "Give me a sovereign in lieu of this half-sovereign and ten shillingsworth of silver." This is done, and, of course, the barmaid loses ten shillings by the transaction.

Ringing Island. The Church of Rome. It is an island because it is isolated or cut off from the world. It is a ringing island because bells are incessantly ringing: at matin and vespers, at mass and at sermon-time, at noon, vigils, eves, and so on. It is entered only after four days' fasting, without which none in the Romish Church enter holy orders.

Ring-leader. The person who opens a ball or leads off a dance (see Holyleand's Dictionary, 1593). The dance referred to was commenced by the party taking hands round in a ring, instead of in two lines as in the country dance. The leader in both cases has to set the figures. One who organises and leads a party.

Riot. To run riot. To act in a very disorderly way. Riot means debauchery or wild merriment.

"See, Riot her luxurious bowl prepares."

Tableau of eres.

Rip (A). He's a regular rip. A rip of a fellow. A precious rip. Applied to children, means one who rips or tears his clothes by boisterous play, carelessness, or indifference. Anglo-Saxon ry[pl]an, to spoil, to tear, to break in pieces.

He is a sad rip. A sad rake or debauchee; seems to be a perversion of rep, as in demirep, meaning rep, i.e., rep-robate.

Rip. To rip up old grievances or sores. To bring them again to recollection, to recall them. The allusion is to breaking up a place in search of something hidden and out of sight. (Anglo-Saxon.)

"They ripped up all that had been done from the beginning of the Rebellion." — Clarendon.

Rip Van Winkle slept twenty years in the Kastakill mountains. (See Winkle.)

Ripaille. I am living at Ripaille—in idleness and pleasure. (French, faire Ripaille.) Amadeus VIII., Duke of Savoy, retired to Ripaille, near Geneva, where he threw off all the cares of state, and lived among boon companions in the indulgence of unrestrained pleasure. (See Sybarite.)

Riphean or Rhipean Rocks. Any cold mountains in a north country. The fabled Riphean mountains were in Scythia.

"Cold Riphean rocks, which the wild Russ Believes the stony girdle of the world." — Thomson: Antiquam.

The poet here speaks of the Weliki Cumenypoyoys (great stone girdle) supposed by the early Russians to have girded the whole earth.

Rip'on. True as Ripon steel. Ripon used to be famous for its steel spurs, which were the best in the world. The spikes of a Ripon spur would strike through a shaving-piece without turning the point.

Riquet with a Tuft. From the French Riquet à la Houpe, by Charles Perrault, borrowed from The Nights of Straparola, and imitated by Madame Villeneuve in her Beauty and the Beast. Riquet is the beau-ideal of ugliness, but had the power of endowing the person he loved best with wit and intelligence. He falls in love with a beautiful woman as stupid as Riquet is ugly, but possessing the power of endowing the person she loves best with beauty. The two marry and exchange gifts.

Rise. To take a rise out of one. Hutton says this is a metaphor from fly-fishing; the fish rise to the fly, and are caught.

Rising in the Air. In the Middle Ages, persons believed that saints were sometimes elevated from the ground by religious ecstasy. St. Philip of Neri was sometimes raised to the height of several yards, occasionally to the ceiling of the room. Ignatius Loyola was sometimes raised up two or three feet, and his body became luminous. St. Robert de Palentin was elevated in his ecstasies eighteen or twenty inches. St. Dunstan, a little before his death, was observed to rise from the ground. And Girolamo Savonarola, just prior to execution, knelt in prayer, and was lifted from the floor of his cell into mid-air, where he remained.
suspended for a considerable time. (Acta Sanctorum.)

Rivals, "Persons dwelling on opposite sides of a river." Forsyth derives these words from the Latin rivi'rus, a riverman. Celsius says there was no more fruitful source of contention than river-right, both with beasts and men, not only for the benefit of its waters, but also because rivers are natural boundaries. Hence Ariosto compares Orlando and Ag'ricola to "two hinds quarrelling for the river-right." (xxiii. 83.)

River Demon or River Horse was the Kelpie of the Lowlands of Scotland.

River of Paradise. St. Bernard, Abbots of Clairvaux, "the Last of the Fathers," was so called. (1061-1153.)

River Flowing from the Ocean Inland. The stream from the Bay of Tadjoura, on the north-east coast of Africa. It empties itself into Lake Assal.

Rivers. Miles in length.
2,578, the Nile, the longest river in Africa.
2,762, the Volga, the longest river in Europe.
3,314, the Yang-tze-Kiang, the longest river in Asia.
3,710, the Mississippi, the longest river in America.

Roach. Sound as a roach (French, Sain comme une roche). Sound as a rock.

Road. Gentlemen of the road or Knights of the road. Highwaymen. In the latter a double pun is implied. A first-class highwayman, like Robin Hood, is a "Colossus of Roads."

King of Roads [Rhodes]. John Loudon Macadam (1756-1836). The law of the road—
"The law of the road is a paradox quite, In riding or driving alone; If you go to the left you are sure to go right, If you go to the right you go wrong."

Road or Roadstead, as "Yarmouth Roads," a place where ships can ride at anchor. (French, rade, to anchor in a vase; Anglo-Saxon, rad, a road or place for riding.)

Road-agent. A highwayman in the mountain districts of North America.

"Road-agent is the name applied to the mountains to a ruffian who has given up honest work in the store, in the mine, in the ranch, for the perils and profits of the highway."—W. Hayesworth Dixon: New America, p. 12.

Roads. All roads lead to Rome. All efforts of thought converge in a common centre.

Rob. A reddish-brown. This is the Greek cruthron or cruthrason; whence the Latin rufum. (The Welsh have rhudd; German, roth; Anglo-Saxon, rad; our ruddy.)

Rob Barbary. The famous charger of Richard II., which ate from his royal hand. (See Richard II.)

Robber. A broken-winded horse is so called from the noise it makes in breathing.

Roaring Boys or Roarers. The riotous blades of Ben Jonson's time, whose delight it was to annoy quiet folk. At one time their pranks in London were carried to an alarming extent.

"And but them think on Jones amidst this gloe, in hope to get such roaring boys an be."—Legend of Captain Jones (1629).

Roaring Forties (The). What seaman understand by this term is a zone of strong winds about lat. 40° S., where a strong wind prevails throughout the year, from W.N.W. to E.S.E. There is a similar zone in the northern hemisphere, but the current of the wind is interrupted by the prevalence of land. The tendency, however, is from W.S.W. to E.N.E.

Roaring Game (The). So the Scotch call the game of curling.

Roaring Trade. He drives a roaring trade. He does a great business; his employees are driven till all their wind is gone. Hence fast, quick. (See above.)

Rost. To rule the roost. To have the chief direction: to be paramount.

"It is usually thought that "roast" in this phrase means roost, and that the reference is to a cock, who decides which hen is to roost nearest to him; but the subjoined quotation favours the idea of "council."

"John, Duke of Burgoyne, ruled the roost, and governed both King Charles... and his whole realm."—Holl: Union (1548).

Roasting One. To give one a roasting. To banter him, to expose him to sharp words. Shakespeare, in Hamlet, speaks of roasting "'in wrath and fire."

Rob. A sort of jam. It is a Spanish word, taken from the Arabic roob (the juice of fruit).

Faire un roob (in whist). To win the rubber; that is, either two successive games, or two out of three. Borrowed from the game of bowls.

Rob Roy [Robert the Red]. A nickname given to Robert McGregor, who assumed the name of Campbell when the clan M’Gregor was outlawed by the Scotch Parliament in 1682. He may be termed the Robin Hood of Scotland.

points in his person corresponded with the symmetry: his shoulders were so broad ... as to give him the air of being too square in respect to his stature; and his arms, though round, sinewy, and strong, were so very long as to be rather a deformity. —Sir Walter Scott: Rob Roy M’Gregor, xiili.

Robber. The highwayman who told Alexander that he was the greater robber of the two was named Dionidès. The tale is given in Evenings at Home under the title of Alexander and the Robber.

Robber. Edward IV. of England was called by the Scotch Edward the Robber.

Robbing Peter to pay Paul. On December 17th, 1550, the abbey church of St. Peter, Westminster, was advanced to the dignity of a cathedral by letters patent; but ten years later it was joined to the diocese of London again, and many of its estates appropriated to the repairs of St. Paul’s Cathedral. (Winkle: Cathedrals.)

“Tanquam quisque crucigeret Paulum ut reducueret Petrum.” (Twelfth century.)

It was not desirable to rob St. Peter’s altar in order to build one to St. Paul.” —Vigiles, Con. Dec. Devaria, i. 9 (1500).

Robert. King Robert of Sicily. A metrical romance of the Trouvère, taken from the Story of the Emperor Herusm in the Gesta Romanorum, and borrowed from the Tulunid. It finds a place in the Arabian Nights, the Turkish Tulunmanch, the Sanskrit Panthchatur, and has been richcuffe by Longfellow under the same name.

Robert, Robin. A highwayman.

Robert François Damiaen, who attempted to assassinate Louis XV., is called “Robert the Devil.” (1714-1757.)

Robert Macaire. He’s a Robert Macaire. A bluff, free-living, unblushing libertine, who commits the most horrible crimes without stint or compunction. It is a character in M. Dau- nier’s drama of L’Auberge des Adrets. His accomplice is Bertrand, a simpleton and villain. (See Macaire.)

Robert Street (Adelphi, London). So called from Robert Adams, the builder.

Robert de Diablé. The son of Bertha and Bertram. The former was daughter of Robert, Duke of Normandy, and the latter was a fiend in the guise of a knight. The opera shows the struggle in Robert between the virtues inherited from his mother, and the vice imparted by his father. He is introduced as a libertine; but Alice, his foster-sister, places in his hand the will of his mother, “which he is not to read till he is worthy.” Bertramio induces him to gamble till he loses everything, and finally claims his soul; but Alice counter-plots the fiend, and finally triumphs by reading to Robert the will of his mother. (Meyerbeer: Roberto il Diavolo, an opera.)

Robert the Devil. Robert, first Duke of Normandy; so called for his daring and cruelty. The Norman tradition is that his wandering ghost will not be allowed to rest till the Day of Judgment. He is also called Robert the Mag- nificent. (1028-1053.)

Robert of Brunne, that is, of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. His name was Robert Manning, author of an old English Chronicle, written in the reign of Edward III. It consists of two parts, the first of which is in octosyllabic rhymes, and is a translation of Wace’s Brut; the second part is in Alexandrine verse, and is a translation of the French chronicle of Piers de Langtoft, of Yorkshire.

of Brunne I am, if any me blame, Robert Manning is my name ... In the third Edwarde (me was) When I wrote alle this thing ... (Preface to Chronicle.)

Robert’s Men. Bandits, marauders, etc. So called from Robin Hood, the outlaw.

Robespierre’s Weavers. The fish- women and other female rowdies who joined the Parisian Guard, and helped to line the avenues to the National Assembly in 1793, and clamour “Down with the Girondists!”

Robin Goodfellow. A “drudging fiend,” and merry domestic fairy, famous for mischievous pranks and practical jokes. At night-time he will sometimes do little services for the family over which he presides. The Scotch call this domestic spirit a brownie; the Germans, kobold; and Knecht Ruprecht. The Scandi- navians called it Nisse God-hvæng. Puck, the jester of Fairy-court, is the same.

“Either I mistake your shape and making quite, or else you are that shrewd and knavish sprite Called Robin Goodfellow, They that Rob-goblin call on, and sweet Puck, You do their work, and they shall have good luck.” —Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream, ii. 1. (See FAY.)
Robin Gray (Auld). Words by Lady Anne Lindsay, daughter of the Earl of Balcarres, and afterwards Lady Barnard, in 1772, written to an old Scotch tune called "The bridegroom gray when the sun gaz'd down." Auld Robin Gray was the herdsman of her father. When Lady Anne had written a part, she called her younger sister for advice. She said, "I am writing a ballad of virtuous distress in humble life. I have oppressed my heroine with sundry troubles: for example, I have sent her Jamie to sea, broken her father's arm, made her mother sick, given her Auld Robin Gray for a lover, and want a third sorrow: can you help me to one?" "Steal the cow, sister Anne," said the little Elizabeth; so the cow was stolen away, and the song completed.

Robin Hood is first mentioned by the Scottish historian Fordun, who died in 1386. According to Stow, he was an outlaw in the reign of Richard I. (twelfth century). He entertained one hundred tall men, all good archers, with the spoil he took, but "he suffered no woman to be oppressed, violated, or otherwise molested; poor men's goods he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbeys and houses of rich carles." He was an immense favourite with the common people, who have dubb'd him a Earl. Stukeley says he was Robert Fitzooth, Earl of Huntingdon. (See Robert.)

According to one tradition, Robin Hood and Little John were two heroes defeated with Simon de Montfort at the battle of Evesham, in 1265. Fuller, in his Worthies, considers him an historical character, but Thierry says he simply represents a class—viz. the remnant of the old Saxon race, which lived in perpetual defiance of the Norman oppressors from the time of hereward.

Other examples of similar combinations are the Cumberland bandits, headed by Adam Bell, Clym of the Clongh, and William of Cloudesley.

An old sporting magazine of December, 1808, says the true name of Robin Hood was Fitzooth, and Fitz being omitted leaves Ooth, and converting th into d it became "Ood." He was grandson of Ralph Fitzooth, Earl of Kyme, a Norman, who came to England in the reign of William Rufus. His maternal grandfather was Gilbert de Gaunt, Earl of Lincoln, and his grandmother was Lady Roisia de Bere, sister to the Earl of Oxford. His father was under the guardianship of Robert, Earl of Oxford, who, by the king's order, gave him in marriage the third daughter of Lady Roisia. (Notes and Queries, May 21st, 1887.)

"The traditions about Fulk Fitz-Warine, great-grandson of Warine of Metz, so greatly resemble those connected with Robin Hood," that some suppose them to be both one. Fitz-Warine quarrelled with John, and when John was king he banished Fulk, who became a bold forester. (See Notes and Queries, November 27th, 1886, pp. 421-424.)

Bow and arrow of Robin Hood. The traditional bow and arrow of Robin Hood are religiously preserved at Kirkles Hall, Yorkshire, the seat of Sir George Armitage; and the site of his grave is pointed out in the park.

Death of Robin Hood. He was hanged to death treacherously by a nun, instigated to the foul deed by his kinsman, the prior of Kirkles, Yorkshire, near Halifax. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Ivanhoe.

Epitaph of Robin Hood.

"Hear, underneath this lintl urn,
Laid Robert earl of Huntington;
Next aye yer as he she greed,
An jyf kand hu Robin Hood.
Such utaz as he an bis men
Vil England give aigen."

"Notwithstanding this epitaph, it is generally thought that Robin Hood died in 1325, which would bring him into the reign of Edward II., not Richard I., according to Sir Walter Scott.

In the accounts of King Edward II.'s household is an item which states that "Robin Hood received his wages as king's valet, and a gratuity on leaving the service." One of the ballads relates how Robin Hood took service under this king.

Many talk of Robin Hood who never shot with his bow. Many brag of deeds in which they took no part. Many talk of Robin Hood, and wish their hearers to suppose they took part in his adventures, but they never put a slant to one of his bows; nor could they have bont it even if they had tried.

To sell Robin Hood's pennyworth is to sell things at half their value. As Robin Hood stole his wares, he sold them, under their intrinsic value, for just what he could get on the nonce.

Robin Hood and Guy of Gisborne. Robin Hood and Little John, having had a tiff, part company; when Little John falls into the hands of the sheriff of Nottingham, who binds him to a tree.
Meanwhile, Robin Hood meets with Guy of Gisborne, sworn to slay the "bold forrester." The two bowmen struggle together, but Guy is slain, and Robin Hood rides till he comes to the tree where Little John is bound. The sheriff mistakes him for Guy of Gisborne, and gives him charge of the prisoner. Robin cuts the cord, hands Guy's bow to Little John, and the two soon put to flight the sheriff and his men. (Percy: Reliques, etc., series i.)

Robin Hood Wind (4). A cold thaw-wind. Tradition runs that Robin Hood used to say he could bear any cold except that which a thaw-wind brought with it.

Robin Mutton (4). A simpleton.

"Do you see this ram? His name is Robin. Here, Robin, Robin, Robin... We will get a pair of scales, and then you, Robin Mutton [Pantu. shall be weighed against Tup Robin, etc.—Reliques: Pantagruel, 11. 7.

Robin Redbreast. The tradition is that when our Lord was on His way to Calvary, a robin picked a thorn out of His crown, and the blood which issued from the wound falling on the bird dyed its breast with red. (See Christian Traditions.)

Robin Redbreasts. Bow Street runners were so called from their red waistcoats.

Robin and Makyne (2 syl.). An ancient Scottish pastoral. Robin is a shepherd for whom Makyne sighs. She goes to him and tells her love, but Robin turns a deaf ear, and the damsel goes home to weep. After a time the tables are turned, and Robin goes to Makyne to plead for her heart and hand: but the damsel replies—

"T'is man that will not when he may Sall have nocht when he wald."—Percy: Reliques, etc., series ii.

Robin of Bagshot. Noted for the number of his aliases (see Alias); but Deeming had nine: viz. Williams, Ward, Swanson, Levey, Lord Dunn, Lawson, Rollatt, Drew, and Baron Swanston.

"You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot."

Robinson Crusoe. Alexander Selkirk was found in the desert island of Juan Fernandez, where he had been left by Captain Stradling. He remained on the island four years and four months, when he was rescued by Captain Rogers, and brought to England. The embryo of De Foe's novel may be seen in Captain Burney's interesting narrative.

Robinsonians. They were followers of John Robinson, of Leyden. The Brownists were followers of Robert Brown. The Brownists were most rigid separatists; the Robinsonians were only semi-separatists.

Roo. A fabulous white bird of enormous size, and such strength that it can "truss elephants in its talons," and carry them to its mountain nest, where it devour them. (Arabian Nights; The Third Calender, and Sinbad the Sailor.)

Roch (St.). Patron of those afflicted with the plague, because he devoted his life to their service, and is said to intercede for them in his exaltation. He is depicted in a pilgrim's habit, lifting his dress to display a plague-spot on his thigh, which an angel is touching that he may cure it. Sometimes he is accompanied by a dog bringing bread in his mouth, in allusion to the legend that a hound brought him bread daily while he was perishing in a forest of pestilence.

St. Roch's Day (August 16th), formerly celebrated in England as a general harvest-home, and styled "the great August festival." The Anglo-Saxon name of it was harfest (herb-feast), the word herb meaning autumn (German herbst), and having no relation to what we call herbs.

St. Roch et son chien. Inseparables; Darby and Joan.

"Perhaps it may be justly attributed to a class of producers, men de la vieille roche, that they have been so slow to apprehend the changes which are daily presenting themselves in the requirements of trade."—The Times.

Sir Boyle Roche's bird. Sir Boyle Roche, quoting from JVevon's play (The Devil of a Wife), said on one occasion in the House, "Mr. Speaker, it is impossible I could have been in two places at once, unless I were a bird."

"Presuming that the duplicate card is the knife of hearts, you may make a remark on the ubiquitous nature of certain cards, which, like Sir Boyle Roche's bird, are in two places at once."—Drawing-room Magic.

Rochelle Salt. So called because it was discovered by an apothecary of Rochelle, named Seignette, in 1672.

Rochez (Catharine de) had a collection of poems written on her, termed La Fucie de Grands-jours de Fétiers.

Rochester. According to Bede, derives its name from "Hroth," a Saxon chieftain. (Hroth's-caster, Hroth's castle.)
Rock. A quack; so called from one Rock, who was the "Holloway" of Queen Anne’s reign.

"Oh, when his nerves had once received a shock, Sir Isaac Newton might have gone to Rock." — Crabbe: Borough.

The Ladies’ Rock. A crag in Scotland under the castle rock of Stirling, where ladies used to witness tournaments.

"In the castle hill is a hollow called The Valley about a square acre in extent, used for justings and tournaments. On the south side of the valley is a small rocky pyramidal mount, called The Ladies’ Hill or Rock, where the ladies sat to witness the spectacle." — Nimmo: History of Stirlingshire, p. 242.

People of the Rock. The inhabitants of Hejaz or Arabia Petrea.

Captain Rock. A fictitious name assumed by the leader of the Irish insurgents in 1822.

Rock ahead (A). A sea-phrase, meaning that a rock is in the path of the ship, which the helmsman must steer clear of; a danger threatens; an opponent; an obstruction.

"That yonker . . . has been a rock ahead to me all my life." — Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. iii.

Rock Cork. A variety of asbestos, resembling cork. It is soft, easily cut, and very light.

Rock Crystal. The specimens which enclose hair-like substances are called Thetis’s hair-stone, Venus’s hair-stone, Venus’s pencils, Cupid’s net, Cupid’s arrows, etc.

Rock Day. The day after Twelfth-day, when, the Christmas holidays being over, women returned to their rock or distaff.

Rococo. C’est du rococo. It is mere twaddle; Brummagem finery; make-believe. (Italian rococo, uncouth.)

Rococo Architecture. A debased style, which succeeded the revival of Italian architecture, and very prevalent in Germany. The ornamentation is without principle or taste, and may be designated ornamental design run mad. The Rock-temple of Ellora, in India, is most lavishly decorated.

"The sacristy of St. Lorenzo . . . was the beginning of that wonderful mixture of antique regularity with the capricious bizarreness of modern times, the last barren fruit of which was the rococo." — H. Grimm: Michel Angelo, vol. ii. chap. x. p. 178.

Rococo Jewellery, strictly speaking, means showy jewellery made up of several different stones. Moorish decoration and Watteau’s paintings are rococo. The term is now generally used deprecatingly for flashy, gaudy. Louis XIV, furniture, with gilding and ormolu, is sometimes termed rococo.

Rod. To kiss the rod. (See Kiss the Rod.)

Rod-men. Anglers, who use line and fishing-rod.

"You will be nearly sure to meet one or two old, rod-men sipping their toddy there." — J. K. Jerome. Three Men in a Boat, chap. xvii.

Rod in Pickle (A). A scolding in store. The rod is laid in pickle to keep it ready for use.

Roderick, the thirty-fourth and last of the Visigothic kings, was the son of Theod’ofred, a baron grandson of King Chindasun’tho. Wit’za, the usurper, put out the eyes of Theod’ofred, and murdered Pavila, a younger brother of Roderick; but Roderick, having recovered his father’s throne, put out the eyes of the usurper. The sons of Wit’za, joining with Count Julian, invited the aid of Muza ibn Nozir, the Arab chief, who sent Tarik into Spain with a large army. Roderick was routed at the battle of Guadale’te, near Xeres de la Fronte’ra (July 17th, 711). Southey has taken this story for an epic poem in twenty-five books—blank verse. (See Rodrigo.)

Rod’erick Random. (See Random.)

Roderigo. A Venetian gentleman in Shakespeare’s Othello. He was in love with Desdemona, and when the lady eloped with Othello, hated the “noble Moor.” Iago took advantage of this temper for his own ends, told his dupe the Moor will change, therefore “put money in thy purse.” The burden of his advice was always the same—“Put money in thy purse.”

This word is sometimes pronounced Rod’r-igo: r. g. “It is as sure as you are Rodhaver. The lady-love of Zal, a Persian hero. Zal wanted to scale her bower, and Rodhaver let down her long tresses to assist him; but the lover managed to climb to his mistress by fixing his crook into a projecting beam. (Champion: Ferdosi.)

Rodilar’dus. A huge cat which scared Panurge, and which he declared to be a puny devil. The word means “gnaw-bacon” (Latin, rode-lardum). (Kabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iv. 67.)

Rodol’pho (Count). The count, returning from his travels, puts up for the night at an inn near his castle. While in bed, a lady enters his chamber, and speaks to him of her devoted love. It is Amina, the somnambulist, who has wandered thither in her sleep. Rodolpho perceives the state of the case, and quits the apartment. The villagers next morning come to congratulate their lord on his return, and find his bed occupied by a lady. The tongue of scandal is loud against her, but the count explains to them the mystery, and his tale is confirmed by their own eyes, which see Amina at the moment getting out of the window of a mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of a roof under which the wheel of the mill is rolling with velocity. She crosses the crazy bridge securely, and everyone is convinced of her innocence. (Bellini: La Sonnambula.) (See AMINA, ELVINO.)

Rodomont (in Orlando Inamorado and Orlando Furioso). King of Sarza or Algiers. Ulisse's son, and called the "Mars of Africa." He was commander both of horse and foot in the Saracen army sent against Charlemagne, and may be termed the Achilles of the host. His lady-love was Doralis, Princess of Grana'da, who ran off with Mandricardo, King of Tartary. At Rogero's wedding-feast Rodomont rode up to the king of France in full armour, and accused Rogero, who had turned Christian, of being a traitor to King Agramant, his master and a renegade: whereupon Rogero met him in single combat, and slew him. (See ROGERO.)

"Who more brave than Rodomont?"—Cervantes: Don Quixote.

Rodomont's de (4 syl.). From Rodomont, a brave but bragart knight in Bojardo's Orlando Inamorado. He is introduced into the continuation of the story by Ariosto (Orlando Furioso), but the bragart part of his character is greatly toned down. Neither Rodomont nor Hector deserves the opprobrium which has been attached to their names. (See RODOMONT.)

Rodrico [Rod-rec'-go] or Roderick, King of Spain, conquered by the Arabs. He saved his life by flight, and wandered to Guadalet's, where he saw a shepherd, and asked food. In return he gave the shepherd his royal chain and ring. He passed the night in the cell of a hermit, who told him that by way of penance he must pass certain days in a tomb full of snakes, toads, and lizards. After three days the hermit went to see him, and he was unhurt, "because the Lord kept his anger against him." The hermit went home, passed the night in prayer, and went again to the tomb, when Rodrigo said, "They eat me now, they eat me now, I feel the adder's bite." So his sin was atoned for, and he died.

Rogation Days. The Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday before Ascension Day. Rogation is the Latin equivalent of the Greek word "Litany," and on the three Rogation days "the Litany of the Saints" is appointed to be sung by the clergy and people in public procession. ("Litany," (Greek litania, supplication. "Rogation," Latin rogatio, same meaning.)

Rogation Week used to be called Gang Week, from the custom of gangling round the country parishes to mark their bounds. Similarly, the weed Milkwort is still called Rogation or Gangflower, from the custom of decorating the pole (carried on such occasions by the charity children) with these flowers.

Roger of Greece. A knight, whose exploits and adventures form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance entitled Atadis y Gaul. This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Roger. The cook in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. "He cowde roste, sethe, broile, and frie. Make morteux, and wel bake a pike;" but Henry Bollif, the host, said to him—

"Now telle on, Roger, and take it be good:
For many a Jakk of Dover hastow sold.
That hath be twyes boote and twyes cold."—Verse 1453.

Roger Bontemps. (See BONTEMS.) The Jolly Roger. The black flag, the favourite ensign of pirates.

"Set all sail, clear the deck, stand to quarters, up with the Jolly Roger!"—Sir Walter Scott: The Pirate, chap. xxxi.

Roger of Bruges. Roger van der Weyde, painter. (1450-1529.)

Roger de Coverley. A dance invented by the great-grandfather of Roger de Coverley, or Roger of Cowley, near Oxford. Named after the squire described in Addison's Spectator.

Roger of Howden or Howdin, in Yorkshire, continued Bede's History from 732 to 1202. The reigns of Henry II. and Richard I. are very fully given. The most matter-of-fact of all our old chroniclers: he indulges in no epithets or reflections.

Roger, Ruggiero, or Risteni of Risa (in Orlando Furioso), was brother of Marphisa, and son of Rogero and Galasella. He married Bradamant, Charlemagne's niece, but had no issue.

Gaëtella being slain by Agolant and his sons, Rogero was nursed by a lioness.

Rogero deserted from the Moorish army to the Christian Charles, and was baptised. His marriage with Bradamant and election to the crown of Bulgaria conclude the poem.

Rogero was brought up by Atlantes, a magician, who gave him a shield of such dazzling splendour that everyone quailed who set eyes on it. Rogero, thinking it unknighthly to carry a charmed shield, threw it into a well.

"Who more courteous than Rogero?"—Constance: Don Quixote.

Rogero (in Jerusalem Delivered), brother of Beramond, and son of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race, was one of the band of adventurers in the crusading army. Slain by Tisaphernes. (Bk. xx.)

Rogue Ingrain (A). Ingrain colours are what we call "fast colours," colours which will not fly or wash out. A rogue ingrain means one rotten to the core, one whose villainy is deep-seated.

"Fist ingrain, sir: 'twill endure wind and weather."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, i. 3.

Rol Panado [King of Slops]. Louis XVIII. was so nicknamed. (1755, 1814-1824.)

Roland, Count of Mans and Knight of Blives, was son of Duke Milo of Aiglant, his mother being Bertha, the sister of Charlemagne. His sword was called Durandal, and his horse Veilant. He was eight feet high, and had an open countenance, which invited confidence, but inspired respect. In Italian romance he is called Orlando, his sword Durandal, and his horse Vegliantino. (See Song of Roland.)

"I knew of no one to compare him to but the Archangel Michael."—Croquembouche, iil.

Roland. Called the Christian Theseus (2 cly.), or the Achilles of the West.

Roland or Orlando (Orlando in Italian). One of Charlemagne's paladins and nephews. He is represented as brave, loyal, and simple-minded. On the return of Charlemagne from Spain, Roland, who commanded the rear-guard, fell into an ambuscade at Roncesvalles, in the Pyrenees, and perished with all the flower of French chivalry (778). He is the hero of Théroulde's Chanson de Roland; the romance called Chronique de Turpin; Bolardo's epic Orlando in Lore (Italian); and Ariosto's epic of Orlando Mad (Italian).

Roland, after slaying Angoulême, the Saracen giant, in single combat at Fuent, asked as his reward the hand of Aude, daughter of Sir Gerard and Lady Guitibour; but they never married, as Roland fell at Roncesvalles, and Aude died of a broken heart. (Croquembouche, xi.)

A Roland for an Oliver. A blow for a blow, tit for tat. Roland and Oliver were two of the paladins of Charlemagne, whose exploits are so similar that it is very difficult to keep them distinct. What Roland did Oliver did, and what Oliver did Roland did. At length the two met in single combat, and fought for five consecutive days on an island in the Rhine, but neither gained the least advantage. (See in La Légende des Siècles, by Victor Hugo, the poem entitled Le Mariage de Roland.)

The etymologies connecting the proverb with Charles II., General Monk, and Oliver Cromwell, are wholly unworthy of credit, for even Shakespeare alludes to it: "England all Olivres and Rolandes bred" (Henry V., i. 2); and Edward Hall, the historian, almost a century before Shakespeare, writes—

"But to have a Roland to rival an Oliver, he sent sub nomine ambassadors to the King of England, offering his own daughter in marriage."—Henry VI.

(See Oliver, Breche.)

"In French, a bon chat bon rat.
To die like Roland. To die of starvation or thirst. It is said that Roland, the great paladin, set upon in the defile of Roncesvalles, escaped the general slaughter, and died of hunger and thirst in seeking to cross the Pyrenees.

"Post, in gentem Hispanicam cadem prope Pyreneae caller jusca... sub imperio extenuat... in Graecia nubecula felix est ut illum volentes significatione ac torque, facturam, Rolandum morire se vireat...—John de la Bruyère: Champs: Re Colom., xi. 5.

Fair le Roland. To swagger.
Like the blast of Roland's horn. When Roland was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvalles, he sounded his horn to give Charlemagne notice of his danger. At the third blast it cracked in two, but so loud was the blast that birds fell dead and the whole Saracen army was panic-struck. Charlemagne heard the sound at St. Jean Pied de Port, and rushed to the rescue, but arrived too late.

"Oh, for one blast of that dread horn
On Fuentaranus echoes borne,
That bold King Charles did come."—Sir Walter Scott: Nov: Morivion, vi. 28.

Song of Roland. Part of the Chansons de Geste, which treat of the achievements of Charlemagne and his paladins. William of Normandy had it sung at the head of his troops when he came to invade England.
Song of Roland. When Charlemagne had been six years in Spain, by the advice of Roland, his nephew, he sent Ganelon on an embassy to Marsillus, the pagan king of Saragossa. Ganelon, out of jealousy, betrayed to Marsillus the route which the Christian army designed to take on its way home, and the pagan king arrived at Roncesvalles just as Roland was conducting through the pass a rearguard of 20,000 men. Roland fought till 100,000 Saracens lay slain, and only 50 of his own men survived. At this juncture another army, consisting of 50,000 men, poured from the mountains. Roland now blew his enchanted horn, and blew so loudly that the veins of his neck started. Charlemagne heard the blast, but Ganelon persuaded him that it was only his nephew hunting the deer. Roland died of his wounds, but in dying threw his trusty sword Durandal into a poisoned stream, where it remained.

Roland de Vaux (Sir). Baron of Triermain, who woke Gyneth from her long sleep of five hundred years and married her. (Sir Walter Scott: Bridal of Triermain.)

Rolandsock Tower, opposite the Drachenfels. The legend is that when Roland went to the wars, a false report of his death was brought to his betrothed, who retired to a convent in the isle of Nonneworth. When Roland returned home flushed with glory, and found that his lady-love had taken the veil, he built the castle which bears his name, and overlooks the nunery, that he might at least see his heart-treasure, lost to him for ever.

Roll. The flying roll of Zechariah (v. 1-5). "Predictions of evils to come on a nation are like the Flying Roll of Zechariah." This roll (twenty cubits long and ten wide) was full of maledictions, threats, and calamities about to befall the Jews. The parchment being unrolled fluttered in the air.

Rolls [Chancery Lane, London]. So called from the records kept there in rolls of parchment. The house was originally built by Henry III, for converted Jews, and was called "Domus Conversorum." It was Edward III, who appropriated the place to the conservation of records. "Conversi" means lay monks. (Ducange, vol. ii. p. 703.)

Glover's Roll. A copy of the lost Roll of Arms, made by Glover, Somerset herald. It is a roll of the arms borne by Henry III, his princes of the blood, barons, and knights, between 1216 and 1272.

The Roll of Caerlaverock. An heraldic poem in Norman-French, reciting the names and arms of the knights present at the siege of Caerlaverock, in 1300.

Rolling Stone. A rolling stone gathers no moss.

Greek: Λίθος κυλιόμενος το φύκεσ ω μοσ. (Eranmis : Proverbs ; Ambitutius.)

Latin: Saxum volutum non obducitur musco (or Saxum volubile etc.)

Planta que sepius transfertur non coalescit. (Fabius.)

Sepius plantata arbor fructum profert exiguum.

French: Pierre qui roule n'amasse jamais mousse.

La pierre souvent remuée n'amasse pas volontiers mousse.

Pierre souvent remuée n'attire pas mousse.

Italian: Pietra mossa non fa muschio.

"Three remotes are as bad as a fire."

"I never saw an off-removed tree,
Nor yet an off-removed family.
That thrive so well as those that settled he."

Rellrich or Bowldrich Stones, near Chipping Norton (Oxfordshire). A number of large stones in a circle, which tradition says are men turned to stone. The highest of them is called the King, who "would have been king of England if he could have caught sight of Long Compton," which may be seen a few steps farther on; five other large stones are called the knights, and the rest common soldiers.

Roly-poly (pron. roul-y poul-y). A crust with jam rolled up into a pudding; a little fat child. Roly is a thing rolled with the diminutive added. In some parts of Scotland the game of nine-pins is called rouly-pouly.

Romantic. Modern or Romanised Greek.

Roman (The). Jean Dumont, the French painter, le Romain (1700-1781).

Stephen Picart, the French engraver, le Romain (1631-1721).

Giulio Pippi, Giulio Romano (1492-1546).

Adrian van Roomen, the mathematician, Adria'nus Roma'num (1661-1616).

Most learned of the Romans. Marcus Terentius Varro (b.c. 116-28).

Last of the Romans, Pini'zi (1310-1354).
Roman Birds. Eagles; so called because the ensign of the Roman legion was an eagle.

"Romana aevae propria legio'num num'ina."—Tacitus.

Roman Remains in England. The most remarkable are the following:

The pharos, church, and trenches in Dover.
Chilham Castle, Richborough, and Reculver forts.
Silchester (Berkshire), Dorchester, Nisconium (Salop), and Caerleon, amphitheatres.

Hadrian's wall, from Tyne to Boulness.
The wall, baths, and Newport Gate of Lincoln.
Verulam, near St. Albans.
York (Eboracum), where Severus and Constantius Chlorus died, and Constantine the Great was born.
Bath, etc.

Roman de Chevalier de Lyon, by Maitre Wace, Canon of Caen in Normandy, and author of Le Brut. The romance referred to is the same as that entitled Yean and Garvan.

Roman de la Rose. (See Iliad, The French.)

Romance. A tale in prose or verse of the incidents of which are hung upon what is marvellous and fictitious.

These tales were originally written in the Romance language (g.t.), and the expression, "In Romance we read," came in time to refer to the tale, and not to the language in which it was told.

Romance of chivalry may be divided into three groups:—(1) that relating to Arthur and his Round Table; (2) that relating to Charlemagne and his paladins; (3) that relating to Amadis and Palmerin. In the first are but few fairies; in the second they are shown in all their glory; in the third (which belongs to Spanish literature) we have no fairies, but the enchantress Urgaun la Deaconide.

It is misleading to call such poetical tales as the Bride of Abydos, Lalla Rookh, and the Chansons of the Moundres, etc.,

Romanesque (3 syl.).

In painting. fanciful and romantic rather than true to nature.

In architecture. Byzantine, Lombard, Saxon, and, indeed, all the debased Roman styles, between the time of Constantine (350) and Charlemagne (800).

In literature. The dialect of Langue-doc, which smacks of the Romance.

Romancé or Romance Languages. These modern languages which are the immediate offspring of Latin, as the Italian, Spanish, Portuguese, and French. Early French is emphatically so called; hence Bouillet says, "Le roman était universellement parlé en Gaule au dixième siècle."

"Frankish speech is called Romance. So say clerks and men of France."—Robert Le Brun.

Romanism. Popery, or what resembles Popery, the religion of modern Rome. (A word of implied reproach.)

Romantic School. The name assumed, at the beginning of the nineteenth century, by a number of young poets and critics in Germany, who wished to limit poetry and art to romance. Some twenty-five years later Victor Hugo, Lamartine, and Dumas introduced it into France.

Romano (N.), a Norman bishop of the seventh century, is depicted fighting with a dragon, in allusion to the tale that he miraculously conquered a dragon which infested Normandy.

Romany. Gipsy language, the speech of the Romy or Zincali. This has nothing to do with Rome.

"A learned statistician...said...that he found it interesting to be able to study a Hindustani dialect in the heart of Europe."—Lecky: English Dialect, chap. viii, p. 190.

Rome. Virgil says of Romulus, "Marvortia runder mencia. Romanusque non de nomine dicit" (Aeneid, i. 276). The words of the Sibyl, quoted by Servius, are "Romane Romanus nase." Romulus is a diminutive or word of endearment for Romus.

The etymology of Rome from Roma (mother of Romulus and Remus), or from Romulus, the legendary founder of the city, or from ruma (a dug), in allusion to the hole of a wolf suckling the outcast children, is not tenable. Niebuhr derives it from the Greek word rhoma (strength), a suggestion confirmed by its other name Valentia, from valeo (strong). Michelet prefers Ruma, the ancient name of the river Tiber.
Rome. Founders of Rome. (1) Romulus, the legendary founder, B.C. 752; (2) Camillus was termed the Second Romulus, for saving Rome from the Gauls, B.C. 365; (3) Caius Marius was called the Third Romulus, for saving Rome from the Teutoones and Cimbri, B.C. 101.

From Rome to May. A bantering expression, equivalent to the following:—“From April to the foot of Westminster Bridge; “Inter pacea Rennegae favat” (Reinardus, ii. 690); “Inter Cluniacum et Sancti festa Johannis obit” (Reinardus, iv. 972); “Cela s'est passé entre Mauceuge et la Pentecôte.”

“This sits at Rome and striving with the Pope. Never tread on a man's corns. Never wear a brown hat in Friesland” (g.v.).

Mr. Harrison the steward, and Griswell the butcher, are no fond of us, and it's all sitting at Rome and grumbling with the pope. I thought it best to sit before it came.”—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. viii.

Oh, that all Rome had but one head, that I might strike it off at a blow! Caligula, the Roman emperor, is said to have uttered this amiable sentiment.

When you go to Rome, do as Rome does—i.e. conform to the manners and customs of those amongst whom you live, and don't wear a brown hat in Friesland. St. Monica and her son St. Augustine, said to St. Ambrose: At Rome they fast on Saturday, but not so at Milan; which practice ought to be observed? To which St. Ambrose replied, “When I am at Milan, I do as they do at Milan; but when I go to Rome, I do as Rome does.” (Epistle xxxvi.) Compare 2 Kings v. 18, 19.

Rome of the West. Aachen, or Aix-la-Chapelle, the favourite city of Charlemagne, where, when he died, he was seated, embalmed, on a throne, with the Bible on his lap, his sword (La Joyeuse) by his side, the imperial crown on his head, and his sceptre and shield at his feet. So well had the Egyptians embalmed him, that he seemed only to be asleep.

Rome was not Built in a Day. Achievements of great pith and moment are not accomplished without patient perseverance and a considerable interval of time. The French say, “Grand bien ne vient pas en peu d’heures,” but the English proverb is to be found in the French also: “Rome n'a pas été faite en un jour.” (1615.)

Rome was not built in a day, like Anchialae, of Chile, where Sardanapalus was buried. It is said that Anchialae was actually built in a day.

Rome's best Wealth is Patriotism. So said Metius Curtius, when he jumped into the chasm which the soothsayers gave out would never close till Rome threw therein “its best wealth.”

Romeo (4). A devoted lover: a lady's man; from Romeo in Shakespeare's tragedy. (See Romeo and Juliet.)

"James in an ill hour went forth to woo. Young Juliet Hart, and was her Romeo." Crabbe: Borough.

Rome and Juliet (Shakespeare). The story is taken from a poetical version by Arthur Brooke of Boistefor's novel, called Romeo and Julietta. Boistefor borrowed the main incidents from a story by Luigi da Porto, of Vicenza (1555), entitled La Giuiletta. In many respects it resembles the Ephesiaec (in ten books) of Ephesius Xenophon, whose novel recounts the loves of Habroc'omas and Anthis.

Romulus. We need no Romulus to account for Rome. We require no hypothetical person to account for a plain fact.

"Romulus and Remus were suckled by a wolf;" Atalanta by a she-bear.

Ron or Rome. The name of Prince Arthur's spear, made of ebony.

"His spere he nam [took] an bonde, the Ron was thinan [called]." Layamon: Brut (twelfth century).

Ronald. Lord Ronald gave Lady Clare a lily-white doe as a love-token, and the cousins were to be married on the following day. Lady Clare opened her heart to Alice the nurse, and was then informed that she was not Lady Clare at all, but the nurse's child, and that Lord Ronald was rightful heir to the estate. "Lady" Clare dressed herself as a peasant, and went to reveal the mystery to her lord. Ronald replied, "If you are not the heiress born, we will be married to-morrow, and you shall still be Lady Clare." (Tennyson.)

Roncesvalles (4 syl.). A defile in the Pyrenees, famous for the disaster which here befell the rear of Charlemagne's army, on the return march from Saragossa. Ganelon betrayed Roland, out of jealousy, to Marsillus, King of the Saracens, and an ambuscade attacking the Franks, killed every man of them. Amongst the slain were Roland, Oliver, Turpin, and Mitaine, the emperor's godchild. An account of this attack is given in the epilogue of Cogemuitâne; but the historical narrative is derived from Eginehard.
Rondo

Father of the rondo. Jean Baptiste Davaux: but Gluck was the first to introduce the musical rondo into France, in the opera of Orpheus.

Rome (1 syl.). (See Ron.)

Ron'yon or Ronion. A term of contempt to a woman. It is the French rognon (scabby, mangy).

"You beg, you bagage, you polent, you ronyon out!"—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 2.

"Arant thee, watch!" the rampall ronyon cries.

Shakespeare: Macbeth, i. 3.

Rook Lane (London). So called from a rook or "Jesus on the Cross" placed there, and in Roman Catholic times held in great veneration.

Rood-loft (The). The screen between the nave and chancel, where the rood or crucifix was elevated. In some cases, on each side of the crucifix were either some of the evangelists or apostles, and especially the saint to whom the church was dedicated.

"And then to see the rood-loft,
So bravely set with saints."

Percy: Ballad of Plain Truth, ii. 392.

Roodselkern. Vervain, or "the herb of the cross."

"Hallowed be thou, vervain, as thou growest in the ground,
For in the Mount of Calvary thou wast found.
Thou bleedest Christ our Saviour, and staunchest his bleeding wound.
In the name of Father, Son and Holy Ghost, I take thee from the ground."

Folklore: Plant Lore, p. 47.

Rook (A). A cheat. "To rook," to cheat; "to rook a pigeon," to fleece a greenhorn. Sometimes it simply means, to win from another at a game of chance or skill. (See Rookery.)

"My Lord Marquis," said the king, "you rook me at piquet last night, for which disloyal deed thou shalt now atone, by giving a couple of pieces to this honest youth, and five to the girl."

—Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxx.

Rook's Hill (Lavant, Chichester), celebrated for the local tradition that the golden calf of Aaron is buried there.

Rookery (3 syl.). Any low neighbourhood frequented by thieves and vagabonds. A person fleeced or liable to be fleeced is a pigeon, but those who prey upon these "gulls" are called rooks.

"The demolition of rookeries has not proved an efficient remedy for overcrowding."—A. Eynont Hale: Free Trade in Capital, chap. xv.

Rooky Wood (The). Not the wood where rooks do congregate, but the misty or dark wood. The verb rook (to exalt, vapour) had the preterite rode; rook, or rook: hence Hamilton, in his Wallace, speaks of the "rooky mist."

"Light thickens, and the crow Makes wing to the rooky wood."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, iii. 2.

Room. Your room is better than your company, occurs in Green's Quip for an Upstart Courtier.

Roost. A strong current or furious tide betwixt island groups.

"This lofty promontory is constantly exposed to the current of a strong and furious tide, which setting in betwixt the Orkney and Zelien islands, and running with force only inferior to that of the Pearlland Thriss... is called the Roost of Sumburgh (from the headland)."—Sir Walter Scott: The Pirate, chap. i.

Roost. Gone to roost. Gone to bed. (Anglo-Saxon, hoast.)

"The chough and crow to roost are gone."

Glea (word by Edmund Spenser, muse by Bishop).

Rope. The Brahmin teaches that "whoever hangs himself will wander eternally with a rope round his neck." (Asiatic Researches.)

Rope. To fight with a rope round one's neck. To fight with a certainty of being hanged unless you conquer.

"You must send in a large force... for, as he fights with a rope round his neck, he will struggle to the last."—Kingsley: The Three Admirals, vi.

To give one rope enough. To permit a person to continue in wrong-doing, till he reaps the consequences.

Rope. You carry a rope in your pocket (French). Said of a person very lucky at cards, from the superstition that a bit of rope with which a man has been hanged, carried in the pocket, secures luck at cards.

"You have no occupation?" said the Bench, inquiringly, to a sawhorse at the bar. "Beg your worship's pardon," was the reply. "I deal in bits of halter for the use of gentlemen as plays."—The Times (French correspondent).

Rope-dancer (The). Yvo de Gremmsmil, the crusader, one of the leaders of Robert, Duke of Normandy's party against Henry I. of England.

"Ivo was one of those who escaped from Antioch when it was besieged. He was set down by a rope over the wall, and hence called 'The Rope-dancer.'"—Gentleman's Magazine.

Rope-dancers. Jacob Hall, in the reign of Charles II., greatly admired by the Duchess of Cleveland.

Richer, the celebrated rope-dancer at Sadler's Wells (1658).

Signora Violante, in the reign of Queen Anne.

The Turk who astonished everyone who saw him, in the reign of George II.

Prioisart (vol. iv. chap. xxxviii. fol. 47) tells us of "a mayster from Geane," who either slid or walked down a rope suspended to the highest house on St. Michael’s bridge and the tower of Our Lady’s church, when Isabel of Bavaria made her public entry into Paris. Some say he descended dancing, placed a crown on Isabel’s head, and then re-asceded.

A similar performance was exhibited in London, February 19th, 1546, before Edward VI. The rope was slung from the battlements of St. Paul’s steeple. The performer of this feat was a man from Aragon.

The same trick was repeated when Felipe of Spain came to marry Queen Mary. (See Holinshed: Chronicle, iii. p. 1121.)

Rope-walk [barriestra's stang]. Old Bailey practice. Thus, “Gone into the rope-walk” means, he has taken up practice in the Old Bailey. (See Ropes.)

The ways of London low life are called and to know the ropes means to be an expert in all sorts of dodges. (See Ropes.)

Ropes. Fought back to the ropes. Fought to the bitter end. A pugilistic phrase.

“It is a battle that must be fought and right back to the ropes”—Bushwood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xvii.

Ropes. Tricks, artifices. A term in horse-racing. To rope a horse is to pull it in or restrain its speed, to prevent its winning a race. When a boxer or any other athlete loses for the purpose, he is accused of roping. “To know the ropes” is to be up to all the dodges of the sporting world. Of course, the ropes mean the reins.

“I am no longer the verdant country squire, the natural prey of swindlers, blacklegs, and sharks. No, sir, I know the ropes, and these gentry would find me but sore sport.”—Truth: Quer Story, September 3rd, 1893.

Ropes. She is on her high ropes. In a distant and haughty temper. The allusion is to a rope-dancer, who looks down on the spectators. The French say, Elle monte sur ses grands chevaux (to be on your high horse).

Roper. Margaret Roper was buried with the head of her father, Sir Thomas More, in her arms.

“Her, who chanced in her last trance
Her murdered father’s head.”—Tennyson.

Mistress Roper. A cant name given to the marines by British sailors. The wit, of course, lies in the awkward way that marines handle the ship’s ropes.

To marry Mistress Roper is to enlist in the marines.

Rope (1 syl.). A blunt, feeling old man in the service of Donna Florante. (George Columb: The Mountainers.)

Saint Rope. Patron saint of those who suffer from plague or pestilence; this is because “he worked miracles on the plague-stricken, while he was himself smitten with the same judgment.”

Roque Guinard. A famous robber, whose true name was Pedro Roche Guinarda, leader of los Nierros, which, with the los Cadelles, levied heavy contributions on all the mountain districts of Cataluña in the seventeenth century. He was a Spanish Rob Roy, and was executed in 1616. (Pollner.)

Roquelaure. A cloak; so called from the Duke de Roquelaure. (George II.)

“Your honour’s roquelaure,” replied the corporal, “has not once been bad on since the night before your honour received your wound.”—Burns: Tristram Shandy; Story of Le Perre.

Rory O’More. Slang for a door. (Explained under the word CHYV.)

Ros-grana. Daughter of Cormac, King of Moi-leus, wife of Fingal. (Ossian: Tamora, iv.)

Ro’sa (Sarvester). An Italian painter, noted for his scenes of savage nature, gloomy grandeur, and awe-creating magnificence. (1615-1673.)

“Whatever Lorain might touch with softened hue, Or savage Rosa dashed, or learned Poussin drew.”

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, canto 1.

Rosabelle. The favourite palfrey of Mary Queen of Scots. (See Horse.)

“I could almost swear I am at this moment mounted on my own favourite Rosabelle, who was never matched in Scotland for swiftness, for ease of motion, and for sureness of foot.”—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, chap. xxxvi.

Rosalia or St. Rosalie. A native of Palermo, who was carried by angels to an inaccessible mountain, where she lived for many years in the cleft of a rock, a part of which she wore away with her knees in her devotions. If anyone doubts it, let him know that a rock with a hole in it may still be seen, and folks less sceptical have built a chapel there, with a marble statue, to commemorate the event.

“That great where olives nod,
Where, darling of each heart and eye,
From all the youths of Sicily
St. Rosalie retired to God.”

Sir Walter Scott: Marjoram, I. 23.

St. Rosalia, in Christian art, is depicted in a cave with a cross and skull, or else in the act of receiving a rosary or chaplet of roses from the Virgin.
Rosalind

Daughter of the banished duke, but brought up with Celia in the court of Frederick, the duke's brother, and usurper of his dominions. When Rosalind fell in love with Orlando, Duke Frederick said she must leave his house and join her father in the forest of Arden. Celia resolved to go with her, and the two ladies started on their journey. For better security, they changed their names and assumed disguises; Celia dressed herself as a peasant-girl, and took for the nonce the name of Aliena: Rosalind dressed as her brother, and called herself Ganymede. They took up their quarters in a peasant's cottage, where they soon encountered Orlando, and (to make a long tale short) Celia fell in love with Oliver, the brother of Orlando, and Rosalind obtained her father's consent to marry Orlando. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Rosalind, in the Shepherd's Calendar, is the maiden vainly beloved by Colin Clout, as her choice was fixed on a shepherd named Menalos. (See below.)

Ros’alindo (3 syl.) The anagram of "Rose Danuil," or "Rose Daniel," with whom Speuser was in love, but the young lady married John Florio, lexicographer. In the Shepherd's Calendar Rose is called "Rosalinde," and Speuser calls himself "Colin Clout." Shakespeare introduces John Florio in Love's Labour's Lost, under the imperfect anagram Holofernes ("Hnes Floreo").

Ros'aline (3 syl.) A negress of sparkling wit and great beauty, attending on the Princess of France, and loved by Lord Biron, a nobleman in the suite of Ferdinand, King of Navarre. (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost.)

Ros'amond (Fair.) Higden, monk of Chester, says: "She was the fairest daughter of Walter, Lord Clifford, concubine of Henry II., and poisoned by Queen Eliaur, A.D. 1177. Henry made for her a house of wonderfull working, so that no man or woman might come to her. This house was named Labyrinthus, and was wrought like unto a knot in a garden called a maze. But the queen came to her by a clue of thredde, and so dealt with her that she lived not long after. She was buried at Godstow, in an house of nunnis, with these verses upon her tomb:

"Hic jacet in tumba Rosa mundi, non Rosa mundis. Non redolat, sed oleat, quae redolat esse solat."

Here Rose the graced, not Rose the chase, repukes;
The smell that rises is no smell of roses. R.C.B.

Rosamund Clifford is introduced by Sir Walter Scott in two of his novels—The Talisman and Woodstock.

"Jane Clifford was her name, as books aver; Fair Rosamund was but her nom de guerre."—Dryden: Epistle to Henry IV.

Rosa’na. Daughter of the Queen of Armenia. She aided the three sons of St. George to quench the seven lamps of the Knight of the Black Castle. (The Seven Champions of Christendom, ii. 8-9.) (See Lamps.)

Ros'ary [the rose article]. A name given to the head-roll employed by Roman Catholics for keeping count of their repetitions of certain prayers. It consists of three parts, each of which contains five mysteries connected with Christ or His virgin mother. The entire roll consists of 150 Are Marias, 15 Pater Nosters, and 15 doxologies. The word is said by some to be derived from the chaplet of beads, perfumed with roses, given by the Virgin to St. Dominic. (This cannot be correct, as it was in use A.D. 1100.) Others say the first chaplet of the kind was made of rosewood; others, again, maintain that it takes its name from the "Mystical Rose," one of the titles of the Virgin. The set is sometimes called "fifrons," from its containing 15 "doxologies," 15 "Our Fathers," and 10 times 15 or 150 "Hail Marys." (Latin, rosarium.)

The "Devotion of the Rosary" takes different forms. (1) the Great Rosary, or recitation of the whole fifteen mysteries (2) the Lesser Rosary, or recitation of one of the mysteries; and (3) the Lively Rosary, or the recitation of the fifteen mysteries by fifteen different persons in combination.

In regard to the "rosewood," this etymology is extremely doubtful. The beads are now made of bone, wood, ivory, stone, ivories, metal, or sometimes of considerable value.

Ros’ciad. A satire published by Charles Churchill in 1761; it canvasses the faults and merits of the metropolitan actors.

Roscius. A first-rate actor; so called from the Roman Roscius, unrivalled for his grace of action, melody of voice, conception of character, and delivery. He was paid thirty pounds a day for acting: Pliny says four thousand a year, and Cicero says five thousand.

"What scene of death hath Roscius now to act?"—Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., v. 6.

Another Roscius. So Camden terms Richard Burbage (1566-1619).

The British Roscius. Thomas Betterton, of whom Cibber says, "He alone was born to speak what only Shakespeare knew to write." (1635-1710.)

David Garrick (1716-1779).
The Rose of France. Michel Boyron, generally called Baron. (1653-1728.)
The Young Roscius. William Henry West Betty, who in fifty-six nights realised £4,500. (Died 1874, aged 54.)

Rose. Sir John Mandeville says—A Jewish maid of Bethlehem (whom Southey names Zillah) was beloved by one Ham'muel, a brutish son, Zillah rejected his suit, and Hamuel vowed vengeance. He gave out that Zillah was a demoniac, and she was condemned to be burnt: but God averted the flames, the stake buddled, and the maid stood unharmed under a rose-tree full of white and red roses; then “first seen on earth since Paradise was lost.”

Rose. An emblem of England. It is also the cognisance of the Richards, hence the rose in the mouth of one of the foxes which support the shield in the public-house called the Holland Arms, Kensington. The daughter of the Duke of Richmond (Lady Caroline Le Loux) ran away with Mr. Henry Fox, afterwards Baron Holland of Foxley. So the Fox stole the Rose and ran off with it.

Rose. In the language of flowers, different roses have a different signification. For example:—
The Burgundy Rose signifies simplicity and beauty.
The China Rose, grace or beauty everywhere.
The Daily Rose, a smile.
The Dog Rose, pleasure mixed with pain.
A Faded Rose, beauty is fleeting.
The Japan Rose, beauty your sole attraction.
The Moses Rose, voluptuous love.
The Musk Rose, capricious beauty.
The Provence Rose, my heart is in flames.
The White Rose Bud, too young to love.
The White Rose full of buds, secrecy.
A wreath of Roses, beauty and virtue rewarded.
The Yellow Rose, infidelity.

Rose. The red rose, says Sir John Mandeville, sprang from the extinguished flame heaped around the virgin martyr at Bethlehem, named Zillah. (See Rose.)

The Red Rose [of Lancaster]. (See ROSES, The Wars of the Roses.)

The Red Rose (as a public-house sign). Camden says the red rose was the accepted badge of Edmund Plantagenet, who was the second son of Henry III., and of the first Duke of Lancaster, surname Crouchbacke. It was also the cognisance of John of Gaunt, second Duke of Lancaster, in virtue of his wife, who was godchild of Edmund Crouchbacke, and his sole heir. (See above.)

The white rose, says Sir John Mandeville, sprang from the unkindled brands heaped around the virgin martyr at Bethlehem. (See Rose.)

The White Rose (as a public-house sign) was not first adopted by the Yorkists during the contest for the crown, as Shakespeare says. It was an hereditary cognisance of the House of York, and had been borne by them ever since the title was first created. It was adopted by the Jacobins as an emblem of the Pretender, because his adherents were obliged to abet him sub rosa (in secret).

No rose without a thorn. “There is a crook in every lot” (Boston): “No joy without alloy;” “There is a poisin[d]rop in man’s purest cup;” “Every path hath its puddle” (Scotch).

French: “Il n’y a point de roses sans épines,” or “Point de rose sans épine;”
“Il n’est si gentil mois d’Avril qui n’aît son chapeau de greil.”

Italian: “Non v’è rosa senza spina;”
“Ogni modaglia ha il suo reverso.”

Latin: “Nihil est ab omni parte beatum” (Horace: 2 Odes, x. 27);
“Curte necio quid semper aest rei.”

Under the rose (sous le rosee). In strict confidence. Cupid gave Harpoy rates (the god of silence) a rose, to bribe him not to betray the amours of Venus. Hence the flower became the emblem of silence. It was for this reason sculptured on the ceilings of banquet-rooms, to remind the guests that what was spoken sub rute was not to be uttered sub dieo. In 1526 it was placed over confessinals. The banquet-room ceiling at Haddon Hall is decorated with roses. (French, parler sous la rose.)

Rose (in Christian art). The attribute of St. Dorothea, who carries roses in a basket; of St. Casilda, St. Elizabeth of Portugal, and St. Rose of Viterbo, who carry roses either in their hands or cups. St. Rosalia, St. Angelus, St. Rose of Lima, St. Asculus, St. Victoria, etc., wear crowns of roses.

“Rose, elle a une cuve que vivent les roses L’œuf d’un matin.”

Malherbe: À une maîtresse, sur la Mort de son Père.

Like other roses, thy sweet rose survived
While shone the morning sun, then drooped and died. E. G. B.

Rose for Rose-colored. A gold coin worth 6s. 8d. struck in 1444, under Edward III.; so called because it had
Rose Sunday

The fourth Sunday in Lent, when the Pope blesses the "Golden Rose." He dips it in balsam, sprinkles it with holy water, and incenses it. Strange as it may seem, Pope Julius II., in 1510, and Leo X. both sent the sacred rose to Henry VIII. In 1556 Isabella II. of Spain received the "Rose;" and both Charlotte, Empress of Mexico, and Eugénie, Empress of France, were honoured by it likewise.

The Rose Alley ambuscade. The attack on Dryden by hired ruffians in the employ of Rochester and the Duchess of Portsmouth, December 16th, 1679. This scandalous outrage was in revenge of a satire by Mulgrave, erroneously attributed to Dryden.

Attacks of this kind were not uncommon in "the age of chivalry;" witness the case of Sir John Coventry, who was waylaid and had his nose slit by some young men of rank for a reflection on the king's theatrical amours. This attack gave rise to the " Coventry Act" against maiming and wounding. Of a similar nature was the cowardly assassination of Mr. Mountford, in Norfolk Street, Strand, by Lord Mohun and Captain Hill, for the hypothetical offence of his admiration for Mrs. Bracegirdle.

"The Rose coffee-house, formerly called "The Red Cow," and subsequently "Will's," at the western corner of Bow Street, where John Dryden presided over the literature of the town. "Here," says Malcolm, "appeal was made to him upon every literary dispute." (Spence: Auroraeotis, p. 283.)

This coffee-house is referred to as "Russell Street Coffee-house," and "The Wits' Coffee-house."

"Will's continued to be the resort of the wits at least till 1710. Probably Addison established his servant [Button] in a new house about 1712."— Spence: Anecdotes, p. 263.

This Button had been a servant of the Countess of Warwick, whom Addison married; and Button's became the headquarters of the Whig literati, as Will's had been of the Tory.

Rose of Jericho. Also called Rosa Maria or Rose of the Virgin.

Rose of Baby (The). Cicely, the twelfth and youngest daughter of Ralph Neville, Earl of Westmoreland. (1415-1496.)

Rosetta Stone

Roses. The War of the Roses. A civil contest that lasted thirty years, in which eighty princes of the blood, a larger portion of the English nobility, and some 100,000 common soldiers were slain. It was a contest between the Lancastrians and Yorkists, whose supporters wore in their caps as badges a red or white rose, the Red rose (gules) being the cognisance of the House of Lancaster, and the White rose (argent) being the badge of the House of York. (1455-1485.)

Rosemary is Ros-marinus (sea-dew), and is said to be "useful in love-making." The reason is this: Both Venus, the love-goddess, and Rosemary or sea-dew, were offspring of the sea; and as Love is Beauty's son, Rosemary is his nearest relative.

"The sea his mother Venus came on: And hence some revenue she approve Of rosemary in making love."— Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 1.

Rosemary, an emblem of remembrance. Thus Ophelia says, "There's rosemary, that's for remembrance." According to ancient tradition, this herb strengthens the memory. As Hungary water, it was once very extensively taken to quiet the nerves. It was much used in weddings, and to wear rosemary in ancient times was as significant of a wedding as to wear a white favour. When the Nurse in Romeo and Juliet asks, "Dost not rosemary and Romeo begin both with a [i.e. one] letter?" she refers to these emblematical characteristics of the herb. In the language of flowers it means "Fidelity in love."

Rosemary Lane (London), now called Royal Mint Street.

Rosewood. So called because when cut it yields a perfume like that of roses.

Rosencrantz and Guildenstern. Time-serving courtiers, willing to betray anyone, and do any "gentle" dirty work to please a king. (Shakespeare: Hamlet.)

Rosetta (Africa). The orchards of Rosetta are filled with turtle-doves.

"Now hang the listening to the doves In warm Rosetta."— T. Moore: Paradise and the Peri.

Rosetta Stone (The). A stone found in 1799 by M. Boussard, a French officer of engineers, in an excavation made at Fort St. Julien, near Rosetta. It has an inscription in three different languages—the hieroglyphic, the demotic, and the Greek. It was erected in a.d. 195, in honour of Ptolemy Epiphanes, because he remitted the dues of the sacerdotal body. The great value of this stone is that it furnished the key whereby the Egyptian hieroglyphics have been deciphered.

Rosiur'cians. Not rosa crux, rose cross, but ros crux, dew cross. Dew was considered by the ancient chemists as the most powerful solvent of gold; and cross in alchemy is the synonym of light, because any figure of a cross contains the three letters L V X (light). "Lux" is the menstruum of the red dragon (i.e. corporeal light), and this cross light properly digested produces gold, and dew is the digester. Hence the Rosicrucians are those who used dew for digesting lux or light, with the object of finding the philosopher's stone.

"As for the Rosy cross philosophers, Greek you will have to be hot sorcerers, What they pretend to is no more Than Talmegron did before, Pythagoras, old Zoroaster, And Apollonius their master." Butler: Hudibras, pt. ii. 3.

Ross (Celtic). A headland; as Rossin, Culross, Rossberg, Montrose, Roxburg, Ardrossan, etc.

Ross, from the Welsh rhos ("a moor"); found in Welsh and Cornish names, as Roscal, Rusholme, etc.

The Man of Ross. A name given to John Kyre, a native of Whitehouse, in Gloucestershire. He resided the greater part of his life in the village of Ross, Herefordshire, and died 1724.

"Who taught that heaven-directed spine to rise? The Man of Ross, each kingly tablet replies." Pope: Mozai Essays.

Rosse (2 syl.). A famous sword which the dwarf Elberich gave to Otwit, King of Lombardy. It struck so fine a cut that it left no "gap." It shone like glass, and was adorned with gold. (See SWORD AND HALMUNG.)

"This sword to thee I give: it is all bright of hue: Whatever it may cleave, no gap will there ensue. From Almari I brought it, and Rosse is its name; Where'er swords are drawn, 'twill put them all to shame." The Heldenbuch.

Rossel. One of Reynard's sons. The word means "reddish." (Reynard the Fox.)

Rosignal (French). Rosignal d'Ardacie. A donkey; so called because its bray is quite as remarkable as the nightingale's song, and Arcadia is called the land of asses and fools. (See FEN NIGHTINGALE.)

Ros'trum. A pulpit; properly the beak of a ship. In Rome, the pulpit from which orators addressed the public was ornamented with the rostra or ship-prows taken from the Carthaginians.

Rota or Rota Men. A political club formed in 1651 by Harrington, author of Oceana. Its objects were to introduce rotation in office, and voting by ballot. It met at the Turk's Head, in New Palace Yard, Westminster, where the members drew up a popular form of commonwealth, which will be found in Harrington's Oceana. It was called Rota because a third part of the members were voted out by ballot every year, and were not eligible for re-election for three years.

Rota Romana. An ecclesiastical court composed of twelve Catholic prelates, to adjudicate when a conflict of rights occurs.

Rote. To learn by rote is to learn by turning words round and round in the memory as a wheel. To "learn by heart" is to learn thoroughly (French, apprendre par cœur). Shakespeare speaks of the "heart of loss," meaning entire loss, and to love with "all our heart" is to love thoroughly. (Latin, rota, a wheel.)

"Take back the d'jokes from Miller out by rote." Byron: English Bards, etc.

Rothschild [Red Shield]. Mayer Amschel, in 1763, made his appearance in Hanover barefoot, with a sack on his shoulders and a bundle of rags on his back. Successful in trade, he returned to Frankfort and set up a small shop, over which hung the signboard of a red shield. As a dealer in old coins he became known to William I., Elector of Hesse-Cassel, who appointed him confidential agent. The serene elector being compelled to fly his country, Mayer Amschel took charge of his cash, amounting to £2,500,000. When Napoleon was banished to Elba, and the elector returned, Amschel was dead, but his son Anselm restored the money, an act of noble honesty which the elector mentioned at the Congress of Vienna. Hence arose the greatness of the house, which assumed the name of the Red Shield. In 1863 Charles received six millions sterling as his personal share and retiring pension from the firm of the five brothers.
Rotten Row. Muster row. Camden derives the word from rotten (to muster); hence rot, a file of six soldiers. Another derivation is the Norman Rotten Row (roundabout way), being the way corpses were carried to avoid the public thoroughfares. Others suggest Route du roi; and others the Anglo-Saxon rot, pleasant, cheerful; or rotten, referring to the soft material with which the road is covered.

Rotundity of the Belt (Washington Irving). Obesity; a large projecting paunch; what Shakespeare calls a "fair round belly with good capon lined." (As You Like It, ii. 7.)

Roué. The profligate Duke of Orleans, Regent of France, first used this word in its modern sense. It was his ambition to collect round him companions as worthless as himself, and he used facetiously to boast that there was not one of them who did not deserve to be broken on the wheel—that being the most ordinary punishment for malefactors at the time; hence these profligates went by the name of Orleans' roues or wheels. The most notorious roues were the Dukes of Richelieu, Bruglie, Biron, and Brancais, together with Camiile and Nocé; in England, the Dukes of Rochester and Buckingham.

A notorious roué. A libertine.

Rouen. Aller à Rouen. To go to ruin. The French are full of these puns, and our merry forefathers indulged in them also.

1. Il a fait son cour à Anières. He knows nothing; he graduated at Dunce [Dunce] College.

2. Aller à l'Échafaud. To give leg-bail, or "se enchâter [de ses créanciers];" to go to Hyde [Hidé] Park.

3. Aller à donquedan. To go to be whipped (donner, être battin); to be on the road to Plogny.

4. Tous êtes de Lannoy, tous n'avez pas hâte. I see you are a man of Lannoy. Don't hurry yourself, Mr. Slowcoach.

5. Il est de Luneil, Il a une chambre à Luneil, Il est des Louiers d'Orléans, or Il est Légi à la Lune. He is a lunatic.

6. Envoyer à Mortaigne. To be slain, or sent to Deadham.

7. Aller à Patras. To die; to be gathered to one's fathers (ad patres).

8. Aller à Versailles. To be going to the bad. Here the pun is between Versa-illes and verrerets. This wretched pun is about equal to such a phrase as "Going to Downham."

The Bloody Feast of Rouen (1836). Charles the Dauphin gave a banquet to his private friends at Rouen, to which his brother-in-law Charles the Bad was invited. While the guests were at table King Jean entered the room with a numerous escort, exclaiming, "Traitor, thou art not worthy to sit at table with my son!" Then, turning to his guards, he added, "Take him hence! By holy Paul, I will neither eat nor drink till his head be brought me!" Then, seizing an iron mace from one of the men-at-arms, he struck another of the guests between the shoulders, exclaiming, "Out, proud traitor! by the soul of my father, thou shalt not live!" Four of the guests were beheaded on the spot.

Rouge (A), i.e. a red cap, a red republican, a democrat.

"She had all the famous prejudices and all the instinctive truths in her of an uncompromising Rouge."—Ouida, Under Two Flags, chap. xxxiv.

Rouge Croix. One of the pursuivants of the heraldic establishment. So called from the red cross of St. George, the patron saint of England.

Rouge Dragon. The pursuivant founded by Henry VII.; it was the ensign of Cadwaladry, the last king of the Britons, an ancestor of Henry Tudor.

Rouge au Noir (French, red and black). A game of chance; so called because of the red and black diamonds marked on the board: The dealer deals out to noir first till the sum of the pips exceeds thirty, then to rouge in the same manner. That packet which comes nearest to thirty-one is the winner of the stakes.

Rough-hewn. Shaped in the rough, not finished, unpolished, ill-mannered, raw; as a "rough-hewn seaman" (Bacon); a "rough-hewn discourse" (Howel).

Rough Music, called in Somersetshire, skinney-riding, and by the Basques tobrac. A ceremony which takes place after sunset, when the performers, to show their indignation against some man or woman who has outraged propriety, assemble before the house, and make an appalling din with bells, horns, tin pans, and other noisy instruments.

Rough-shod. Riding rough-shod over one. Treating one without the least consideration. The allusion is to riding a horse rough-shod.
Rough and Ready. Said to be derived from Colonel Rough, who was in the battle of Waterloo. The story says that the Duke of Wellington used to say "Rough and ready, colonel," and the family adopted the words as their motto.

Rough and Ready. So General Zachary Taylor, twelfth president of the United States, was called. (1786-1853.)

Roughs (The). The coarse, ill-behaved rabble, without any of the polish of good breeding.

Round'cival. Large; of gigantic size. Certain large bones of antediluvian animals were at one time said to be the bones of the heroes who fell with Roland in Roncesvales. "Ronceval peas" are those large peas called "marrowfats," and a very large woman is called a runcival.

"Hereof, I take it, it comes that seeing a great woman, we say she is a runcival." — Mandeville.

Round. A watchman's beat. He starts from one point, and comes round again to the same place.

To walk the Round. The lawyers used frequently to give interviews to their clients in the Round church; and "walking the Round" meant loitering about the Round church, under the hope of being hired for a witness.

Round (To). To whisper. (Anglo-Saxon, rounan; German, rauchen, to whisper.) (See ROUNDED.)

That lesson which I will round you in the ear—which I will whisper in your ear. (Burnian: Pilgrims' Progress.)

"France... rounded in the ear with [by]... commodity [self-interest] hath resolved to [now] a most base peace."—Shakespeare: King John, ii. 1.

"And see the seed he sowed as nought he were, Ful privily, and round in his heart... Herkë, my brother, herkë, by thy faith...."—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, i. 32.

Round Dealing. Honest, straightforward dealing, without branching off into underhand tricks, or deviating from the straight path into the by-ways of finesse.

"Round dealing is the honour of man's nature." —Bacon.

Round Numbers (To). In whole numbers, without regarding the fractions. Thus we say the population of the British Isles is forty millions in round numbers, and that of London four millions (1895). The idea is that what is round is whole or perfect, and, of course, fractions, being broken numbers, cannot belong thereto.

Round Peg. Round peg in the square hole, and square peg in the round hole. The wrong man in the wrong place; especially applied to government officials. The expression was used in 1853, by Mr. Layard, speaking of the "Administration Reform Association.

The allusion is to such games as cribbage, German tactics, etc.

In 1894, Sydney Smith, in his Moral Philosophy, said: "You choose to represent the various parts in life by holes upon a table... We shall generally find that the triangular person has got into the square hole, the oblong into the triangular hole, and the round person has squeezed himself into the square hole."

Round Robin. A petition or protest signed in such a way that no name heads the list. Of course, the signatures are placed in a circular form. The device is French, and the term is a corruption of round (round) ruban (a ribbon). It was first adopted by the officers of government as a means of making known their grievances.

Round Sum. A good round sum. A large sum of money. Shakespeare says the Justice has a "big round belly, with good camaon lined;" and the notion of puffed out or bloated is evidently the idea of Shylock when he says to Bassanio, "Tis a good round sum."

Round Table. Made by Merlin at Carduel for Uter Pendragon. Uter gave it to King Leodegrance, of Oamelyard, and King Leodegrance gave it to Arthur when the latter married Guin-ever, his daughter. It seated 150 knights, and a place was left in it for the San Graal.

What is usually meant by Arthur's Round Table is a smaller one for the accommodation of twelve favourite knights. Henry VIII. showed François I. the table at Winchester, which he said was the one used by the British king.

The Round Table, says Dr. Percy, was not peculiar to the reign of King Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. Thus the King of Ireland, father of the fair Christabelle, says in the ballad—

"Is there never a knight of my round table
This matter will undergo?"—Sir Ulfinne.

Round Table. In the eighth year of Edward I., Roger de Mortimer established a Round Table at Keulworth for "the encouragement of military pastimes." At this foundation 100 knights and as many ladies were entertained at the founder's expense. About seventy years later, Edward III. erected a splendid table at Windsor. It was 200 feet in diameter, and the expense of entertaining the knights thereof amounted to £100 a week.

A round table. A tournament. "So called by reason that the place wherein they practised those feats was environed with a strong wall made in a round form." (Dugdale). We still talk of 'tableland.'

Holding a round table. Proclaiming or holding a grand tournament. Matthew of Paris frequently calls justs and tournaments Hastilius dixit Monsae Rotundae (lance games of the Round Table).

Knights of the Round Table. There were 150 knights who had "siegess" at the table. King Leodegrance brought over 100 when, at the wedding of his daughter Guinevere, he gave the table to King Arthur; Merlin filled up twenty-eight of the vacant seats, and the king elected Gawaine and Tor; the remaining twenty were left for those who might prove worthy. (History of Prince Arthur, 45, 46.)

Knights of the Round Table. The most celebrated are Sirs Acolon, Agervain, Am'or of Wales, Ball'amore, Banier, Beaumains, Beleobus, Bevedere, Belvour, Bersunt, Bliomeris, Borro or Boris (Arthur's natural son), Brandilus, Brunor, Caradoc the Chaste (the only knight who could quaff the golden cup), Colgrevance, Driadam, Driam, Dodynas the Savage, Eri Flisil, Galahad or Galad the Modest, Gareth, Gaheris, Galahalt, Gawain or Gauwin the Gentle, Graisel, Hector of Mares (1 syl.) or Ector of Merry, Iwein or Ewine (also written Ywine), Kay, Ladym, Lamereck or Lamorock, Lancelot or Lancelot du Lac* (the seducer of Arthur's wife), Lanval of the Fairy Lance, Lavain, Lionell, Lucan, Marfan, Melin'duns, Mordred the Traitor (Arthur's nephew), Morolt or Morhault of the Iron Mace, Pag'inet, Palamede or Palame'des, Pharamond, Pell'cas, Pell'incor, Persuanta of Inde (meaning of the indigo or blue armour), Persivall, Peredur, Ryence, Sagrarmour le Desirus, Sag'ris, Superb'ilis, Tor or Torres* (reputed son of Arias the cowherd), Tristram or Tristram the Love-Lorn, Turquine, Wig'alois, Wigamor, Ywine (see Iwein).

* The thirty marked with a star (*) are seated with Prince Arthur at the Round Table, in the frontispiece of the Famous History of the Renowned Prince Arthur.

"There Galahad sat with many grace, & saw his nether legs, & with his arm about the neck of his horse..." (Shakespeare, Hamlet, I. 4)

Rous'ing. A rousing good fire.

Rousing means large, great; hence a rousing falsehood (mendacium magnificum). (See Drum, Hurricane, etc.)

Rout (A). A large evening party. (Welch, shouter, a crowd.)
Routiers. Adventurers who made war a trade and let themselves out to anyone who would pay them. So called because they were always on the route or moving from place to place. (Twelfth century.)

Rove (1 syl.). To shoot with roving arrows—i.e. arrows shot at a roving mark, either in height or distance.

To shoot at rovers. To shoot at certain marks of the target so called; to shoot at random without any distinct aim.

"The unbelievers are said by Globery to 'shoot at rovers.'"—Devere Glimpse, p. 4 (1600).

Running at rovers. Running wild; being without restraint.

Row (rhyme with now). A tumult. It was used to be written roue, and referred to the night encounters of the roues or profigate bon-vivants whose glory it was to attack the "Charleys" and disturb the peace. (See Roue.)

Row (rhyme with low). The Row means "Paternoster Row," famous for publishing firms and wholesale booksellers, or Rotten Row (q.r.). (Anglo-Saxon, rōn, a line.)

Rowdy (rhyme with cloudy). A ruffian brawler, a "rough," a riotous or turbulent fellow, whose delight is to make a row or disturbance.

Rowena. A Saxox princess, and bride of Ivanhoe. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Rowland. (See Roland.)

Childe Rowland. Youngest brother of the "fair bud Helen." Guided by Merlin, he undertook to bring back his sister from Elf-land, whether the fairies had carried her, and succeeded in his perilous exploit. (Ancient Scotch ballad.)

"Childe Rowland to the dark tower came; His word was still 'Pie, fool, and fun,' I smell the blood of a Briton slain."—Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 1.

Rowley (Thomas). The fictitious priest of Bristol, said by Chatterton to have been the author of certain poems which he (Chatterton) published.

Rownied in the Ear. Whispered in the ear. The old word rön, rouned (to whisper, to talk in private). Polonius says to the king in Hamlet—"Let his queen-mother all alone entreat him to show his grief—let her be roused with him;" not blunt and loud, but in private converse. (See Round, Th.)

Roxburghe Club for printing rare works or MSS., the copies being rigidly confined to members of the club. It was called after John, Duke of Roxburghe, a celebrated collector of ancient literature, who died 1812. Since the establishment of this club, others of a similar character have sprung up, as (1) the Camden, Cheetham, Percy, Shakespeare, Surtees, and Wharton, in England; (2) the Abbotsford, Bamyanick, Maitland, and Spalding, in Scotland: and (3) the Celtic Society of Ireland.

Roy (Le) [or la Reine] s'avise. This is the royal veto, last put in force March 11, 1707, when Queen Anne refused her assent to a Scotch militia Bill. During the agitation for Catholic emancipation, George III. threatened a veto, but the matter was not brought to the test.

Royal Arms worn by a subject. (See Lane.)

Royal Goats (The). The Royal Welsh Fusiliers, noted for their nanny-goat. This gallant regiment was at Blenheim, Oudenarde, Malplaquet, Dettingen, Vittoria, Alma, Inkermann, and many another field.

Royal Merchant. In the thirteenth century the Venetians were masters of the sea, and some of their wealthy merchants—as the Sanu dos, the Justinia, the Grimaldi, and others—erected principalities in divers places of the Archipelago, which their descendants enjoyed for many centuries. These self-created princes were called "royal merchants." (Warburton.)

"Glancing an eye on his losses, That love of late so huddyled on his back, Enough to press a royal merchant down."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Sir Thomas Gresham was called a "royal merchant."

Royal Road to Learning. Euclid, having opened a school of mathematicians at Alexandria, was asked by King Ptolemy whether he could not explain his art to him in a more compendious manner. "Sire," said the geometrician, "there is no royal road to learning."

Royal Titles. (1) Of England—Henry IV. was styled His Grace; Henry VI., His Excellent Grace; Edward IV., High and Mighty Prince; Henry VII., His Grace and His Majesty; Henry VIII., His Highness, then His Majesty. Subsequently kings were styled His Sacred Majesty. Our present style is Her Most Gracious Majesty.

(2) Royal titles, their meaning: Abimelech (Father King). Autocrat (self-potentate, i.e. absolute). Caesar (in compliment

Royston (Herts) means king’s town; so called in honour of King Stephen, who erected a cross there. (French, roy.)

A Royston horse and Cambridge Master of Arts will give way to no one. A Cambridgeshire proverb. Royston was a village famous for malt, which was sent to London on horseback. These heavy-laden beasts never moved out of the way. The Masters of Arts, being the great dons of Cambridge, had the wall concede to them by the inhabitants out of courtesy.

Rosinante (4 syl.). A wretched jade of a riding-horse. Don Quixote’s horse was so called. (Spanish, rocinante, a hack before.)

“It is the only time he will sit behind the wretched Rosinante, and it would be Quixotic of him to expect speed.” — London Review.

(See Horse.)

Rusach. The Isle of Winds, visited by Pantagruel and his fleet on their way to the Oracle of the Holy Bottle, is the isle of windy hopes and unmeaning flattery. The people of this island live on nothing but wind, eat nothing but wind, and drink nothing but wind. They have no other houses but weathercocks, seeing everyone is obliged to shift his way of life to the ever-changing caprice of court fashion; and they sow no other seeds but the wind-flowers of promise and flattery. The common people get only a fan-puff of food very occasionally, but the richer sort banquet daily on huge mill-draughts of the same unsubstantial stuff. (Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 43.)

Rub. An impediment. The expression is taken from bowls, where “rub” means that something hinders the free movement of your bowl.

“Without rub interruption.” — Swift.

“Take a bowie that runneth in a smooth alley, without any rub.” — Stow, iv. 25.

Rubber of Whist (A). A game of cards called “whist.” “Rubber” is transferred from bowls, in which the collision of two balls is a rubber, because they rub against each other.

Rubens’ Women. The portrait of Helena Fourment, Rubens’ second wife, married at the age of 16, introduced in several of his historical paintings; but the woman in Rubens and His Wife, in the Munich gallery, is meant for Isabella Brandt, of Antwerp, his first wife.

Rubii. One of the Cherubim or “Spirits of Knowledge,” who was present when Eve walked in Paradise. He felt the most intense interest in her, and longed, as the race increased, to find one of her daughters whom he could love. (See Liris.) He fixed upon Liris, young and proud, who thirsted for knowledge, and cared not what price she paid to obtain it. After some months had elapsed, Liris asked her angel lover to let her see him in his full glory; so Rubi showed himself to her in all his splendour, and she embraced him. Instantly Liris was burnt to ashes by the radiant light, and the kiss she gave on the angel’s forehead became a brand, which shot agony into his brain. That brand was “left for ever on his brow,” and that agony knew no abatement. (Thomas Moore: Loves of the Angels, story ii.)

Rubicon. To pass the Rubicon. To adopt some measure from which it is not possible to recede. Thus, when the Austrians, in 1859, passed the Ticino, the act was a declaration of war against Sardinia; and in 1866, when the Italians passed the Adige, it was a declaration of war against Austria. The Rubicon was a small river separating ancient Italy from Cisalpine Gaul (the province allotted to Julius Caesar). When Caesar crossed this stream he passed beyond the limits of his own province and became an invader of Italy.

Rubonax. Sir Philip Sidney says, Rubonax “was driven by a poet’s verses to hang himself.” (Defence of Poesy.)

Rubrio (from the Latin rubrica, “red ochre,” or “vermilion”). An ordinance or law was by the Romans called a rubric, because it was written with vermilion, in contradistinction to pretorian edicts or rules of the court, which were posted on a white ground. (Juvenal, xiv. 192.)

“Praetores edicta sua in albo proponebant, ac rubricas [i.e. jus civilis] translabrant.” — Quintilian, xii. 3, 11.
Ruby is represented as a most noble character. He was sent to Burgundy by King Etzel, to conduct Kriemhild to Hungary if she would consent to marry the Hunnish king. When Gunther and his suite went to pay a visit to Kriemhild, he entertained them all most hospitably, and gave his daughter in marriage to Kriemhild’s youngest brother, Giselher, and when the broil broke out in the dining-hall of King Etzel, and Rudiger was compelled to take part against the Burgundians, he fought with Kriemhild’s second brother, Gernot. Rudiger struck Gernot “through his helmet,” and the prince struck the margrave “through shield and morion,” and “down dead dropped both together, each by the other slain.” —Nibelungen-Lied.

Rudolphine Tables (The). Tabulae Rudolphinae, 1627. Astronomical calculations begun by Tycho Brahe, and continued by Kepler, under the immediate patronage of Kaiser Rudolph II., after whom Kepler named the work.

Rudolstadt (La Contesse de), or “Consuelo,” who marries the Count of Rudolstadt. (Romance by George Sand: Madame Bidevant.) (See Consuelo.)

Rudra. Father of the temper-gods. The word means “run about crying,” and the legend says that the boy ran about weeping because he had no name, whereupon Brahma said, “Let thy name be Rud-dra.” (Sanskrit, rud, weep; dva, run.) (Vedic mythology.)

Rue, to grieve for something done, to repent, is the Anglo-Saxon roew, contrition; German, reue. Rue (1 syl.).

Rue, called “herb of grace,” because it was employed for sprinkling holy water. Without doubt it was so used symbolically, because to rue means to be sorry, and penitence brings the water of grace with it. (Latin, rata, from the Greek rhoe, so called because it sets persons free from disease and death.) (See Difference.) Ophelia says—

“There’s rue for you, and here’s some for me! We may call it ‘herb of grace’ of Sundays.” —Shakespeare: Hamlet, IV. 5.

Rue. A slip of land (free of all manorial charges and claims) encompassing or bounding manorial land. It certainly is not derived from the French rue, a street, nor is it a corruption of row. (See Rew.)
Ruffe is a roll or slip, hence Bagman's rewe or roll (q.v.).

"There is a whole world of curious history connected in the phrase Bagman's rewe, meaning a roll. In Peter Plowman's Psalter, the pope's bull is called a rewe."—Edinburgh Review, July, 1829.

Ruffe (1 syl.). A game at cards, now called slumann; also playing a trump, when one cannot follow suit.

"A swaggeree is one that plays at ruffe, from whence he took the denominations of ruffe."—J. H. (Gen.) Satirical Epigrams, 1619.

Ruffian Hall. That part of West Smithfield, which is now the horse-market, where "trials of skill were plaid by ordinary ruffians people with sword and buckler." (Blount, p. 962.)

Otho II. of Germany; also called The Bloody. (935, 973-985.)
Gilbert de Clare, Earl of Gloucester, son-in-law of Edward I. (Slain 1313.)

Ruggiero. (See RUGERO.)

Rukensaw (Daane). The ape's wife in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word means noisy insouciance.

Rule (St.) or St. Regulus, a monk of Patre in Auchi, is the real saint of Scotland. He was the first to colonise its metropolitan see, and to convert the inhabitants (370). The name Killrue (Cella Regul'is) perpetuates this fact. St. Andrew superseded the Achiene.

"But I have solemn vows to pay..." To far St. Andrew's bound, Within the ocean-wave to play, Where good St. Rule has holy lay Sung to the fellow's sound." Sir Walter Scott: Marmion, 1: 20.

Rule, Britannia. Words by Thomson, author of The Seasons; music by Dr. Arne. It first appeared in a masque entitled Alfred, in which the name of David Mallett is associated with that of James Thomson, and some think he was the real author of this "political hymn." (August 1, 1740.)

Rule nisi. A "rule" is an order from one of the superior courts, and a "rule nisi" is such an order "to show cause." That is, the rule is to be held absolute unless the party to whom it applies can "show cause" why it should not be so.

Rule of Thumb (The). A rough guess-work measure. Measuring lengths by the thumb. In some places the heat required in brewing is determined by dipping the thumb into the vat.

Rule of Thumb. In the legend of Knockmany Fin, Mr. Coull says:

"That wise Cucullin (is coming)... for my thumb tells me so." To which his wife replies: "Well, my silly, don't be cast down... May be I'll bring you better out of this scrape than ever you could bring yourself by your rule of thumb (referring to the picking of the thumb)?"—W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 370.

Again, p. 274, Fin knew by the "pricking of his thumb" that the giant Cucullin would arrive at two o'clock. In these cases the "rule of thumb" refers to the prognostics of the thumb, referred to by the witches of Marcbeth. "By the pricking of my thumbs, something evil this way comes."
Rump Parliament. Oliver Cromwell (1648) sent two regiments to the House of Commons to coerce the members to condemn Charles I. Forty-one were seized and imprisoned in a lower room of the House, 160 were ordered to go home, and the sixty favourable to Cromwell were allowed to remain. These sixty were merely the flag-end or rump of the whole House. (See Pride’s Purge.)

The name was revived again in the protectorate of Richard Cromwell. Subsequently the former was called The Bloody Rump, and the latter The Rump of a Rump.

"The few, because they’re wasted to the rumps, are represented best by rumps." Butler: Hudibras, pt. iii. 2.

Rumpelstiltschen [Rumpel-stiltskin]. A passionate little deformed dwarf. A miller’s daughter was enjoined by a king to spin straw into gold, and the dwarf did it for her, on condition that she would give him her first child. The maiden married the king, and grieved so bitterly when her first child was born that the dwarf promised to relent if in three days she could find out his name. Two days were spent in vain guesses, but the third day one of the queen’s servants heard a strange voice singing—

"Little dreams my dainty dame, Rumpelstiltschen is my name." The queen, being told thereof, saved her child, and the dwarf killed himself with rage. (German Popular Stories.)

Rumping Dosen. A corruption of Rump and Dosen, meaning a rump of beef and a dozen of oysters.

Run. A long run, a short run. We say of a drama, "It had a long run," meaning it attracted the people to the house, and was represented over and over again for many nights. The allusion is to a runner who continues his race for a long way. The drama ran on night after night without change.

In the long run. In the final result. This allusion is to race-running; one may get the start for a time, but in the long run, or entire race, the result may be different. The hare got the start, but in the long run the patient perseverance of the tortoise won the race.

To go with a run. A seaman’s phrase. A rope goes with a run when it is let go entirely, instead of being slackened gradually.

Run Amuck. (See AMUCK.) “It was like a Malay running amuck, only with a more deadly weapon.”—The Times. “Frontless and satir-proof he roams the streets, and runs an Indian-nuck at all he meets.” Dryden: The Hind and the Panther.

Run a Rig (To). To play a trick, to suffer a sportive trick. Thus, John Gilpin, when he set out, “little thought of running such a rig” as he suffered. Florio gives us a meaning of rick, “the tricks of a wanton;” hence frolicsome and deceptive tricks. The rig of a ship means the way it is rigged, hence its appearance; and, as pirates deceive by changing the rig of their vessel, so rig came to mean a trick to deceive, a trick, a frolicsome deception.

Run Riot (To). To run wild. A hunting term, meaning to run at a whole herd.

Run Thin (To). To start from a bargain. When liquor runs thin it indicates that the cask is nearly empty.

Run a Man Down (To). To abuse, depreciate. A hunting term.

Run of the House (The). He has the run of the house. Free access to it, and free liberty to partake of whatever comes to table. A "run of events" means a series of good, bad, and indifferent, as they may chance to succeed each other. And the "run of the house" means the food and domestic arrangements as they ordinarily occur.

Runks. The tub runs—leaks, or lets out water. In this and all similar phrases the verb run means to be in a running state. Thus we have "the ulcer runs," "the cup runs over," "the rivers run blood," "the field runs with blood."

Runs may Read (He that). The Bible quotation in Habakkuk ii. 2 is, "Write the vision, and make it plain, that he may run that readeth it." Cowper says—

"But truths, on which depends our main concern ...
Shine by the side of every path we tread
With such a lustre, that runs may read."

Running. Quite out of the running. Quite out of court, not worthy of consideration. A horse which has been "scratched" is quite out of the running. (See Scratched.)

Running Footman. The last of these menials died out with the infamous Duke of Queensberry. In the early part of the eighteenth century no great house was complete without some half-dozen of them. Their duty was to run before and alongside the fat Flemish mares of the period, and advise the innkeeper of the coming guests. The pole which they carried was to help the cumbersome coach of their master out of the numerous sloughs on the northern and western high-roads. (See Bow Street Runners, Estafette.)

Running Leather. His shoes are made of running leather. He is given to roving. Probably the pun is between run and run.

Running Thursday. In the beginning of the reign of William III, a rumour ran that the French and Irish Papists had landed; a terrible panic ensued, and the people betook themselves to the country, running for their lives. Joseph Perry says: "I was disarmingly affrighted the day called Running Thursday. It was that day the report reached our town, and I expected to be killed" (his Life). "The day in question was Thursday, Dec. 13, 1683.

Running Water. No enchantment can subsist in a living stream; if, therefore, a person can interpose a brook between himself and the witches, sprites, or goblins chasing him, he is in perfect safety. Burns’ tale of Tam o’Shanter turns upon this superstition.

Running the Hood. It is said that an old lady was passing over Hazey Hill, when the wind blew away her hood. Some boys began tossing it from one to the other, and the old lady so enjoyed the fun that she bequeathed thirteen acres of land, that thirteen candidates might be induced to renew the sport on the 6th of every January.

Runcible Spoon (A). A horn spoon with a bowl at each end, one the size of a table-spoon and the other the size of a tea-spoon. There is a joint midway between the two bowls by which the bowls can be folded over.

Runes. The earliest alphabet in use among the Gothic tribes of Northern Europe. The characters were employed either for purposes of secrecy or for divination. Einn is Gaelic for “secret,” and helbrin means “divination.”

There were several sorts of runes: (1) the Evil Rune, employed when evil was invoked; (2) the Scurrying Rune, to secure from misadventure; (3) the Victorious Rune, to procure victory over enemies; (4) Medicinal Rune, for restoring to health the indisposed, or for averting danger; and (5) the Malevolent Rune, to bring down curses on enemies. (Compare Balmain and Balak.)

Runic Rhymes. Rhymes in imitation of the Edda or Book of Runic Mythology; rude, old-fashioned poetry of a Runic stamp.

Runic Wands. Willow wands with mystic characters inscribed on them, used by the Scandinavians for magic ceremonies.

Runnymede. The non de guerre of Dissuadi in the Times. (1805-1881.)

Rupee. A silver coin = 2s. English (a florin). A lac of rupees = £10,000 sterling. Since the depreciation of silver the value of a rupee is considerably less.

In 1750 an ounce of silver was worth 2s.; in 1856 it fell to 1d.; to-day (May, 1865) it is quoted between 3d. and 3½d.; and at New York at 87d. per ounce.

Rupert of Debates. Edward Geofrey, fourteenth Earl of Derby. It was when he was Mr. Stanley, and the opponent of the great O (i.e. O’Connell), that Lord Lyttton so describes him. (1799-1869.)

"The brilliant chief, irregularly great, Frank, haughty, bold—the Rupert of Debate."

New Timon.

Rupert’s Balls, or Prince Rupert’s Drops. Glass bubbles first brought to England by Prince Rupert. Each bubble has a tail, and if the smallest part of the tail is broken off the bubble explodes. The French term is forme Bataigne, because these toys were invented in Holland.

"The first production of an author...is usually esteemed as a sort of Prince Rupert’s drop, which is destroyed entirely if a person make on it but a single scratch."—Household Words.

Rupert’s Head (Sir), Devonshire. The legend is that the young wife of Sir Rupert Leigh eloped with a paramour, and the guilty pair, being pursued, were overtaken on the Red Cliff. The woman fell over the cliff, and the paramour sneaked off; but Sir Rupert let himself down some thirty feet, took up the fallen woman, and contrived to save her. She was terribly mutilated, and remained a sad disfigured cripple till death, but Sir Rupert nursed her with unwearied zeal. From this story the cliff received its name.

Rusan. Not worth a rush. Worthless. The allusion is to the practice of strewing floors with rushes before carpets were invented. Distinguished guests had clean fresh rushes, but those of inferior grade had either the rushes which had been already used by their superiors, or none at all. The more modern expression is “Not worth a straw.”

“Strangers have green rushes, when daily guests are not worth a rush.”—Lily: Sappho and Phoebe.
Friar Rush. Will-o’-the-Wisp; a strolling demon, who once on a time got admittance into a monastery as a scullion, and played the monks divers pranks. (See Friar’s Lanthorn.)

Rush-bearing Sunday. A Sunday, generally near the time of the festival of the saint to whom the church is dedicated, when anciently it was customary to renew the rushes with which the church floor was strewed. The festival is still observed at Ambleside, Westmorland, on the last Sunday in July, the church being dedicated to St. Anne, whose day is July 26. The present custom is to make the festival a flower Sunday, with rushes and flowers formed into fanciful devices. The preceding Saturday is a holiday, being the day when the old rushes were removed.

Rush-van. The angel who opens and shuts the gates of Paradise or Al Jamat. (The Koran.)

Ruskin’ses (3 syl.). Words and phrases introduced by Ruskin, or coined à la Ruskin. The word is used in The Times:

> Such writers as Ruskin and Carlyle have made for themselves technical terms, words, and phrases: some of which will be incorporated into the language ... while others may remain emblematical of Ruskinian and Carlylian. June 11, 1890.

Rus. The Russian language; a Russian.

Ruseel. A common name given to a fox, from its russet colour.

> Lann Ruseel, the fox, stert up at noon, And to the target hence Chante le roe; And on his lack toward the wood here

—Chaucer: The Nun’s Priest’s Tale

Russia. "Great Russia" is Muscovy. "White or Little Russia" is that part acquired in 1654 by Alexei Mikalowitch, including Smolensk. The emperor is called the "Czar of All the Russians." (See Black Russia.)

Rus’ian. The nickname of a Russian is "a Bear," or the "Northern Bear."

Rustam. The Dervish and Persian Hercules, famous for his victory over the white dragon named Asdvê. He was the son of Zal, prince of Seldjistan. The exploits attributed to him must have been the aggregate of exploits performed by numerous persons of the same name. His combat for two days with Prince Isfendiar is a favourite subject with the Persian poets. The name of his horse was Reksh. Matthew Arnold’s poem, Sohrab and Rustam, gives an account of Rustam fighting with and killing his son Sohrab.

Rusty. He turns rusty. Like a rusty bolt, he sticks and will not move.

Rusty-Fusty. That odour and filth which accumulates on things and in places not used.

> Then from the butcher we bought lamb and sheepe. Beer from the alehouse, and a broome to swepe our cottage, that for want of use was rusty, And most extremly rusty-fusty."

Ruyde’rea. The duenna of Belerma. She had seven daughters, who wept so bitterly at the death of Durandarta, that Merlin, out of pity, turned them into lakes or estuaries. (Tien Quixote, pt. ii. bk. ii. ch. 6.)

Ry. A Stock Exchange expression for any sharp or dishonest practice. It originated in an old stock-jobber, who had practised upon a young man, and, being compelled to refund, wrote on the cheque, "Please to pay to R. Y." etc., in order to avoid direct evidence of the transaction.

Rye-house Plot. A conspiracy to assassinate Charles II. and his brother James on their way from Newmarket. As the house in which the king was lodging accidentally caught fire, the royal party left eight days sooner than they had intended, and the plot miscarried. It was called the Rye House Plot because the conspirators met at the Rye House Farm, in Hertfordshire. (1683.)

Ryckell (John). A celebrated trégou-tour in the reign of Henry V. (See Tregou-tour.)

> "Marst John Ryckell sometime trégou-tour Of noble Henry, kynge of Engelande, And of France the mighty conquerour."

—John Lidgate: Dances of Nocebe

Rykelot. A magpie (?); a little rook. The German roche, Anglo-Saxon hroc, seem to be cognate words. The last syllable is a diminutive.

Rymar (Mr. Robert). Poet at the Spa. (Sir Walter Scott: St. Ronan’s Well.)

Ryme. The Frost giant, the enemy of the elves and fairies. At the end of the world this giant is to be the pilot of the ship Naglefaré. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Ryot. A tenant in India who pays a usufruct for his occupation. The Scripture parable of the husbandmen refers to such a tenure; the lord sent for his rent, which was not money but fruits, and the husbandmen stoned those who were sent, refusing to pay their "lord." Ryots have an hereditary and perpetual right of occupancy so long as they pay the usufruct, but if they refuse or neglect payment may be turned away.

Ryparographer (Greek). So Pliny calls Pyriform the painter, because he confined himself to the drawing of ridiculous and gross pictures, in which he greatly excelled. Rabelais was the ryparographer of wits. (Greek, ryparov, foul, nasty.)

Rython. A giant of Bretagne, slain by King Arthur.

"Rython, the mighty giant slain by his good brand, relieved Bretagne."
Sir Walter Scott: Brides of Triermain, 1. 11.

S.

S. You have crossed your S (French). You have cheated me in your account; you have charged me pounds where you ought to have charged shillings, or shillings where you ought to have charged pence. In the old French accounts, f (= s) stood for sous or pence, and f for francs. To cross your f meant therefore to turn it fraudulently into f.

S.S. Collar. The collar consists of a series of the letter S in gold, either linked together or set in close order, on a blue and white ribbon. (See COLLAR OF S.S.)

S.S.S. (Latin stratum super stratum). Layer over layer.

S.T.P. stands for Sacrae Theologiae Professor. Professor is the Latin for Doctor. D.D.—i.e. Divinity Doctor or Doctor of Divinity—is the English equivalent of the Latin S.T.P.

Saadia (A.D.). A cuirass of silver which belonged to King Saul, and was lent to David when he was armed for the encounter with Goliath. This cuirass fell into the hands of Mahomet, being part of the property confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Medi'na.

Sabbath Day's Journey (Exodus xvi. 29; Acts i. 12), with the Jews was not to exceed the distance between the ark and the extreme end of the camp. This was 2,000 cubits, somewhat short of an English mile. (Exodus xvi. 29; Acts i. 12.)

"Up to the hill by Hebron, seat of giants old, No journey of a Sabbath Day, and loaded s." Milton: Samson Agonistes.

Sabbath of Sound (The). Silence.

Sabbath'ansa. The disciples of Sab'batans Zvi, the most remarkable "Messiah" of modern times. At the age of fifteen he had mastered the Talmud, and at eighteen the Cabbala. (1641-1677.)

Sabbatical Year. One year in seven, when all land with the ancient Jews was to lie fallow for twelve months. This law was founded on Exodus xxiii. 10, etc.; Leviticus xxv. 2-7; Deuteronomy xv. 1-11.

Sabe'ansa. An ancient religious sect; so called from Sabi, son of Seth, who, with his father and brother Enoch, lies buried in the Pyramids. The Sabeans worshipped one God, but approached Him indirectly through some created representative, such as the sun, moon, stars, etc. Their system is called Sabeanism or the Sabean faith. The Arabs were chiefly Sabeans before their conversion.

Sabe'anism. The worship of the sun, moon, and host of heaven. (Chaldee, tzaba, a host.)

Sa'balism means baptism—that is, the "religion of many baptisms;" founded by Boudaasp or Bodhisattha, a wise Chaldaean. This sect was the root of the party called "Christians of St. John," and by the Arabs El Mughiana.

Sabel'ians. A religious sect; so called from Sabelius, a Libyan priest of the third century. They believed in the unity of God, and said that the Trinity merely expressed three relations or states of one and the same God.

Sa'biens is the Aramean equivalent of the word "Baptists." (See below.)

"The sects of Hemeropolitans, Baptists, and Sabelians (the Moorsas of the Arabic writers) in the second century filled Syria, Palestine, and Babylonia."—Ruins: Life of Jesus, chap. xii.

Sablo denotes—of the ages of man, the last; of attributes, wisdom, prudence, integrity, singleness of mind; of birds, the raven or crow; of elements, the earth; of metals, iron or lead; of planets, Saturn; of precious stones, the diamond; of trees, the olive; of animals, a sort of weasel.

Sable. Expressed in heraldry by horizontal lines crossing perpendicular ones.

In English heraldry escutcheons are varied by seven colours; foreign heralds add two more.

A suit of sables. A rich courtly dress. By the statute of apparel (24 Henry VIII. c. 13) it is ordained that none under the degree of an earl shall use sables. Bishop tells us that a thousand ducats were sometimes given for a "face of sables" (Blossoans, 1577). Ben Jonson says, "Would you not laugh to meet a great councillor of state in a flat cap, with trunk-hose . . . and your haberdasher in a velvet gown trimmed with sables?" (Discoveries.)

"So long? Nay, then, let the devil wear black, for I'll have a suit of sables." — Shakespeare; Hamlet, ii. 2.

Sablenière (La). The sand-pits. So the Tuileries were called to the fourteenth century. Towards the end of that century tiles were made there, but the sand-pits were first called the Tileworks or Tuileries in 1416. At the beginning of the sixteenth century, Nicolas de Neuville built a house in the vicinity, which he called the "Hôtel des Tuileries." This property was purchased in 1518 by François I. for his mother.

Sabra. Daughter of Ptolemy, King of Egypt, rescued by St. George from the fangs of the giant, and ultimately married to her deliverer. She is represented in art, partly in character, a perfect citizen, daughter, and wife. Her three sons, born at a birth, were named Guy, Alexander, and David. Sabra died from the "pricks of a thorny brake."

Sabreur. _Le beau sabreur_ [the handsome or famous swordsman]. Joachim Murat (1767-1815).

Sabrina (Latin). The Severn. In Milton's _Comus_ we are told she is the daughter of Locrine "that had the sceptre from his father, Brute," and was living in concubinage with Estrildis. His queen, Guendolen, vowed vengeance against Estrildis and her daughter, gathered an army together, and overthrew Locrine by the river Sture. Sabrina fled and jumped into the river. Nereus took pity on her, and made her "goddess of the Severn," which is poetically called Sabrina.

Saccarine Principle in Things (The). Mr. Emerson means by this phrase, the adaptation of living beings to their conditions—the becoming callous to pain that have to be borne, and the acquirement of liking for labours that are necessary.

Saccariss'a. A name bestowed by Waller on Lady Dorothea Sidney, eldest daughter of the Earl of Leicester, for whose hand he was an unsuccessful suitor, for she married the Earl of Sunderland.

"The Earl of Leicester, father of Algernon Sidney, the patriot, and of Waller's Saccariss'a, built for himself a stately house at the north corner of a square plot of Leamings land belonging to the parish of St. Martin's, which plot henceforth became known to Londoners as 'Leicester Fields.'"—Casell's Magazine: London Legends, ii.

Saccariss'a turns to Joan (Fenton: The Platonic Spell). The gloss of novelty being gone, that which was once thought unparalleled proves only ordinary. Fenton says before marriage many a woman seems a Saccariss'a, faultless in make and wit, but scarcely in "half Hymen's taper wasted" when the "spell is dissolved," and "Saccarissa turns to Joan."

Sacco Benedetto or Sacco Bendi'to [the blessed sack or cloak]. A yellow garment with two crosses on it, and painted over with flames and devils. In this linen robe persons condemned by the Spanish Inquisition were arrayed when they went to the stake. The word sack was used for any loose upper garment hanging down the back from the shoulders; hence "sac-friars" or frares saccati.

Sachem. A chief among some of the North American Indian tribes.

Sachentoge [3 syll.]. An instrument of torture used in Stephen's reign, and thus described in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle: "It was fastened to a beam, having a sharp iron to go round the throat and neck, so that the person tortured could in no wise sit, lie, nor sleep, but that he must at all times bear all the iron."

Sack. Any dry wine, as sherry sack, Madeira sack, Canary sack, and Palm sack. (A corruption of the French sec, dry.)

Sack. A bag. According to tradition, it was the last word uttered before the tongues were confounded at Babel. (Saxon, sec; German, sack; Welsh, sach; Irish, sao; French, sac; Latin, sacus; Italian, sacco; Spanish, saco; Greek, ἱλασμός.)
sackos; Hebrew, sak; Swedish, sack; etc., etc.)

To get the sack or To give one the sack.

To get discharged by one's employer. Mechanics travelling in quest of work carried their implements in a bag or sack; when discharged, they received back the bag that they might replace in it their tools, and seek a job elsewhere. Workmen still often carry a bag of tools, but so much is done by machines that bags of tools are decreasing.

The Sultan puts into a sack, and throws into the Bosphorus, any one of his harem he wishes out of the way.

There are many cognate phrases, as To give one the bag, and Get the bag, which is merely substitutional. To receive the vuurums is a very old expression, referring to the substance of which the sack or bag was made. The French Tronsser vos quilles (pack up your ninepins or toys) is another idea, similar to "Pack up your tatters and follow the drum." (See Cashier.)

Sack Race (A). A village sport in which each runner is tied up to the neck in a sack. In some cases the candidates have to make short leaps, in other cases they are at liberty to run as well as the limits of the sack will allow them.

Sackbut. A corruption of sambisa.

Sackerson. The famous bear kept at "Pari Garden" in Shakespeare's time. (See Paris Garden.)

Sacrament. Literally, "a military oath" taken by the Roman soldiers not to desert their standard, turn their back on the enemy, or abandon their general. We also, in the sacrament of baptism, take a military oath "to fight manfully under the banner of Christ." The early Christians used the word to signify "a sacred mystery," and hence its application to the Baptism and Eucharist, and in the Roman Catholic Church to marriage, confirmation, etc.

The five sacraments are Confirmation, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction. (See Thirty-nine Articles, Article xxxv.)

The seven sacraments are Baptism, Confirmation, the Eucharist, Penance, Orders, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction.

The two sacraments of the Protestant Church are Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Sacramentarians. Those who believe that no change takes place in the eucharistic elements after consecration, but that the bread and wine are simply emblems of the body and blood of Christ. They were a party among the Reformers who separated from Luther.

Sacred Anchors, in Greek vessels, were never let go till the ship was in the extremity of danger.

Sacred City. (See Holy City.)

Sacred Heart. The "Feast of the Sacred Heart of Jesus" owes its origin to a French nun, named Mary Margaret Alacoque, of Burgundy, who practised devotion to the Saviour's heart in consequence of a vision. The devotion was sanctioned by Pope Clement XII. in 1732.

Sacred Isle, or Holy Island. Ireland was so called because of its many saints, and Guernsey for its many monks. The island referred to by Thomas Moore in his Irish Melodies (No. II.) is Scattery, to which St. Senanus retired, and vowed that no woman should set foot thereon.

"Oh, haste and leave this sacred isle, Thou dark, drear, drear, morrow's smile." St. Senanuis and the Lady.

Enhallow (from the Norse Eyjinhalga, Holy Isle) is the name of a small island in the Orkney group, where cells of the Irish anchorite fathers are said still to exist.

Sacred War.

(1) A war undertaken by the Amphictyonic League against the Circbeans, in defence of Delphi. (b.c. 594-587.)

(2) A war waged by the Athenians for the restoration of Delphi to the Phocians, from whom it had been taken. (b.c. 418-447.)

(3) A war in which the Phocians, who had seized Delphi, were conquered by Philip of Macedon. (b.c. 346.)

Sacred Way (The) in ancient Rome, was the street where Romulus and Tatum (the Sabine) swore mutual alliance. It does not mean the "holy street," but the "street of the oath.

Sacred Weed (The). Vervain. (See Herba Sagra.)

Sacrifice. Never sacrifice a white cock, was one of the doctrines of Pythagoras, because it was sacred to the moon. The Greeks went further, and said, "Nourish a cock, but sacrifice it not," for all cockerels were sacred either to the sun or moon, as they announced the hours. The cock was sacred also to the goddess of wisdom, and to Esculap'ius, the god of health; it therefore represented time, wisdom, and health, none of which are ever to be sacrificed. (See Ambibous: Protepsics, symbol xvi.)

Sacrifice to the Graces is to render oneself agreeable by courteous conduct, suavity of manners, and fastidiousness of dress. The allusion is to the three Graces of classic mythology.

Sacr’ering Bell. The little bell rung to give notice that the "Host" is approaching. Now called sanctus bell, from the words "Santus, sancius, sanctus, dominus, Deus Sabaoth, pronounced by the priest. (French, saucer; Latin, saucer.)

"He heard a little saccing bell rung to the elevation of a to-morrow mass."—James Scott: Discovery of Witchcraft (1584).

"The saccing of the kings of France."—Temple.

Sacripiant. A bragart, a noisy hectorer. He is introduced by Alexander Passoni, in a mock-heroic poem called The Rape of the Bucket.

Sacripiant (in Orlando Furioso). King of Circassia; and a Saracen.

Sad Bread (Latin, panis gravis). Heavy bread, ill-made bread. Shakespeare calls it "distressful bread"—not the bread of distress, but the panis gravis or ill-made bread eaten by the poor.

Sad Dog (He’s a). In tribute suet. A playful way of saying a man is a debaucher.

Sadab. The sixteenth night of the month Bayaman. (Persian mythology.)

Sadde. One of the sacred books of the Guebres or Paris containing a summary of the Zend-Avesta.

Sadder and a Wiser Man (A). "A sadder and a wiser man He rose the morrow morn."—Coleridge: The Ancient Mariner.

Saddle. Set the saddle on the right horse. Lay the blam on those who deserve it. Lose the horse and win the saddle. (See Lose.)

Saddletree (Mr. Bartolin). The learned saddler. (Sir Walter Scott: The Heart of Midlothian.)

Sad’duces. A Jewish party which denied the existence of spirits and angels, and, of course, disbelieved in the resurrection of the dead; so called from Sadoc (righteous-man), thought to be the name of a priest or rabbi some three centuries before the birth of Christ. As they did not believe in future punishments, they punished offences with the utmost severity.

Sadi or Sa'di. A Persian poet styled the "nightingale of thousand songs," and "one of the four monarchs of eloquence." His poems are the Gulistan or Garden of Roses, the Bustan or Garden of Fruits, and the Pard-Namah, a moral poem. He is admired for his sententious march. (1184-1263.)

Sadler’s Wells (London). There was a well at this place called Holy Well, once noted for "its extraordinary cures." The priests of Clerkenwell Priory used to boast of its virtues. At the Reformation it was stopped up, and was wholly forgotten till 1683, when a Mr. Sadler, in digging gravel for his garden, accidentally discovered it again. Hence the name. In 1765 Mr. Rosoman converted Sadler’s garden into a theatre.

Sadlerian Lectures. Lectures on Algebra delivered in the University of Cambridge, and founded in 1710 by Lady Sadler.

Schrumin [Sch-rim-ner]. The boar served to the gods in Valhalla every evening; by next morning the part eaten was miraculously restored. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Saifa, in Arabia, according to Arabian legend, is the hill on which Adam and Eve came together, after having been parted for two hundred years, during which time they wandered homeless over the face of the earth.

Safety Matches. In 1847 Schröttner, an Austrian chemist, discovered that red phosphorus gives off no fumes, and is virtually inert; but being mixed with chlorate of potash under slight pressure it explodes with violence. In 1855 Herr Böttger, of Sweden, put the red phosphorus on the box and the phosphorus on the match, so that the match must be rubbed on the box to bring the two together. (See Prometheans, Lucifers.)

Saffron. He hath slept in a bed of saffron. In Latin dormivit in sacci creto, meaning he has a very light heart, in reference to the exhilarating effects of saffron. "With genial joy to warm his soul, Helen mixed saffron in the bowl."

Saffron Veil. The Greek and Latin brides wore a flavumum or yellow veil, which wholly enveloped them. (See Saphron.)

Sag (plural Sagae). The northern mythological and historical traditions, Sailing within the Wind or Sailing close to the Wind. Going to the very verge of propriety, or acting so as just to escape the letter of the law. The phrase, of course, is nautical.

"The jokes (of our predecessors) might have been broader than modern manners allow... but... the master sails nearer to the wind than did his father's forefathers." —Nineteenth Century, November, 1962, p. 362.

"As defended himself by declaring that he did not tell Hamanadra anything; he only sent her a dream. This was undoubtedly sailing very near the wind." —Nineteenth Century, June, 1871, p. 917.

Sailor King. William IV. of England, who entered the navy as midshipman in 1779, and was made Lord High Admiral in 1827. (1765, 1830-1837.)

Louis IX. of France (1215, 1226-1270).

Olaus II. of Norway, brother of Harald III., called "St. Olaf the Double Beard" (984, 1026-1030).

Stephen I. of Hungary (979, 997-1038).

Dom Fernando, son of King John of Portugal, was, with his brother Henry, taken prisoner by the Moors at the siege of Tangier. The Portuguese general promised to give Ceuta for their ransom, and left Fernando in prison as their surety. The Portuguese government refused to ratify the condition, and Fernando was left in the hands of the Moors till he died. For this patriotic act he is regarded as a saint, and his day is June 3th. His brother Edward was king at the time. (1402-1443.)

St. Bees' College (Cumberland), situated on the bay formed by St. Bees' Head, founded by Dr. Law, Bishop of Chester, in 1816. St. Bees' was so called from a nunnery founded here in 650, and dedicated to the Irish saint named Begu. A "man of war" is a "Bees' man."
St. Cecilia, born of noble Roman parents, and fostered from her cradle in the Christian faith, married Valrian. One day she told him that an angel said, "whether she was awake or asleep, was ever beside her." Valrian requested to see this angel, and she said he must be baptised first. Valrian was baptised and suffered martyrdom. When Cecilia was brought before the Prefect Almachius, and refused to worship the Roman deities, she was "shut fast in a bath kept hot both night and day with great fires," but "felt of it no woe." Almachius then sent an executioner to cut off her head, "but for no manner of chance could he smite her fair neck in two." Three days she lingered with her neck bleeding, preaching Christ and Him crucified all the while; then she died, and Pope Urban buried the body. "Her house the church of St. Cecily is hight" unto this day. (Chaucer: "Sowonde Nommes Tale," (see Cecilia.)

Towards the close of the seventeenth century an annual musical festival was held in Stationers' Hall in honour of St. Cecilia.

St. Cuthbert's Duck. The cider duck.

St. Distaff. (See Distaff.)

St. Elmo, called by the French St. Elme. The electric light seen playing about the masts of ships in stormy weather. (See Castor and Pollux.)

"And sudden breaking on their raptured sight, Appeared the splendour of St. Elme's light." (Hoole's "Tale of Eden," Book IX.)

St. Francis. (See Francis.)

St. George's Cross, in heraldry, is a Greek cross gules upon a field argent. The field is represented in the Union Jack by a narrow fimbriation. It is the distinguishing badge of the British navy. St. George's flag is a smaller flag, without the Union Jack.

St. John Long. An illiterate-quack, who professed to have discovered a liniment which had the power of distinguishing between disease and health. The body was rubbed with it, and if irritation appeared it announced secret disease, which the quack undertook to cure. He was twice tried for manslaughter: once in 1830, when he was fined for his treatment of Miss Cashan, who died; and next in 1831, for the death of Mrs. Lloyd. Being acquitted, he was driven in triumph from the Old Bailey in a nobleman's carriage, amid the congratulations of the aristocracy.

St. John is pronounced Sion, as in that verse of Pope's—

"Awake, my St. John! leave all meaner things To low ambition and the pride of kings." (Essay on Man.)

St. John's Eve, St. Mark's Eve, and Allhallow Even, are times when poets say the forms of all such persons as are about to die in the ensuing twelve months make their solemn entry into the churches of their respective parishes. On these eves all sorts of goblins are about. Brand says, "On the Eve of John the Baptist's nativity bonfires are made to purify the air (vol. i. p. 305)."

St. Johnstone's Tippet. A halter; so called from Johnstone the hangman.

"Sent to heaven with St. Johnstone's tipit about my house."—Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality, chap. viii.

St. Leger Sweepstakes. The St. Leger race was instituted in 1776, by Colonel St. Leger, of Park Hill, near Doncaster, but was not called the "St. Leger" till two years afterwards, when the Marquis of Rockingham's horse Allahaunia won the race. (See Derby, Leger.)

St. Leon became possessed of the elixir of life, and the power of transmuting the baser metals into gold, but these acquisitions only brought him increased misery. (William Goodwin: St. Leon.)

St. Lundi (Lat.). St. Monday. Monday spent by workmen in idleness. One of the rules enjoined by the Sheffield unionists was that no work should be permitted to be done on a Monday by any of their members.

St. Michael's Chair. The projecting stone lantern of a tower erected on St. Michael's Mount, Cornwall. It is said that the rock received its name from a religious house built to commemorate the apparition of St. Michael on one of its craggy heights. (See Michael.)

St. Monday. A holiday observed by journeyman shoemakers and other inferior mechanics, and well-to-do merchants.

In the Journal of the Folk-lore Society, vol. i. p. 245, we read that, "While Cromwell's army lay encamped at Perth, one of his zealous partisans, named Monday, died, and Cromwell offered a reward for the best lines on his death. A shoemaker of Perth brought the following, which so pleased Cromwell that he not only gave the promised reward, but made also a decree that,
st. simonism

the social and political system of st. simon. he proposed the institution of a european parliament, to arbitrate in all matters affecting europe, and the establishment of a social hierarchy based on capacity and labour. he was led to his "social system" by the apparition of charlemagne, which appeared to him one night in the luxembourg, where he was suffering a temporary imprisonment. (1760-1825.)

"Triton, who boasts his high Neptunian race. Sprung from the god by Salace’s embrace."

Salad Days. Days of inexperience, when person are very green.

"My salad days."

-Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, i. 5.

A pen’orth of salad oil. A strapping: a castigation. It is a joke on All Fools’ Day to send one to the saddler’s for a “pen’orth of salad oil.” The pun is between “salad oil,” as above, and the French selleur de la salade, “to be flogged.” The French salaud and salade are derived from the selle or saddle on which schoolboys were at one time birched. A block for the purpose used to be kept in some of our public schools. Oudin translates the phrase “Donner la salade à un escolier” by “Se purifier un scolar innanzi à tutti gli altri.” (Recherches Italiennes et Francoises, part ii. 508.)

Salamander, in Egyptian hieroglyphics, is a human form pinched to death with the cold. (See Undines.)

Salamander. A sort of lizard, fabled to live in fire, which, however, it quenched by the chill of its body. Pliny tells us he tried the experiment once, but the creature was soon burnt to a powder. (Natural History, x. 67; xxix. 4.) Salamanders are not uncommon, especially the spotted European kind (Greek, salamandria).

Salamander. Francois I. of France adopted as his badge “a lizard in the midst of flames,” with the legend “Nutrice et extinguo” (“I nourish and extinguish.”) The Italian motto from which this legend was borrowed was “Nutрисo il buono e spengo il reo” (“I nourish the good and extinguish the bad”). Fire purifies good metal, but consume rubbish. (See ante.)

Salamander. Anything of a fiery-red colour. Falstaff calls Bardolph’s nose “a burning lamp,” “a salamander,” and the drink that made such a fiery meteor he calls “fire.”

“I have maintained that salamander of yours with fire any time this two and thirty years.”

- Shakespear: 1 Henry IV, i. 2.

Salamander’s Wool. Asbestos, a fibrous mineral, affirmed by the Tartars to be made “of the root of a tree.” It is sometimes called “mountain flax,” and is not combustible.

Salary. The salt rations. The Romans served out rations of salt and other necessaries to their soldiers and civil servants. The rations altogether were called by the general name of salt, and when money was substituted for the rations the stipend went by the same name. (Latin, salarium, from sal, salt.)

Salchichon. A huge Italian sausage. Thomas, Duke of Genoa, a boy of Harrow school, was so called, when he was thrust forward by General Prim as an “inflated candidate” for the Spanish throne.

Sale by the Candle. A species of auction. An inch of candle being lighted, he who made the bid as the candle gave its expiring wink was declared the buyer; sometimes a pin is stuck in a candle, and the last bidder before the pin falls out is the buyer.

Salém is Jireh-Salem, or Jerusalem.

“Melchizedec, King of Salem . . . being by interpretation . . . King of peace.”—Hebrews vii. 1, 2.

Salienc Law. The law so called is one chapter of the Salian code regarding succession to salic lands, which was limited to heirs male to the exclusion of females, chiefly because certain military duties were connected with the holding of those lands. In the fourteenth century females were excluded from the throne of France by the application of the Saliic law to the succession of the crown.

“Which Salius, as I am told, twrt Elie and Sala, is at this day in Germany called Meissen.”

-Shakespeare: Henry V., i. 2.

Philippe VI. of France, in order to raise money, exacted a tax on salt, called Gabelle, which was most unpopular and most unjustly levied.

Edward III. called this iniquitous tax “Philippe’s Saliic law.” (Latin, sal, salt.)

Saliens (The). A college of twelve priests of Mars instituted by Numa. The tale is that a shield fell from heaven, and the nymph Egeria predicted that whoever that shield was preserved the people would be the dominant people of the earth. To prevent the shield from being surreptitiously taken away, Numa had eleven others made exactly like it, and appointed twelve priests for guardians. Every year these young patricians promenaded the city, singing and dancing, and they finished the day with a most sumptuous banquet, insomuch that saluavos cena became proverbial for a most Salient Angles. The word "saliens" means dancing.

"Nunc est bibendum...
   nunc Sallustius
Ornare paiinare Deorum
Tempus erat daphnum."
_Hercules: I.Odes, xxx.vii. 24._

Salient Angles, in fortification, are those angles in a rampart which point outwards towards the country; those which point inwards towards the place fortified are called "re-entering angles."

Salisbury Cathedral. Begun in 1220, and finished in 1258; noted for having the loftiest spire in the United Kingdom. It is 400 feet high, or thirty feet higher than the dome of St. Paul's.

Salisbury Craigs. Rocks near Edinburgh; so called from the Earl of Salisbury, who accompanied Edward III. on an expedition against the Scots.

Sallee. A seaport on the west coast of Morocco. The inhabitants were formerly notorious for their piracy.

Salust of France. César Vichard, Abbé de St. Réal; so called by Voltaire. (1659-1692.)

Sally. Saddle. (Latin, sella; French, selle.)

"The horse... stopped his course by degrees, and went with his rider... into a pond to drink; and there sat his lordship upon the sall."—_Lives of the Norths._

"Vainly ambition... o'erleaps its sell,
   And falls o' the other..."—_Shakespeare: Macbeth, I, 7._

Sally Lunn. A tea-cake; so called from Sally Lunn, the pastrycook of Bath, who used to cry them about in a basket at the close of the eighteenth century. Daumer, the baker, bought her recipe, and made a song about the buns.

Sallyport. The postern in fortifications. It is a small door or port whence troops may issue unseen to make sallies, etc. (Latin, salio, to leap.)

Salmacis. A fountain of Carls, which rendered effeminate all those who bathed therein. It was in this fountain that Hermaphroditus changed his sex. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, iv. 285, and xvi. 319.)

"Th' moist limbs melted into Salmacis."
_Symphonies: Hermaphroditus._

Salmagundi. A mixture of minced veal, chicken, or turkey, anchovies or pickled herring, and onions, all chopped together, and served with lemon-juice and oil; said to be so called from Salmagundi, one of the ladies attached to the suite of Mary de Medicis, wife of Henri IV. of France. She either invented the dish or was so fond of it that it went by her name.

Salmon (Latin, salmo, to leap). The leaping fish.

Salmon, as food for servants. At one time apprentices and servants stipulated that they should not be obliged to feed on salmon more than five days in a week. Salmon was one penny a pound.

"A large boiled salmon would now-a-days have indicated most liberal housekeeping; but at that period salmon was caught in such plenty (here) that, instead of being accounted a delicacy, it was generally applied to feed the servants, who are said sometimes to have stipulated that they should not be required to eat food so insipid and surfeiting... about five times a week."—_Mr. W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. vii._

Salmonous (3 syl.). A king of Ellis, noted for his arrogance and impiety. He wished to be called a god, and to receive divine honour from his subjects. To imitate Jove's thunder he used to drive his chariot over a brazen bridge, and darted burning torches on every side to imitate lightning, for which impiety the king of gods and men hurled a thunderbolt at him, and sent him to the infernal regions.

Sal'sabili. A fountain in Paradise. (Al Koran, xxvi.)

"Mahomet was taking his afternoon nap in his Paradise. A horse had reared a cloud under his head, and he was snoring so thickly near the fountain of Sal'sabili."—_Creuzer's History of Mankind,_ ii. 8.

Salt. Flavour, smack. The salt of youth is that vigour and strong passion which then predominates. Shakespeare uses the term on several occasions for strong amorous passion. Thus Iago refers to it as "hot as monkeys, salt as wolves in pride" (Othello, iii. 3). The Duke calls Angelo's base passion his "salt imagination," because he supposed his victim to be Isabella, and not his betrothed wife whom the Duke forced him to marry. (Measure for Measure, v. 1.)

"Though we are justices, and doctors, and churchmen, Master Page, we have some salt of our youth in us."—_Merry Wives of Windsor,_ ii. 3.

Spilling salt was held to be an unlucky omen by the Romans, and the superstition has descended to ourselves. In Leonardo da Vinci's famous picture of the Lord's Supper, Judas Iscariot is known by the salt-cellar knocked over accidentally by his arm. Salt was used in sacrifice by the Jews, as well as by the Greeks and Romans; and it is still used in baptism by the Roman Catholic clergy. It was an emblem of purity and the sanctifying influence of a holy life on others. Hence our Lord tells His disciples they are "the salt of the earth." Spilling the salt after it was placed on the head of the victim was a bad omen, hence the superstition.
A covenant of salt (Numbers xviii. 19). A covenant which could not be broken. As salt was a symbol of incorruption, it, of course, symbolised perpetuity.

- "The Lord God of Israel gave the kingdom ... to David ... by a covenant of salt."—2 Chronicles xiii. 5.

Cum grano salis. With great limitations; with its grain of salt, or truth. As salt is sparingly used in condiments, so is truth in the remark just made.

He won't earn salt for his porridge. He will never earn a penny.

Not worth one's salt. Not worth the expense of the food he eats.

To eat a man's salt. To partake of his hospitality. Among the Arabs to eat a man's salt was a sacred bond between the host and guest. No one who has eaten of another's salt should speak ill of him or do him an ill turn.

"One does not eat a man's salt ... at these dinners. There is nothing sacred in ... London hospitality."—Thackeray.

To sit above the salt—in a place of distinction. Formerly the family saler (salt cellar) was of massive silver, and placed in the middle of the table. Persons of distinction sat above the "saler"—i.e. between it and the head of the table; dependents and inferior guests sat below.

"We took him up above the salt and made much of him."—Kingsley: Westward Ho! chap. xv.

True to his salt. Faithful to his employers. Here salt means salary or interests. (See above, To eat a man's salt.)

- "M. Waddington owes his fortune and his consideration to his father's adopted country (France), and he is true to his salt."—Newspaper paragraph, March 5, 1868.

Salt. A sailor, especially an old sailor; e.g. an old salt.

Salt Bread or Bitter Bread. The bread of affliction or humiliation. Bread too salt is both disagreeable to the taste and indigestible.

- "Learning how hard it is to get back when once exiled, and how salt is the bread of others."—Mrs. Oliphant: Mahers of Florence, p. 65.

Salt-cellar (A). A table salt-stand. (French, salière; Latin, salarium.)

Salt Hill (Eton). The mound at Eton where the Eton scholars used to collect money from the visitors on Montem day. The mound is still called Salt Hill, and the money given was called salt. The word salt is similar to the Latin salarium (salary), the pay given to Roman soldiers and civil officers. (See Montem, Salary.)

- Cakes of salt are still used for money in Abyssinia and Tintoret.

Salt Junk. (See Junk.)

Salt Lake. It has been stated that three buckets of this water will yield one of solid salt. This cannot be true, as water will not hold in solution more than twenty-five per cent. of saline matter. The Mormons engaged in procuring it state that they obtain one bucket of salt for every five buckets of water. (Quebec Morning Chronicle.)

Salt Ring. An attempt to monopolise the sale of salt by a ring or company which bought up some of the largest of our salt-mines.

Salt River. To row up Salt River. A defeated political party is said to be rowed up Salt River, and those who attempt to uphold the party have the task of rowing up this ungracious stream. J. Inman says the allusion is to a small stream in Kentucky, the passage of which is rendered both difficult and dangerous by shallows, bars, and an extremely tortuous channel.

Salt an Invoice (7%). To put the extreme value upon each article, and even something more, to give it piquancy and raise its market value, according to the maxim, sal sapit omnia. The French have the same expression: as "Tu devra bien salé" (to sell very dear); "Il me la bien salé" (He charged me an exorbitant price); and generally saler is to pigeon one.

Salt in Beer. In Scotland it was customary to throw a handful of salt on the top of the mash to keep the witches from it. Salt really has the effect of moderating the fermentation and fixing the liquor.

Salt in a Coffin. It is still not uncommon to put salt into a coffin, and Morein tells us the reason: Satan hates salt, because it is the symbol of incorruption and immortality. (Papetus, p. 154.)

Salt Losing its Savour. "If salt has lost its savour, wherewith shall it be salted?" If men fall from grace, how shall they be restored? The reference is to rock-salt, which loses its saltiness if exposed to the hot sun.

- "Along one side of the Valley of Salt (that towards Gibah) there is a small precipice about two men's lengths, occasioned by taking away of the salt. I broke a piece off that was exposed to the sun, rain, and air; though it had the sparks and particles of salt, yet it had perfectly lost its savour. The inner part, however, retained its saltiness."—Maimon, quoted by Dr. Adam Clarke.

Salt on His Tail (Lay). Catch or apprehend him. The phrase is based on the direction given to small children to lay salt on a bird's tail if they want to catch it.

"His intelligence is so good, that were you to come near him with soldiers or constables... I shall answer for it you will never lay salt on his tail." - Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xi

Saltarello, "le fils de la folie et de Puleinello." A supposititious Italian dancer, sent to amuse Bettina in the court of the Grand Duke Laurent. Bettina was a servant on a farm, in love with the shepherd Pippo. But when she was taken to court and made a countess, Pippo was forbidden to approach her. Bettina languished, and to amuse her a troop of Italian dancers was sent for, of which Saltarello was the leader. He soon made himself known to Bettina, and married her. Bettina was a "mascotte" (q.v.), but, as the children of mascottes are mascottes also, the prince became reconciled with the promise that he should be allowed to adopt her first child. (La Mancotte.)

Hence a Saltarello is an assumed covert to bring about a forbidden marriage and hoodwink those who forbade it.

Saltpetre (French, saltpetre), sel de pierre, parce qu'il forme des efflorescences salines sur les murs. (Bouillet: Dict. des Sciences.)

Salm's (2 syl.). According to tradition, on the triumphant return of Maximilian to Germany, after his second campaign, the town of Augsburg ordered 100 rounds of cannon to be discharged. The officer on service, fearing to have fallen short of the number, caused an extra round to be added. The town of Nuremberg ordered a like salute, and the custom became established.

Salute, in the British navy, between two ships of equal rank, is made by firing an equal number of guns. If the vessels are of unequal rank, the superior fires the fewer rounds.

Royal salute, in the British navy, consists (1) in firing twenty-one great guns, (2) in the officers lowering their sword-points, and (3) in dipping the colours.

Salutations.
Shaking hands. A relic of the ancient custom of adversaries, in treating of a truce, taking hold of the weapon-hand to ensure against treachery.

Lady's curtsey. A relic of the ancient custom of women going on the knee to men of rank and power, originally to beg mercy, afterwards to acknowledge superiority.

Taking off the hat. A relic of the ancient custom of taking off the helmet when no danger is nigh. A man takes off his hat to show that he dares stand unarmed in your presence.

Discharging guns as a salute. To show that no fear exists, and therefore no guns will be required. This is like "burying the hatchet" (q.v.).

Presenting arms--i.e. offering to give them up, from the full persuasion of the peaceful and friendly disposition of the person so honoured.

Lowering swords. To express a willingness to put yourself unarmed in the power of the person saluted, from a full persuasion of his friendly feeling.

Salse (1 syl.) is the Latin salvia (sage), one of the most efficient of medieval remedies.

"To other wounds, and to broken armes. Some malle salve, and some malle charmes." (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, line 2715.)

Salve. To flatter, to wheedle. The allusion is to salving a wound.

Salve (2 syl.). Latin "hail," "welcome." The word is often written on door-mats.

Sam. Uncle Sam. The United States Government. Mr. Frost tells us that the inspectors of Elbert Anderson's store on the Hudson were Ebenzer Wilson and his uncle Samuel Wilson, the latter of whom superintended in person the workmen, and went by the name of "Uncle Sam." The stores were marked E.A.--U.S. (Elbert Anderson, United States), and one of the employers, being asked the meaning, said "Uncle Sam." The joke took, and in the War of Independence the men carried it with them, and it became stereotyped.

To stand Sam. To be made to pay the reckoning. This is an Americanism, and arose from the letters U.S. on the knapsacks of the soldiers. The government of Uncle Sam has to pay, or "stand Sam" for all. (See above.)

Sam Weller. Servant of Mr. Pickwick, famous for his metaphors. He is meant to impersonate the wit, shrewdness, quaint humour, and best qualities of London low life. (Charles Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Samuel. The prince of demons, who, in the guise of a serpent, tempted Eve; also called the angel of death. (Jewish demonology.)

Sam'anides (3 syl.). A dynasty of ten kings in Western Persia (902-1004), founded by Ismail al Sam'ani.
Samaria, according to I Kings xvi. 24, means the hill of Shemer. Omri "bought the hill Samaria of Shemer for two talents of silver, and built on the hill, and called the name of [his] city . . . after the name of Shemer . . . Samaria." (2 c. 925.)

Samaritan. A good Samaritan. A philanthropist, one who attends upon the poor to aid them and give them relief. (Luke x. 30-37.)

Sambo. A pet name given to any one of the negro race. The term is properly applied to the male offspring of a negro and mulatto, the female offspring being called Zamba. (Spanish, zamb, bow-legged; Latin, scabinus.)

Samedi (French). Saturday. A contraction of Saturni-dies. In French, samedi and sature are interchangeable, whence Saturne is changed to Sature, and contracted into Sver. M. Mason, in his French etymologies, says it is Sabbati dies, but this cannot be correct. Mardi is Martis-dies, Vendredi is Veneris dies, Jeudi is Jovis-dies, etc. (The day of Saturn, Mars, Venus, Jove, etc.)

Samian. The Samian port. Simonides the satirist, born at Samos.

Samian Letter (The). The letter Σ, used by Pythag’oras as an emblem of the straight narrow path of virtue, which is one, but, if once deviated from, the farther the lines are extended the wider becomes the breach.

"When reason doubtful, like the Samian letter, points him two ways, the narrowest is the better." (Dunciad, iv.)

Samian Sage (The). Pythag’oras born at Samos: sometimes called "the Samian." (Sixth century a.c.)

In this late age, adventurous to have touched light on the numbers of the Samian sage." (Thomson.)

Samia’s. A seraph, who fell in love with Aholib’a’mah, a granddaughter of Cain, and when the flood came, carried her under his wing to some other planet. (Byron: Heaven and Earth.)

Samiel, the Black Huntsman of the Wolf’s Glen. A satanic spirit, who gave to a markman who entered into compact with him seven balls, six of which were to hit infallibly whatever was aimed at, but the seventh was to deceive. The person who made this compact was termed Der Fréischtuch. (Weber: Der Fréischtuch, libretto by Kind.)

Samiel Wind, or Simoon. A hot suffocating wind that blows occasionally in Africa and Arabia. (Arabic, samman, suffocatingly hot.)

"Burning and leading as the Samiel wind." (Thomas Moore: Salto Bough, pt. i.)

Sammel. The chief of evil spirits, who is for ever gnashing his teeth over the damned. Next to him is Ashmedai (Asmodeus). (Cabalista.)

Samoer. The south wind of Persia, which so softens the strings of lutes, that they can never be tuned while it lasts. (Stephen: Persia.)

"Like the wind of the south o’er a summer lute bloweth, Hurled all its music, and withered its frame." (Thomas Moore: The Fire Worshippers.)

Samos’ian Philosopher. Lucian of Samos’ata. (Properly Samos’a-tan.)

Sampford Ghost (The). A kind of exaggerated "Cock Lane ghost" (q.v.), which "haunted" Sampford Peverell for about three years in the first decade of the 19th century. The house selected was occupied by a man named Chave, and besides the usual knockings, the inmates were beaten; in one instance a powerful "unattached arm" flung a folio Greek Testament from a bed into the middle of a room. The Rev. Charles (called Colton (credited as the author of these freaks) offered £100 to anyone who could explain the matter except on supernatural grounds. No one, however, claimed the reward. Colton died 1832.

Sampl. A Greek numeral. (See Epimenon.)

Sampler. A pattern, A piece of fancy-sewed or embroidered work done by girls for practice.

Sampson. Any man of unusual strength: so called from the Judge of Israel. The British Sampson. Thomas Topham, son of a London carpenter. He lifted three hogheads of water, weighing 1,836 pounds, in the presence of thousands of spectators assembled in Bath Street, Coldbath Fields, May 28th, 1741. Being plagued by a faithless woman, he put an end to his life in the flower of his age. (1710-1753.)

The Kentish Sampson. Richard Joy, who died 1742, at the age of 67. His tombstone is in St. Peter’s churchyard, Isle of Thanet.
Sancho Panza, the squire of Don Quixote, was governor of Baratária, according to Cervantes. He is described as a short, pot-bellied rustic, full of common sense, but without a grain of "spirituality." He rode upon an ass, Dapple, and was famous for his proverbs. Panza, in Spanish, means penance.

A Sancho Panza. A justice of the peace. In allusion to Sancho, as judge in the isle of Baratária.

Sancho Panza's wife, called Terese, pt. i. 6; Maria, pt. ii. iv. 7; Juana, pt. i. 7; and Joan, pt. i. 21.

Sancho. The model painting of this squire in Leslie's Sancho and the Duchess.

Sancho Pariso. (See Don Quixote, pt. ii. bk. 1. chap. iv.)

San Benito (The). The vest of penitence. It was a coarse yellow tunic worn by persons condemned to death by the Inquisition on their way to the auto de fè; it was painted over with flames, demons, etc. In the case of those who expressed repentance for their errors, the flames were directed downwards. Penitents who had been taken before the Inquisition had to wear this badge for a stated period. Those worn by Jews, sorcerers, and renegades bore a St. Andrew's cross in red on back and front.

San Cristóbal. A mountain in Granada, seen by ships arriving from the African coast; so called because colossal images of St. Christopher were erected in places of danger, from the superstitious notion that whoever cast his eye on the gigantic saint would be free from peril for the whole day.

San Suén'a. Zaragoza.

Sanse-bell. Same as "Sanctus-bell." (See Sacring-bell.)

San'cha. Daughter of Garcías, King of Navarre, and wife of Fernan González of Castile. She twice saved the life of the count her husband; once on his road to Navarre, being waylaid by personal enemies and cast into a dungeon, she liberated him by bribing the gaoler. The next time was when Fernan was waylaid and held prisoner at León. On this occasion she effected his escape by changing clothes with him.

"The tale resembles that of the Countess of Nithdale, who effected the escape of her husband from the Tower on February 23rd, 1715; and that of the Countess de Lavallette, who, in 1815, liberated the count her husband from prison by changing clothes with him.

Sancho Panza, the squire of Don Quixote, was governor of Baratária, according to Cervantes. He is described as a short, pot-bellied rustic, full of common sense, but without a grain of "spirituality." He rode upon an ass, Dapple, and was famous for his proverbs. Panza, in Spanish, means penance.

A Sancho Panza. A justice of the peace. In allusion to Sancho, as judge in the isle of Baratária.

Sancho Panza's wife, called Terese, pt. i. 6; Maria, pt. ii. iv. 7; Juana, pt. i. 7; and Joan, pt. i. 21.

Sancho. The model painting of this squire in Leslie's Sancho and the Duchess.

Sancho Panza's wife, called Terese, pt. i. 6; Maria, pt. ii. iv. 7; Juana, pt. i. 7; and Joan, pt. i. 21.

Sancho. The model painting of this squire in Leslie's Sancho and the Duchess.
Prince Paul Demidoff for £90,000. The prince sold it in 1830 to M. Levrat, administrator of the Mining Society, who was to pay for it in four instalments; but his failing to fulfil his engagement became, in 1832, the subject of a lawsuit, which was given in favour of the prince. We next hear of it in Bombay; and in 1867 it was transmitted to England by the firm of Forbes & Co. It now belongs to the Czar.

Sand. A rope of sand. Something nominally effective and strong, but in reality worthless and untrustworthy.

Sand-blind. Virtually blind, but not wholly so; what the French call ber-luc; our par-blind. (Old English suffix sand, half; or Old High German sand, virtually.) It is only fit for a Launcelot Gobbo to derive it from sand, a sort of earth.

“Is this my true-begotten father, who, being more than sand-blind, high-gravel blind, knows me not.”—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

Sand-man is about. (The.) (See Dustman.)

Sand. Footprints on the sands of Time (Longfellow: Psalm of Life). This beautiful expression was probably suggested by a letter of the First Napoleon to his Minister of the Interior respecting the poor-laws:—“It is melancholy (he says) to see time passing away without being put to its full value. Surely in a matter of this kind we should endeavour to do something, that we may say that we have not lived in vain, that we may leave some impress of our lives on the sands of Time.”

To number sands. To undertake an endless or impossible task.

“Aha! poor Duke, the task he undertakes in numbering sands and drinking oceans dry.”—Shakespeare: Richard II, ii. 2.

Sandabar. An Arabian writer, celebrated for his Parables. He lived about a century before the Christian era.

Sandal. A man without sandals. A prodigal; so called by the ancient Jews, because the seller gave his sandals to the buyer as a ratification of his bargain. (Ruth iv. 7.)

Sandals of Thermasenes (4 syl.), which would fit any foot. Thermasenes, one of the Athenian oligarchy, was nicknamed “the trimmer” (catharēs, a sandal or boot which might be worn on either foot), because no dependence could be placed on him. He blew hot and cold with the same breath. The proverb is applied to a trimmer.

Sandalphon. One of the three angels who receive the prayers of the Israelites, and weave crowns for them. (Longfellow.)

Sandalwood. A corruption of Santalwood, a plant of the genus Santalum and natural order Santalacea.

Sandbanks. Wynants, a Dutch artist, is famous for his homely pictures, where sandbanks form a most striking feature.

Sandemanians or Glassites. A religious party expelled from the Church of Scotland for maintaining that national churches, being “kingdoms of this world,” are unlawful. Called Glassites from John Glass, the founder (1728), and called Sandemanians from Robert Sandeman, who published a series of letters on the subject in 1755.

Sand’en [sandy-den]. The great palace of King Lion, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Sandford and Morton. Thomas Day’s tale so called.

Sandjar. One of the Seljuk Sultans of Persia; so called from the place of his birth. Generally considered the Persian Alexander. (1117-1158.)

Sandshaki or Sandshaki-sherif [the standard of green silk]. The sacred banner of the Musulmans. It is now enveloped in four coverings of green taffeta, enclosed in a case of green cloth. The standard is twelve feet high, and the golden ornament (a closed hand) which surmounts it holds a copy of the Koran written by the Calif Osman III. In times of peace this banner is guarded in the hall of the “noble vestment,” as the dress worn by “the prophet” is styled. In the same hall are preserved the sacred teeth, the holy beard, the sacred stirrup, the sabre, and the bow of Mahomet.

Sandwich. A piece of meat between two slices of bread; so called from the Earl of Sandwich (the noted “Jimmy Twitcher”), who passed whole days in Sandwichman

The waiter bring him for refreshment a piece of meat between two pieces of bread, which he ate without stopping from play. This contrivance was not first hit upon by the earl in the reign of George III., as the Romans were very fond of "sandwiches," called by them offida.

Sanhedrín (A). A perambulating advertisement display, with an advertisement board before and behind. "The Earl of Shaftesbury desired to say a word on behalf of a very respectable body of men, ordinarily called 'sandwiches.'" — The Times, March 1814, 1867.

Sang Bleu. Of high aristocratic descent. The words are French, and mean blue blood, but the notion is Spanish. The old families of Spain who trace their pedigree beyond the time of the Moorish conquest say that their veins blood is blue, but that of common people is black.

Sang Frold (French, "cool blood"), meaning indifference; without temper or irritation.

Sangaree. A West Indian drink, consisting of Madeira wine, syrup, water, and nutmeg.

Sanglamer (3 syl.). Braggadocio's sword. (Spenser: Faerie Queene.)

Sanglier (Syr.). Meant for Shan O'Neil, leader of the Irish insurgents in 1567. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v.)

Sanglier des Ardenes. Guillaume de la Marck driven from Liège, for the murder of the Bishop of Liège, and beheaded by the Archduke Maximilian. (1446-1485.)

Sangrado (Dr.), in the romance of Gil Blas, prescribes warm water and bleeding for every ailment. The character is a satire on Helvetius. (Book ii. 2.)

"If the Sangrados were ignorant, there was at any rate more to spare in the veins than there is now."—Daily Telegraph.

Sangreal. The vessel from which our Saviour drank at the Last Supper, and which (as it is said) was afterwards filled by Joseph of Arimathea's with the blood that flowed from His wounds. This blood was reported to have the power of prolonging life and preserving chastity. The quest of this cup forms the most fertile source of adventures to the knights of the Round Table. The story of the Sangreal or Sangraal was first written in verse by Chrétien de Troyes (end of the tenth century), thence Latinised (thirteenth century), and finally turned into French prose by Gautier Map, by "order of Lord Henry" (Henry III.). It commences with the genealogy of our Saviour, and details the whole Gospel history; but the prose romance begins with Joseph of Arimathea's. Its quest is continued in Percival, a romance of the fifteenth century, which gives the adventures of a young Welshman, raw and inexperienced, but admitted to knighthood. At his death the sangreal, the sacred lance, and the silver trencer were carried up to heaven in the presence of attendants, and have never since been seen on earth.

Tennyson has a poem entitled The Holy Grail.

Tenne and sanguine are not used by English heralds. (See HERALDS.)

Sanguinary James (A). A sheep's head not singed. A jemmy is a sheep's head; so called from James I., who introduced into England the national Scotch dish of "singed sheep's head and trotters." No real Scotch dinner is complete without a haggis, a sheep's head and trotters, and a hotch-potch (in summer), or cocky leekie (in winter).

A cocky leekie is a fowl boiled or stewed with leeks or kale—i.e. salt beef and curly greens.

(Jemmy a sheep) cannot be the origin of jemmy, as the tie is always soft.

Sanhedrin. The Jewish Sanhedrin probably took its form from the seventy elders appointed to assist Moses in the government. After the captivity it seems to have been a permanent consistory court. The president was called "Ha-Nasi" (the prince), and the vice-president "Abbas" (father). The seventy sat in a semicircle, thirty-five on each side of the president; the "father" being on his right hand, and the "hacum," or sub-deputy, on his left. All questions of the "Law" were dogmatically settled by the Sanhedrin, and those who refused obedience were excommunicated. (Greek, sunedrium, a sitting together.)

Sanhedrin, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, stands for the British Parliament.

"The Sanhedrin long as chief he ruled, Their reason guided, and their passion cooled."
Sanjakshif. The flag of the prophet. (Turkish, sanjak, a standard.)

Sans Culettas (French, without trousers). A name given by the aristocratic section during the French Revolution to the popular party, the favourite leader of which was Henriot. (1793.)

Sans Culettides. The five complementary days added to the twelve months of the Revolutionary Calendar. Each month being made to consist of thirty days, the riff-raff days which would not conform to the law were named in honour of the sans culottes, and made idle days or holidays.

Sans-culottism. Red republicanism.

Sans Feur et Sans Reproche. Pierre du Terrail, Chevalier de Bayard, was called le chevalier sans feur et sans reproche. (1476-1524.)

Sans Souci (French). Free and easy. void of care. There is a place so called near Potsdam, where Frederick II. (the Great) built a royal palace.

Enfans Sans Souci. The Tradesmen's company of actors, as opposed to the Lawyers, called "Basochians" (q.v.). This company was organised in France in the reign of Charles VIII., for the performance of short comedies, in which public characters and the manners of the day were turned into ridicule. The manager of the "Care-for-Notings" (sans souci) was called "The Prince of Fools." One of their dramatic pieces, entitled Master Pierre Pothelin, was an immense favourite with the Parisians.

Sansarca. The ten essential rites of Hindus of the first three castes: (1) at the conception of a child; (2) at the quickening; (3) at birth; (4) at naming; (5) carrying the child out to see the moon; (6) giving him food to eat; (7) the ceremony of tonsure; (8) investiture with the string; (9) the close of his studies; (10) the ceremony of marriage, when he is qualified to perform the sacrifices ordained.

Sansfoy (Infidelity). A Saracen "who cared for neither God nor man," encountered by St. George and slain. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i. 2.)

Sansfoy (Without the peace of God). Brother of Sansfoy (Infidelity) and Sansfoy (Without the law of God). He is a paynim knight, who fights with St. George in the palace grounds of Priule and would have been slain if Duessa had not rescued him. He is carried in the car of Night to the infernal regions, where he is healed of his wounds by Escalus' pius. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i. 4, 5.)

Sanaloy [Irreligion], brother of Sansfoy (q.e.). Having torn off the disguise of Archmago and wounded the lion, he carries off Una into the wilderness. Her shrieks arouse the fauns and satyrs, who come to her rescue, and Sanaloy flees. Una is Truth, and, being without Holiness (the Red-Cross Knight), is deceived by Hypocrisy. As soon as Truth joins Hypocrisy, instead of Holiness, Irreligion breaks in and carries her away. The reference is to the reign of Queen Mary, when the Reformation was carried captive, and the lion was wounded by the "False-law of God." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book i. 2.)

In book ii. Sansaloy appears again as the cavalier of Perissa or Prodigality.

Santa Casa (Italian, the holy house). The reputed house in which the Virgin Mary lived at Nazareth, miraculously translated to Fiume, in Dalmatia, in 1291, thence to Recan'ti in 1294, and finally to Macera'ta, in Italy, to a piece of land belonging to the Lady Loretto.

Santa Claus or Santa Klaus. A corrupt contraction of Sankt Nikolaus (Sanč'ni kulaus—i.e. St. Nicholas), the patron saint of children. The vigil of his feast is still held in some places, but for the most part his name is now associated with Christmas-tide. The old custom used to be for someone, on December 5th, to assume the costume of a bishop and distribute small gifts to "good children." The present custom is to put toys and other little presents into a stocking or pillow-case late on Christmas Eve, when the children are asleep, and when they wake on Christmas morn each child finds in the stocking or bag hung at the bedside the gift sent by Santa Claus. St. Nicholas' day is December 6. The Dutch Kris Kringle.

Saophron. The girdle worn by Grecian women, whether married or not. The bridegroom loosed the bride's girdle, whence "to loose the girdle" came to mean to deflower a woman, and a prostitute was called "a woman whose girdle is unloosed." (γυνὴ ἀνυψώτερον.)

Sappho. A Greek and Latin metre, so named from Sappho, the inventor. Horace always writes this.
metre in four-line stanzas, the last being an Adonic. There must be a cæsura at the fifth foot of each of the first three lines, which runs thus:—

"Sometimes...mistakes occur in our little bits of Sarnian intelligence." — Mrs. Edwards: A Giron Girl, chap. iii.

Sarp'don. A favourite of the gods, who assisted Priam when Troy was besieged by the allied Greeks. When Achilles refused to fight, Sarpedon made great havoc in battle, but was slain by Patroclus. (Homer: Iliad.)

Sars'en Stones. The "Druidical" sandstones of Wiltshire and Berkshire are so called. The early Christian Saxons used the word Saresyn as a synonym of pagan or heathen, and as these stones were popularly associated with Druid worship, they were called Saresyn or heathen stones. Robert Ricart says of Duke Rollo, "He was a Saresyn come out of Denmark into France." Another derivation is the Phoenician sarzen (a rock), applied to any huge mass of stone that has been drawn from the quarry in its rude state.

These boulders are no more connected with the Druids than Stonehenge is (q.r.t.).

Sar'tor Resartus. (The Tailor Patched.) By Thomas Carlyle.

Diogenes Teufelsdrockh is Carlyle himself, and Entepfuhli is his native village of Ecclefechan.

The Rose Goddess, according to Froude, is Margaret Gordon, but Strachey is Blumine, i.e. Kitty Kirkpatrick, daughter of Colonel Achilles Kirkpatrick, and Rose Garden is Strachey's garden at Shooter's Hill. The denucia is Mrs. Strachey.

The Zahharmes are Mr. and Mrs. Buller, and Toughgut is Charles Buller.

Philistine is the Rev. Edward Irving.

Sash Window is a window that moves up and down in a groove. (French, chasse, a sash or groove.)

Sassan'ides (4 syl.). The first Persian dynasty of the historic period; so named because Ard'eshir, the founder, was son of Sasan, a lineal descendant of Xerxes.

Sassensach (ch = k). A Keltic word for a Saxon, or for the English language.

Sat'an, in Hebrew, means enemy.

"To whom the Arch-enemy
(And hence in heaven called Sarum.)" — Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. 1, 81, 82.

Sat'an's Journey to Earth (Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 418 to the end). He starts from Hell, and wanders a long time about the confines of the Universe, where he sees Chaos and Limbo. The Universe is a vast extended plain, fortified by part of the ethereal quintessence out of which the stars were created. This plain in the fortification, through which angels pass when they visit our earth. Being weary, Satan rests awhile at this gap, and contemplates the vast Universe. He then transforms himself into an angel of light and visits Uriel, whom he finds in the Sun. He asks Uriel the way to Paradise, and Uriel points out to him our earth. Then plunging through the starry vault, the waters above the firmament, and the firmament itself, he alights safely on Mount Niphates, in Armounia.

Sat'an'ic. The Satanic School. So Southey called Lord Byron and his imitators, who set at defiance the generally received notions of religion. Of English writers, Byron, Shelley, Moore, and Bulwer are the most prominent; of French writers Rousseau, Victor Hugo, Paul de Kock, and George Sand.

Sat'ire (2 syl.). Scaliger's derivation of this word from satyrus is untenable. It is from satyra (full of variety), satyra taur, a hotchpotch or olla podrida. As maximinus, optimus, etc., became maximus, optimus, so "satur" became sat'ira. (See Dryden's Dedication prefixed to his Satires.)

Father of satira. Archilochus of Paros (b.c. seventh century).

Father of French satire. Mathurin Regnier (1573-1613).

Father of Roman satire. Lucilius (b.c. 148-103).

"Lucilius was the man who, bravely bold,
To Roman vice did the mirror hold;
Preserved humble goodness from reproach,

Saturday. (See Black Saturday.)

Saturn or Kronos [Time] devoured all his children except Jupiter, Neptune, and Pluto. Jupiter means air, Neptune water, and Pluto the grave. These Time cannot consume. Saturn is a very evil planet to be born under. "The children of the said Saturne shall be great jangeleres and chyderes...and they will never forgivethyll they be revenged of theyr quarell." (Compost of Pitholomeus.)

Saturn, with the ancient alchemists, designated lead.

Saturn's Tree, in alchemy, is a deposit of crystallised lead, massed together in the form of a "tree." It is Saturnalia

A time of licensed disorder and mirth. With the Romans it was the festival of Saturn, and was celebrated the 17th, 18th, and 19th of December. During its continuance no public business could be transacted, the law courts were closed, the schools kept holiday, no war could be commenced, and no malfactor punished. Under the empire the festival was extended to seven days.

Saturnian Days. Days of dulness, when everything is venal.

"Then rose the creed of Chaos and of Night
To blot out order and extinguish light,
Of dulness, venal a new world to mould,
And bring Saturnian days of lead and gold."

They are lead to indicate dulness, and gold to indicate venality.

Saturnian Verses. Old-fashioned. A rude composition employed in satire among the ancient Romans. Also a peculiar metre, consisting of three iambics and a syllable over, joined to three trochees, according to the following nursery metre:

"The queen was in the parlour . . . .
The maids were in the garden . . . ."

"The Pescennium and Saturnian were the same,
For as they were called Saturnian from their sacriences, when Saturn reigned in Italy, they were called Pescennium from Pescennius [sic], where they were first practised."—Dryden: A Dedication of Juvenal.

Saturnine (3 syl.). A grave, phlegmatic disposition, dull and heavy. Astrologers affirm that such is the disposition of those who are born under the influence of the leader planet Saturn.

Satyr. The most famous representation of these goat-men is that of Fraxiteles, a sculptor of Athens in the fourth century B.C.

Satyrane (3 syl.). A blunt but noble knight who delivered Una from the fauns and satyrs. The meaning is this: Truth, being driven from the towns and cities, took refuge in caves and dews, where for a time it lay concealed. At length Sir Satyrane (Luther) rescues Una from bondage; but no sooner is this the case than she falls in with Archimago, to show how very difficult it was at the Reformation to separate Truth from Error. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. i.)

Sauce means "salted food," for giving a relish to meat, as pickled roots, herbs, and so on. (Latin, salere.)

The sauce was better than the fish. The accessories were better than the main part. This may be said of a book in which the plates and getting up are better than the matter it contains.

To serve the same sauce. To retaliate; to give as good as you take; to serve in the same manner.

"After him another came unto her, and served her with the same sauce; then a third . . . ."—The Men in the Moon, etc. (1901)

Sauce (To). To intermix.

"Then she felt to sauce her desires with threatening."—Satan

"Polly sauces with discretion."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, 1. 2.

Sauce to the Goose is Sauce to the Gander. (See Gander.)

Saucer Eyes. Big, round, glaring eyes.

"Yet when a child (thinks me) I thought
That by a year or two there was not got,
With eyes like 'saucers' scarce was marked.

Peter Pindar: Ode to the Devil.

Saucer Oath. When a Chinese is put in the witness-box, he says: "If I do not speak the truth may my soul be cracked and broken like this saucer." So saying, he dashes the saucer on the ground. The Roman Catholic imprecation, known as "Bell, Book, and Candle" (q.v.), and the Jewish marriage custom of breaking a wine-glass, are of a similar character.

Saucy. Rakish, irresistible; or rather that care-for-nobody, jaunty, daring behaviour which has won for many of our regiments the term as a compliment. It is also applied metaphorically to some inanimate things, as "saucy waves," which dare attack the very moon; the "saucy world," which dares defy the very god; the "saucy mountains," "windy," "wit," and so on.

"But still the little petrel was saucy as the wails."

Kiza Cook: The Young Mariners, stanza 7.

Saul, in Dryden's satire of Abolat and Achitophel, is meant for Oliver Cromwell. As Saul persecuted David and drove him from Jerusalem, so Cromwell persecuted Charles II. and drove him from England.

"They who, when Saul was dead, without a blow Made foolish disobedient [Richard Cromwell] the crown forsook." Part 1. lines 57, 58.

Saul among the prophets? The Jews said of our Lord, "How knowesth this man letters, having never learned?" (John vii. 15.) Similarly at the conversation of Saul, afterwards called Paul, the Jews said in substance, "Is it possible that Saul can be a convert?" (Acts ix. 21.) The proverb applies to a person who unexpectedly bears tribute to a party or doctrine that he has hitherto vigorously assailed. (1 Sam. x. 12.)

Saut Lairds o’ Dunseore (The). Lords or gentlefolk who have only a name but no money. The tale is that the “puir wee lairds of Dunseore” clubbed together to buy a stone of salt, which was doled out to the subscribers in small spoonfuls, that no one should get more than his due quota.

Savour (2 syl.). One who lives in a wood (Greek, ὕδωρ, a forest; Latin, silva; Spanish, selva; Italian, selva; French, sauvage).

Save. To save appearances. To do something to obviate or prevent exposure or embarrassment.

Save the Mark. In archery when an archer shot well it was customary to cry out “God save the mark!”—i.e. prevent anyone coming after to hit the same mark and displace my arrow. Ironically it is said to a novice whose arrow is nowhere.

God save the mark! (1 Henry II., i. 6). Hotspur, apologising to the king for not sending the prisoners according to command, says the messenger was a “popinjay,” who made him mad with his unmanly ways, and who talked “like a waiting gentlewoman of guns, drums, and wounds (God save the mark!)”—meaning that he himself had been in the brunt of battle, and it would be sad indeed if “his mark” was displaced by this court butterfly. It was an ejaculation of derision and contempt.

So (in Othello, i. 1) Iago says he was “his Moonship’s ancient; bless the mark!” expressive of derision and contempt.

In like manner (in The Merchant of Venice, ii. 2), Launcelot Gobbo says his master [Shylock] is a kind of devil, “God bless the mark!”

So (in The Ring and the Book) Browning says:

The sacred and superior. Save the mark!”

The Observer (Oct. 26, 1894) speaks of “the comic opera (save the mark!) that have lately been before us.” An ejaculation of derision and contempt.

And Mr. Chamberlain (in his speech, September 5th, 1894) says:

“The policy of this government, which calls itself (God save the mark!) an English government....

Sometimes it refers simply to the perverted natural order of things, as “travelling by night and resting (save the mark!) by day.” (U. S. Magazine, October, 1894.)

“...and sometimes it is an ejaculated prayer to avert the ill omens of an observation, as in Romeo and Juliet where the nurse says:

“I saw the wound, I saw the wound with mine eyes (God save the mark!) upon his manly breast.”

Savoir Faire (French). Ready wit; skill in getting out of a scrape; hence “Vie de son savoir-faire,” to live by one’s wits; “Avoir du savoir-faire,” to be up to snuff, to know a thing or two.

“...he had great confidence in his savoir-faire.”—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxxiv.

Savoy (The). A precinct of the Strand, London, noted for the palace of Savoy, originally the seat of Peter, Earl of Savoy, who came to England to visit his niece Eleanor, wife of Henry III. At the death of the earl the house became the property of the queen, who gave it to her second son, Edmund (Earl of Lancaster), and from this period it was attached to the Duchy of Lancaster. When the Black Prince brought Jean le Bon, King of France, captive to London (1356), he lodged him in the Savoy Palace, where he remained till 1359, when he was removed to Somerton Castle, in Lincolnshire. In 1360 he was lodged in the Tower; but, two months afterwards, was allowed to return to France on certain conditions. These conditions being violated by the royal hostages, Jean voluntarily returned to London, and had his old quarters again assigned to him, and died in 1384. The rebels under Wat Tyler burnt down the old palace in 1381; but it was rebuilt in 1505 by Henry VII., and converted into a hospital for the poor, under the name of St. John’s Hospital. Charles II. used it for wounded soldiers and sailors. St. Mary-le-Savoy or the Chapel of St. John still stands in the precinct, and has recently been restored.

N.B. Here, in 1662, was established the first flint-glass manufactory.

Saw. In Christian art an attribute of St. Simon and St. James the Less, in allusion to the tradition of their being sawn to death in martyrdom.

Sawdust Parlance (In). Circus parlance. Of course, the allusion is to the custom of sitting sawdust over the arena to prevent the horses from slipping.
Sawny

Sawny or Sandy. A Scotchman; a contraction of "Alexander."

Saxifrage. So called because its tender rootlets will penetrate the hardest rock, and break it up.

Saxon Castles.

Alnwick Castle, given to Ivo de Vesey by the Conqueror.

Bamborough Castle (Northumberland), the palace of the kings of Northumberland, and built by King Ida, who began to reign 559; now converted into charity schools and signal-stations.

Carisbrook Castle, enlarged by Fitz-Osborne, five centuries later.

Conisborough Castle (York).

Goodrich Castle (Herefordshire).

Kenilworth Castle, built by Kenelm, King of Mercia. Kenil-worth means Kenhelm's dwelling.

Richmond Castle (York), belonging to the Saxon earl Edwin, given by the Conqueror to his nephew Alan, Earl of Bretagne; a ruin for three centuries. The keep remains.

Rochester Castle, given to Odo, natural brother of the Conqueror.

Saxon Characteristics (architectural).

(1) The quoining consists of a long stone set at the corner, and a short one lying on it and bonding into the wall.

(2) The use of large heavy blocks of stone in some parts, while the rest is built of Roman bricks.

(3) An arch with straight sides to the upper part instead of curves.

(4) The absence of buttresses.

(5) The use in windows of rude balusters.

(6) A rude round staircase west of the tower, for the purpose of access to the upper floors.

(7) Rude carvings in imitation of Roman work. (Rickman.)

Saxon Duke (in Hadriana). John Frederick, Duke of Saxony, a very copulent man. When taken prisoner, Charles V. said, "I have gone hunting many a time, but never saw I such a swine before."

Saxon English. The "Lord's Prayer" is almost all of it Anglo-Saxon. The words trespasses, trespass, and temptation are of Latin origin. The substitution of "debts" and "debtors" (as "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors") is objectionable. Perhaps "Forgive us our wrongdoings, as we forgive them who do wrong to us" would be less objectionable. The latter clause, "lead us not into temptation," is far more difficult to convert into Anglo-Saxon. The best suggestion I can think of is "lead us not in the ways of sinners," but the real meaning is "put us not to the test." We have the word assay (Assay us not), which would be an excellent translation, but the word is not a familiar one.

Saxon Relics.

The church of Earl's Barton (Northamptonshire). The tower and west doorway.

The church of St. Michael's (St. Albans), erected by the Abbot of St. Albans in 948.

The tower of Bosham church (Sussex).

The east side of the dark and principal cloisters of Westminster Abbey, from the college dormitory on the south to the chapter-house on the north. Edward the Confessor's chapel in Westminster Abbey, now used as the Pix office.

The church of Daruth (Kent) contains some windows of manifest Saxon architecture.

With many others, some of which are rather doubtful.

Saxon Shore. The coast of Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Kent, Sussex, and Hampshire, where were castles and garrisons, under the charge of a count or military officer, called Comites Littorius Saxonici per Britanniam.

Fort Brandonum (Brancaster) was on the Norfolk coast.

Carumnumnum (Burgh) was on the Suffolk coast.

Othamna (Egham) was on the Essex coast.

Regulnum (Revelver), Ratapius (Richborough), Dibirs (Dover), P. Lomanaus (Lyme), were on the Kentish coast.

Andechia (Hasting or Penzance), Forta (Worthing) were on the Sussex coast.

Say. To take the say. To taste meat or wine before it is presented, in order to prove that it is not poisoned. The phrase was common in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

"Nor deem it meet that you to him convey The proffered bowl, unless you taste the say."
Rose: Orlando Furioso, xxi. 61.

Shirri (Italian). A police-force which existed in the pope's dominions. They were domiciled in private houses.

"He points them out to his shirri and armed ruffians."—The Daily Telegraph.

Scoevola [left-handed]. So Caius Mucius was called, because when he entered the camp of Porsenna as a spy, and was taken before the king, he deliberately held his hand over a lamp.
Scaffold 1108  Scapegoat till it was burnt off, to show the Etruscan that he would not shrink from torture.

Scaffold, Scaffolding. A temporary gallery for workmen. In its secondary sense it means the postulates and rough scheme of a system or sustained story. (French, échafaud, échafaudage.) (See CINER.)

Scaglione. Imitation marble, like the pillars of the Pantheon, London. The word is from the Italian scaglia (the dust and chips of marble); it is so called because the substance (which is gypsum and Flanders glue) is studded with chips and dust of marble.

Scales. The Koran says, at the judgment day everyone will be weighed in the scales of the archangel Gabriel. His good deeds will be put in the scale called "Light," and his evil ones in the scale called "Darkness;" after which they will have to cross the bridge Al Serât, not wider than the edge of a scimitar. The faithful will pass over in safety, but the rest will fall into the dreary realms of Jehennam.

Scallop Shell. Emblem of St. James of Compostella, adopted, says Erasmus, because the shore of the adjacent sea abounds in them. Pilgrims used them for cup, spoon, and dish; hence the punning crest of the Disington family is a scallop shell. On returning home, the pilgrim placed his scallop shell in his hat to command admiration, and adopted it in his coat-armour. (Danish, selp, a shell; French, escargo.)

"He will give thee a safter's staff of ivory and a scallop-shell of beaten gold."—The Old Wine Tote. (1585.)

Scalloped [scallopt]. Having an edge like that of a scallop shell.

Scammando's Rule. The jointed two-foot rule used by builders, and invented by Vincent Scammando, the famous Italian architect. (1540-1609.)

Scamp [qui eis ex campo]. A deserter from the field; one who decamps without paying his debts. S' privative and camp. (See SNOB.)

Scandal means properly a pitfall or snare laid for an enemy; hence a stumbling-block, and morally an aspersion. (Greek, skandalon.)

"We preach Christ crucified, unto the Jews a scandal."—1 Cor. i. 23.

The Hill of Scandal. So Milton calls the Mount of Olives, because King Solomon built thereon "an high place for Chemosah, the abomination of Moab; and for Moloch, the abomination of the children of Ammon." (1 Kings xi. 7.)

Scandal-broth. Tea. The reference is to the gossip held by some of the womenkind over their "cups which cheer but not inebriate." Also called "Chatter-broth."

"I proposed to my venerable visitor . . . to summon my . . . housekeeper . . . with the teacup; but he rejected my proposal with disdain. . . . No scandal-broth," he exclaimed, "No unkind woman's chatter for me."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak (Peveril of the Peak.)

Scandalum Magnatum [scandal of the magnates]. Words in derogation of peers, judges, and other great officers of the realm. What St. Paul calls "speaking evil of dignities."

Scanderbeg. A name given by the Turks to George Castriota, the patriot chief of Epirus. The word is a corruption of Iskander-beg, Prince Alexander (1414-1467).

Scanderbeg's Sword must have Scanderbeg's Arm—i.e. None but Ulysses can draw Ulysses' bow. Scanderbeg is a corruption of Iskander-beg (Alexander the Great), not the Macedonian, but George Castriota, Prince of Albania, so called by the Turks. Mahomet wanted to see his scimitar, but when presented no one could draw it; whereupon the Turkish emperor sent it back as an imposition; but Iskanderbeg replied, he had only sent his majesty the sword without sending the arm that drew it. (See ROBIN HOOD.)

Scandinavia. Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Iceland. Pliny speaks of Scandia as an island.

Scant-of-grace (A). A madcap; a wild, disorderly, graceless fellow.

"You, a gentleman of birth and breeding, . . . associate yourself with a sort of scant-of-grace, as men call me."—Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, lit.

Scantling, a small quantity, is the French échantillon, a specimen or pattern.

"A scantling of wit."—Dryden.

Scapegoat. The Biaús or aborigines of Borneo observe a custom bearing a considerable resemblance to that of the scapegoat. They annually launch a small bark laden with all the sins and misfortunes of the nation, which, says Dr. Leyden, "they imagine will fall on the unhappy crew that first meets with it."

The scapegoat of the family. One made to bear the blame of the rest of the family: one always chidden and Scaphism. Locking up a criminal in the trunk of a tree, bored through so as just to admit the body. Five holes were made—one for the head, and the others for the hands and legs. These parts were anointed with honey to invite the wasps. In this situation the criminal would linger in the burning sun for several days. (Greek, skaphê, anything scooped out.)

Scapin. A “barber of Seville;” a knavish valet who makes his master his tool. (Molière: Les Fourberies de Scapin.)

Scaramouch. A braggart and fool, very valiant in words, but a poltroon. According to Dyché, the Italian postern-master, Tiberio Fiurelli, was surnamed Scaramouch Fiurelli. He came to England in 1673, and astonished John Bull with feats of agility.

"Stout Scaramouch with rush-lance rode in,
And ran a tilt with centaur Argolin."

_Troyens: The Silent Woman (Epilogue)._ Scaramouch Dress (A), in Molière’s time, was black from top to toe; hence he says, “Night has put on her ‘scaramouch dress.’”

Scarborough Warning. No warning at all; blow first, then warning. In Scarbrough robbers used to be dealt with in a very summary manner by a sort of Halifax gibbet-law, lynch-law, or an à la lanterne. Another origin is given of this phrase: It is said that Thomas Stafford, in the reign of Queen Mary, seized the castle of Scarbrough, not only without warning, but even before the townsfolk knew he was afoot (1557). (See GONE UP.)

"This term Scarbhour-warning grew, some say,
By basty hanging for mask robbery there,
Who that was met, but suspect in that way, Straight he was trust up, whatever he were."

J. Heywood.

Scarfet. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow (Isa. i. 18). The allusion is to the scarlet fillet tied round the head of the scapegoat.

Though your sins be as scarlet as the fillet on the head of the goat to which the high priest has transferred the sins of the whole nation, yet shall they be forgiven and wiped out.

Scarlet (Will). One of the companions of Robin Hood.

Scarlet Coat. Worn by fox-hunters. (See Red Coat.)

Scarlet Woman. Some controversial Protestants apply the words to the Church of Rome, and some Romanists, with equal “good taste,” apply them to London. The Book of Revelation says, “It is that great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth,” and terms the city “Babylon” (chap. xvii.).

Scavenger’s Daughter. An instrument of torture invented by Sir William Skevington, lieutenant of the Tower in the reign of Henry VIII. As Skevington was the father of the instrument, the instrument was his daughter.

Socatta. Anglo-Saxon for “money,” or a little silver coin. A socat was an Anglo-Saxon coin.

Scene Painters. The most celebrated are—

Inigo Jones, who introduced the first appropriate decorations for masques.

D’Avenant, who produced perspective scenes in 1656, for The Siege of Rhodes.

Betterton was the first to improve the scenic effects in “Dorset Gardens;” his artist was Streater.

John Rich may be called the great reformer of stage scenery in “Covent Garden.”

Richards, secretary of the Royal Academy; especially successful in The Maid of the Mill. His son was one of the most celebrated of our scene-painters.

Philip James de Loutherbourg was the greatest scene-painter up to Garrick’s time. He produced the scenes for The Winter’s Tale, at the request of that great actor.

John Kemble engaged William Capon, a pupil of Noviosielio, to furnish him with scenery for Shakespeare’s historic plays.

Patrick Nasmyth, in the North, produced several unrivalled scenes.

Stanfield is well known for his scene of Aes and Galatea’s.

William Beverley is the greatest scene-painter of modern times.

Frank Hayman, Thomas Dall, John Scene Plot

Laguerre, William Hogarth, Robert Dighton, Charles Dibdin, David Roberts, Grieve, and Phillips have all aided in improving scene-painting.

Scene Plot. (See Plot.)

Scene. We are not yet on the right scent. We have not yet got the right clue. The allusion is to dogs following game by their scent.

Sceptic (Greek) means one who thinks for himself, and does not receive on another's testimony. Pyrrho founded the philosophic sect called "Sceptics," and Epictetus combated their dogmas. In theology we apply the word to those who will not accept Revelation.

Sceptre. That of Agamemnon is the most noted. Homer says it was made by Vulcan, who gave it to the son of Saturn. It then passed successively to Jupiter, to Mercury, to Pelops, to Atreus (2 syl.), to Thyestes (3 syl.), and then to Agamemnon. It was found at Phocis, whither it had been taken by Electra. It was looked on with great reverence, and several miracles are attributed to it. It was preserved for many years after the time of Homer, but ultimately disappeared.

Scheherazade [She-hë-ra-zay-de]. Daughter of the Grand Vizier of the Indies. The Sultan Schahriar, having discovered the infidelity of his sultana, resolved to marry a fresh wife every night and have her strangled at daybreak. Scheherazade entreated to become his wife, and so amused him with tales for a thousand and one nights that he pardoned his cruel decree, bestowed his affection on his amiable and talented wife, and called her "the liberator of the sex." (Arabian Nights.)

Scheltrum. An army drawn up in a circle instead of in a square.

Scheme is something entertained. Scheme is a Greek word meaning what is had or held (schevo); and entertain is the Latin teneso, to have or hold. also.

Schiedam. Hollands gin, so called from Schiedam, a town where it is principally manufactured.

Schilte. (See Shites.)

Schlemihl (Peter). The name of a man who sold his shadow to the devil, in Chamisso's tale so called. It is a synonym for any person who makes a desperate and silly bargain.

Skelastic. Anselm of Leon, Doctor Scholasticus. (1050-1117.)

Epiphanius the Scholastic. An Italian scholar. (Sixth century.)

Scholastic Divinity. Divinity subjected to the test of reason and argument, or at least "darkened by the counsel of words." The Athanasian creed is a favourable specimen of this attempt to reduce the mysteries of religion to "right reason;" and the attempts to reconcile the Mosaic cosmogony with modern geology smack of the same school.

Schools.
The six old schools: Eton, Harrow, Winchester, Charterhouse, Westminster, and Rugby.

Some add St. Paul's, Merchant Taylors', and Shrewsbury.
The six modern schools: Marlborough, Wellington, Clifton, Cheltenham, Repton, and Haileybury.

Charterhouse has been removed to the hills of Surrey.

St. Paul's has migrated to the West End.

Schoolmaster Abroad (The). Lord Brougham said, in a speech (Jan. 29, 1828) on the general diffusion of education, and of intelligence arising therefrom, "Let the soldier be abroad, if he will; he can do nothing in this age. There is another personage abroad . . . the schoolmaster is abroad; and I trust to him, armed with his primer, against the soldier in full military array."

Schoolmen. Certain theologians of the Middle Ages; so called because they lectured in the cloisters or cathedral schools founded by Charlemagne and his immediate successors. They followed the fathers, from whom they differed in reducing every subject to a system, and may be grouped under three periods—First Period. Pilgrims (from ninth to twelfth century).

1. Pierre Abclard (1079-1142).
2. Placius Albinus Alcuin (735-804).
4. Anselm. Doctor Scholasticus. (1050-1117.)
5. Berenga'rius of Tours (1000-1088).
8. Lanfranc, Archbishop of Canterbury. (1005-1089.)
10. John Roscelinus (eleventh century.)
Second Period, or Golden Age of Scholasticism. ARISTOTELIANS (thirteenth and fourteenth centuries).

(1) Alain de Lille. Universal Doctor. (1114-1203.)
(2) Albertus Magnus, of Padua. (1193-1280.)
(3) Thomas Aquinas. The Angelic Doctor. (1224-1274.)
(6) Alexander of Hales. Irrefragable Doctor. (Died 1245.)
(7) John Duns Scotus. The Subtle Doctor. (1265-1308.)

Third Period. Nominalism Revived.

To the seventeenth century.

(1) Thomas de Bradwardine. The Profound Doctor. (1290-1348.)
(2) John Buridan (1295-1360.)
(3) William Durandus de Porçain. The Most Resolving or Resolute Doctor. (Died 1332.)
(4) Giles, Archbishop of Bourges. The Doctor with Good Foundation.
(5) Gregory of Rimini. The Authentic Doctor. (Died 1357.)
(6) Robert Holkot. An English divine.
(7) Raymond Lully. The Illuminated Doctor. (1234-1315.)
(8) Francis Mairon, of Digne, in Provence.
(9) William Occam. The Singular or Invincible Doctor. (Died 1347.)
(10) François Suarez, the last of the schoolmen. (1548-1617.)

Schoolmistress (The), by Shenstone, is designed for a “portrait of Sarah Lloyd,” the dame who first taught the poet himself. She lived in a thatched house before which grew a birch tree.

Soceo. (See Cean.)

Science. The Gay Science or “Gay Saber.” The poetry of the Troubadours, and in its extended meaning poetry generally.

Science Persecuted.

(1) Anaxagoras of Clazoménæ held opinions in natural science so far in advance of his age that he was accused of impiety, thrown into prison, and condemned to death. Pericles, with great difficulty, got his sentence commuted to fine and banishment.
(2) Virgilius, Bishop of Salzburg, denounced as a heretic by St. Boniface for asserting the existence of antipodes. (Died 784.)

(2) Galileo was imprisoned by the Inquisition for maintaining that the earth moved. In order to get his liberty he “abjured the heresy,” but as he went his way whispered half-audibly, “E pur si muove” (“but nevertheless it does move”). (1644-1642.)

(4) Gebert, who introduced algebra into Christendom, was accused of dealing in the black arts, and shunned as a magician.

(5) Friar Bacon was excommunicated and imprisoned for diabolical knowledge, chiefly on account of his chemical researches. (1214-1294.)

(6) Dr. Faust, the German philosopher, suffered in a similar way in the sixteenth century.

(7) John Dee. (See Dee.)
(8) Robert Grosseteste. (See Grosste.)

(9) Averroës, the Arabian philosopher, who flourished in the twelfth century, was denounced as a heretic and degraded solely on account of his great eminence in natural philosophy and medicine. (He died 1226.)

(10) Andrew Crose, electrician, who asserted that he had seen certain animals of the genus Arvus, which had been developed by him out of inorganic elements. Crose was accused of impiety, and was shunned as a “profane man,” who wanted to arrogate to himself the creative power of God. (1784-1855.)

Scienter Nesciens et Sapientia Indoctus was how Gregory the Great described St. Benedict.

Solo’s Blind Old Bard. Homer. Scio is the modern name of Chios, in the Ægean Sea.

“Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodes, Argos, Athens, your just right to call Homer your son you must settle between ye.”

Scipio dismissed the Iberian Maid (Paradise Regained, ii.). Referring to the tale that the conqueror of Spain not only refused to see a beautiful princess who had fallen into his power after the capture of New Carthage, but that he restored her to her parents, and actually gave her great presents that she might marry the man to whom she had been betrothed. (See Continence.)

The Lucian Scipio. Nuncio.

“Tus Lucian Scipio well may speak his name, But nobler Nuncio shines a greater name; On earth’s green bosom, or on ocean’s grey, A greater never shall the sun survey.”

Comm: Eutoci, Jr. viii.
Scissors to Grind. Work to do; purpose to serve.

"That the Emperor of Austria [In the Servian and Bulgarian war, 1885] has his own scissors to grind goes without saying; but for the present it is Russia who keeps the ball rolling."—Newspaper paragraphs, November, 1885.

Sclavon'ic. The language spoken by the Russians, Servians, Poles, Bohe- mians, etc.; anything belonging to the Slav.

Soebelium. A very fruitful land, but the inhabitants exceeded the cannibals for cruelty, the Persians for pride, the Egyptians for luxury, the Cretans for lying, the Germans for drunkenness, and all nations together for a generality of vices." In vengeance the gods changed all the people into beasts: drunkards, into swine, the lecherous into goats, the proud into peacocks, scolds into magpies, gamblers into asses, musicians into song-birds, the envious into dogs, the women into milk-cows, jesters into monkeys, dancers into squirrels, and misers into moles. Four of the Champions of Christendom restored them to their normal forms by quenching the fire of the Golden Cave." (The Seven Champions of Christendom, iii. 10.)

Scene (pron. Skoon). Edward I. removed to London, and placed in Westminster Abbey, the great stone upon which the kings of Scotland were wont to be crowned. This stone is still preserved, and forms the support of Edward the Confessor’s chair, which the British monarchs occupy at their coronation. It is said to have been brought from Ireland by Fergus, son of Eric, who led the Dalriads to the shores of Argyllshire. (See TANIST-STONE.)

Scis. "Ni falsat fatum, Scotti, quacunque locutum Invicent lapidem, regnare tenetur Sibem."

Words of St. John the Baptist, to Edward.

"Unless the fate is faithless found
And prophet’s voice be vain,
Where’er is placed this stone, e’en there
The Scottish race shall reign.

Score. A reckoning; to make a reckoning; so called from the custom of marking off "runs" or "lengths," in games by the score feet. (See NUB, SPELL, TALLY.)

Scornful Dogs will eat dirty puddings. In emergency men will do many things they would scorn to do in easy circumstances. Darius and Alexander will drink dirty water and think it nectar when distressed with thirst. Kings and queens, to make good their escape in times of danger, will put on the most menial disguise. And hungry men will not be over particular as to the food they eat.

"'All nonsense and pride,' said the Laird, ... Scornful dogs will eat dirty puddings."—Sir W. Scott: Roderick Dhu, chap. xi.

Scor'pion. It is said that scorpions have an oil which is a remedy against their stings. The toad also is said to have an antidote to its "venom."

"'Tis true, a scorpion’s oil is said
To cure the wounds the venom made,
And weapons dressed with salves restore
And heal the hurts they gave before.'

Burn: Hudibras, ii. 2.

Scor'pions. Whips armed with metal or knotted cords.

"My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions."—1 Kings xii. 11.

Scot. The same as Scythian in etymology; the root of both is Sct. The Greeks had no r, and would change t into th, making the root skth, and by adding a phonetic vowel we get Skuth-ai (Scythians), and Skoth-ai (Scots). The Welsh disliked s at the beginning of a word, and would change it to yn; they would also changed or to g, and th to d; whence the Welsh root would be ysgod. Once more, the Saxons would cut off the Welsh y, and change the g back again to c, and the d to t, converting the Ysgod to Scot. N.B. Before the third century Scotland was called Caledonia or Alban.

Scot-free. Tax-free, without payment. (See below.)

Scot and Lot. A levy on all subjects according to their ability to pay. Scot means tribute or tax, and lot means allotment or portion allotted. To pay scot and lot, therefore, is to pay the ordinary tributes and also the personal tax allotted to you.

Scots Greys. The 2nd Dragoons, the colour of whose horses is grey. (Heavy-armed.)

Scots who has. Words by Robert Burns, to the music of an old Scotch tune called Hey Tuttie Tuttie. The Land o’ the Leal is to the same tune.

Scotch. The people or language of Scotland.

Highland Scotch. Scottish Gaelic.

Lowland Scotch. The English dialect spoken in the lowlands of Scotland.

Broad Scotch. The official language of Scotland in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. Sometimes used in novels and in verse.

Scotch Breakfast (A). A substantial breakfast of sundry sorts of good things to eat and drink. The Scotch are famous for their breakfast-tables and tea-fights. No people in the world are more hospitable.

Scotch Mist. A thick fog with drizzling rain, common in Scotland.

"A Scotch fog will wet an Englishman through."
—Common saying.

Scotch Pint (A). A Scotch pint = 2 English quarts.

Scotch Pound (A). was originally of the same value as an English pound, but after 1355 it gradually depreciated, until in 1600 it was but one-twelfth of the value of an English pound, that is about 1s. 8d.

Scotch Shilling. = a penny sterling. The Scotch pound in 1600 was worth 20d., and as it was divided into twenty shillings, it follows that a Scotch shilling was worth one penny English.

Scot'ls. Now applied poetically to Scotland, but at one time Ireland was so called. Hence Claudius says—

"When Scots came thundering from the Irish shores,
And ocean trebled, struck with hostile oars."

Scostita. Followers of Duns Scotus, who maintained the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception in opposition to Thomas Aquinas.

"Scotists and Thomists now in peace remain."—Pope: Essay on Criticism.

Scotland. St. Andrew is the patron saint of this country, and tradition says that the remains of the apostle were brought by Regulus, a Greek monk, to the eastern coast of Fife in 368. (See Rule, St.)

Scotland a pet of England. Edward I. founded his claim to the lordship of Scotland on these four grounds:—(1) the ancient chroniclers, who state that Scotch kings had occasionally paid homage to the English sovereigns from time immemorial. Extracts are given from St. Alban, Marianus Scotus, Ralph of Diceto, Roger of Hoveden, and William of Malmesbury. (2) From charters of Scotch kings: as those of Edgar, son of Malcolm, William, and his son Alexander II. (3) From papal rescripts: as those of Honorius III., Gregory IX., and Clement IV. (4) By an extract from The Life and Miracles of St. John of Beverley. The tenor of this extract is quite suited to this Dictionary of Fable. In the reign of Adelstan the Scots invaded England and committed great devastation. Adelstan went to drive them back, and, on reaching the Tyne, found that the Scotch had retreated. At midnight St. John of Beverley appeared to him, and bade him cross the river at daybreak, for he "should dissimilitude the foe." Adelstan obeyed the vision, and reduced the whole kingdom to subjection. On reaching Dunbar on his return march, he prayed that some sign might be vouchsafed to him to satisfy all ages that "God, by the intercession of St. John, had given him the kingdom of Scotland." Then struck he with his sword the basaltic rocks near the coast, and the blade sank into the solid dint "as if it had been butter," cleaving it asunder for "an ell or more," and the cleft remains even to the present hour. Without doubt there is a fissure in the basalt, and how could it have come there except in the way recorded above? And how could a sword cut three feet deep into a hard rock without miraculous aid? And what could such a miracle have been vouchsafed for, except to show that Adelstan was rightful lord of Scotland? And if Adelstan were lord, of course Edward should be so likewise. Q. E. D. (Rymer: Foederum, vol. i. pt. ii. p. 771.)

Scotland Yard. (London). So called from a palace built there for the reception of the kings of Scotland when they visited England. Pennant tells us it was originally given by King Edgar to Kenneth of Scotland when he came to London to pay homage.

Scotland Yard. The headquarters of the Metropolitan Police, whence all public orders to the force proceed.

"Mr Walpole has only to speak the word in Scotland Yard, and the parks will be cleared."—Pall Mall Gazette.

Scott. The Walter Scott of Belgium. Hendrick Conscience. (Born 1812.)

The Southern Scott. Lord Byron calls Ariosto the Sir Walter Scott of Italy. (Childe Harold, iv. 40.)

Scotus (Duns). Died 1309. His epitaph at Cologne is—

"Scotia me genuit, Anglia me suscepit, Gallia me docuit, Colonia me tenet."

Source of Christians. Noured-din-Mahmid of Damascus. (1116-1174.)

Source of God. (1) Attila, king of the Huns. A. P. Stanley says the term was first applied to Attila in the Hungarian Chronicles. In Isidore's Chronicle the Huns are called Virga Dei. (*, 434-435.)

(2) Gen'seric, king of the Vandals, who went about like a destroying angel "against all those who had, in his opinion, incurred the wrath of God."
Scourge of Princes

(Probably the word Godegesal (Goth. God-gësat) was the common title of the contemporary kings, like our Deus Gratid. (Ch. 429-447.)

Scourge of Princes. Pietro Are-ttino was so called for his satires. (1492-1556.)

Scouring. I 'scaped a scouring—a disease. Scouring is a sort of flux in horses and cattle. (Latin, Malum praeter ech; French, L'échapper belle.)

Scowerers. A set of rakes in the eighteenth century, who, with the Nic'kers and Mbrokes, committed great annoyances in London and other large towns.

"Who has not heard the Scowerers' midnight fame? Who has not trembled at the Mohocks' name? Was there a watchman took his hourly rounds. Safe from their blows and new-invented wounds?"

Gay: Trivia, III.

Scrape. I've got into a sad scrape—a great difficulty. We use rub, squeeze, pinch, and scrape to express the same idea. Thus Shakespeare says, "Ay, there's the rub" (difficulty); "I have got into tribulation" (a squeeze, from the Latin tribula, to squeeze); "I am come to a pinch" (a difficulty). Some think the word a corrupt contraction of escapade, but Robert Chambers thinks it is borrowed from a term in golf. A rabbit's burrow in Scotland, he says, is called a "scrape," and if the ball gets into such a hole it can hardly be played. The rules of the game allow something to the player who "gets into a scrape." (Book of Days.)

Scrape an Acquaintance (Th.). The Gentleman's Magazine says that Hadrian went one day to the public baths, and saw an old soldier, well known to him, scraping himself with a potsherd for want of a flesh-brush. The emperor sent him a sum of money. Next day Hadrian found the bath crowded with soldiers scraping themselves with potsherds, and said, "Scrape on, gentlemen, but you'll not scrape acquaintance with me." (N. S., xxxix. 230.)

Scrape. Old Scratch. Scrat, the house-demon of the North. (Icelandic, scruti, an imp.) (See出す, 尼. etc.)

Scrape (A.). One who in a race starts from the scratch, other runners in the same race being a yard or so in advance. The scratch runner generally is one who has already won a similar race.

Coming up to the scratch—up to the mark; about to do what we want him to do. In prize-fighting a line is scratched on the ground, and the toe of the fighter must come up to the scratch.

Scratch Cradle. A game played with a piece of string stretched across the two hands. The art is so to cross the thread as to produce a resemblance to something, and for another so to transfer it to his own hands as to change the former figure into some other resemblance. A corruption of "cratch cradle" (the manger cradle), because the first figure represents a cradle, supposed to be the cradle of the infant Jesus.

Scratch Crew (A.), in a boat-race, means a random crew; not a regular crew.

Scratch Eleven (A.), or "scratch team," in cricket, means eleven men picked up anyhow; not a regular team.

Scratch Race (A.). A race of horses, men, boys, etc., without restrictions as to age, weight, previous winnings, etc.

Scratched. A horse is said to be scratched when its name is scratched out of the list of runners. "Tomboy was scratched for the Derby at ten a.m. on Wednesday," and no bet on that horse made subsequently would be valid.

Screw (A.), meaning a small quantity, is in allusion to the habit of putting a small quantity of small articles into a "screw of paper."

An old screw. One who keeps his money tight, and doles it out in screws or small quantities.

To put on the screw. To press for payment, as a screw presses by gradually-increasing pressure.

Raised your screw. Raised your wages.

"Has Tom got his screw raised? said Milton."—Truth: Quer. Story, 18th February, 1893.

Screw Loose (A.). Something amiss. The allusion is to joinery kept together by screws.

Screw Plot (The). 1708, when Queen Anne went to St. Paul's to offer thanksgivings for the victory of Oudenarde. The tale is that the plotters took out certain screw-bolts from the beams of the cathedral, that the roof might fall on the queen and her suite and kill them.

"Some of your Machiavelian crew From heavy roof of Paul Most treacherously stole every screw, To make that fabric fall. And so to catch her Majesty, And all her friends beguile."—Plut. Upon Plot (about 1690).
Screwed. Intoxicated. A playful synonym of tight, which again is a playful synonym of blown out.

Screwed on Right. His head was screwed on right. He was clear-headed and right-thinking.

"His heart was in the right place . . . and his head was screwed on right, too."—Baldwood: Bodies under Arms, 21.

Screwed on the wrong way. Crotchetly, ungainly, not right.

Scribe (1 syl.), in the New Testament, means a doctor of the law. Thus, in Matthew xxii. 35, we read, "Then one of them, which was a lawyer, asked Him, Which is the great commandment of the law?" Mark (xii. 29) says, "One of the scribes came and asked Him, Which is the first commandment of all?"

In the Old Testament the word is used more widely. Thus Serah is called the scribe (secretary) of David (2 Sam. viii. 17); in the Book of Chronicles "Jael the scribe" was an officer in the king's army, who reviewed the troops and called over the muster-roll. Jonathan, Baruch, Gemariah, etc., who were princes, were called scribes. Ezra, however, called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," accords with the New Testament usage of the word.

Scribilemus (Martimus). A merciless satire on the false taste in literature current in the time of Pope. Cornelius Scribilemus, the father of Martin, was a pedant, who entertained all sorts of absurdities about the education of his son. Martin grew up a man of capacity; but though he had read everything, his judgment was vile and taste atrocious.

Scrimmage. A tussle; a slight battle. From the obsolete scrimer, a fencer; French, escrimeur; same root as escrimouch, our skirmish.

"Prince Guftar at this skrimgago, for all his pride.
Fled full fast and sought no guide"—MS. Landsdowne, 200, f. 10.

Scriptorès Tres (the three writers). Meaning Richard of Cirencester, Gildas Badonocus, and Nennius of Bangor.

Julius Bertram, professor of English at Copenhagen, professed to have discovered the first of these treatises in 1747, in the royal library of that city. Its subject is De Situ Britanniae, and in 1767 he published it along with the two other treatises, calling the whole The Three Writers on the Ancient History of the British Nations. Bertram's forgery was completely exposed by J. E. Mayor, in his preface to Ricardii de Cirencetria Speculum Historiale. (See Sanchoniatôch.)

Scriptorium. An apartment in every abbey where writers transcribed service-books for the choir and books for the library. (Warton.)

Scriptures. (See Seven Bibles.)

Soudamore (Sir). The lover of Amoret, whom he finally marries. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii. iv.)

Souding under Bare Poles. In lewman's language to scud means to drive before a gale with no sails, or only just enough to keep the vessel ahead of the sea; "souding under bare poles" is being driven by the wind so violently that no sail at all is set. Figuratively it means to cut and run so precipitately as to leave no trace behind.

Soulabogue Massacre. In the Irish rebellion of 1798 Scoulabogue House, Wexford, was seized by the rebels and used for a prison. Some thirty or forty prisoners confined in it were brought in and shot in cold blood, when the news of a repulse of the rebels at New Ross arrived (5th June, '98). The barn at the back of the house was filled with prisoners and set on fire, and Taylor, in his history, written at the time and almost on the spot, puts the number of victims at 184, and he gives the names of several of them.

Soulas. (See Diamond . . . )

Sculpture. Fathers of French sculpture.

Jean Goujon (1510-1572).
Germain Pilon (1515-1600).

Soutch. The scrappings of hides; also refuse of flax. (English, scotch, to cut; Saxon, seeadan.) We have the word in the expression, "You have scotched the snake, not killed it."

"About half a mile from the southern outfall are two manufactories, where the refuse from the London taneries, known as soutch, is operated upon."—The Times.
Scuttle. To scuttle a ship is to bore a hole in it in order to make it sink. Rather strangely, this word is from the same root as our word shut or bolt (Saxon scytel, a lock, bolt, or bar). It was first applied to a hole in a roof with a door or lid, then to a hatchway in the deck of a ship with a lid, then to a hole in the bottom of a ship plugged up; then comes the verb to pull out the plug, and leave the hole for the admission of water.

Scuttle (ot coals, etc.) is the Anglo-Saxon, scytel, a basket.

"The Norwegians ... in every direction are coming ... with their scuttles swinging on their arms. In Bergen fish is never carried in any other way" — H. H. Jackson: Glimpses of Three Conibles, p. 335.

Scuttle Out (To). To sneak off quickly, to skedaddle, to cut and run. Anglo-Saxon scytel, to flee precipitately; scytel, an arrow; scytel, a darting fish, like the trout; scytel, an arrow, etc.

Scylla, daughter of Nisos, promised to deliver Megara into the hands of Minos. To redeem this promise she had to cut off a golden hair on her father’s head, which she effected while he was asleep. Minos, her lover, despised her for this treachery, and Scylla threw herself from a rock into the sea. At death she was changed into a lark, and Nisos into a hawk. Scylla turned into a rock by Circe has no connection with the daughter of Nisos.

"Threk of Scylla’s fote.
Chang’d to a bird, and sent to fly in air.
She dearly pays for Nisos’ injured hair.
By Pope: Rape of the Lock, i, iii.

Scylla. Glauce, a fisherman, was in love with Scylla; but Circe, out of jealousy, changed her into a hideous monster, and set dogs and wolves to bark round her incessantly. On this Scylla threw herself into the sea and became a rock. It is said that the rock Scylla somewhat resembles a woman at a distance, and the noise of the waves dashing against it is not unlike the barking of dogs and wolves.

"Glaucis, lost to joy,
Cries in his love by vengeful Circe’s hate.
Attending wept his Scylla’s benignant fate.”

Camoes: Lusia, bk. vi.

Avoiding Scylla, he fell into Charybdis. Trying to avoid one error, he fell into another; or, trying to avoid one danger, he fell into another equally fatal. Scylla and Charybdis are two rocks between Italy and Sicily. In one was a cave where “Scylla dwelt,” and on the other Charybdis dwelt under a fig-tree. Ships which tried to avoid one were often wrecked on the other rock. It was Circe who changed Scylla into a frightful sea-monster, and Jupiter who changed Charybdis into a whirlpool.

"When I shun Scylla your father, I fall into Charybdis your mother."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i, i.

Between Scylla and Charybdis — between two difficulties or fatal works.

To fall from Scylla into Charybdis — out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Scythian or Tartarian Lamb (The). Agnus Scythicus, a kind of fern, called the borametz, or polypodium of Caythne. It is said to resemble a lamb, and even in some cases to be mistaken for one.

Scythian Defiance. When Darius approached Scythia, an ambassador was sent to his tent with a bird, a frog, a mouse, and five arrows, then left without uttering a word. Darius, wondering what was meant, was told by Gobrias it meant this: Either fly away like a bird, and hide your head in a hole like a mouse, or swim across the river, or in five days you will be laid prostrate by the Scythian arrows.

Sea. Any large collection of water, more or less enclosed; hence the expression “molten sea,” meaning the great brazen vessel which stood in Solomon’s temple (2 Chronicles iv. 5, and 1 Kings vii. 26). We have also the Mediterranean Sea, the Black Sea, the White Sea, the Red Sea, the Sea of Galilee, the Dead Sea, etc.; and even the Nile, the Euphrates, and the Tigris are sometimes called seas by the prophets. The world of water is the ocean. (Anglo-Saxon, saec.)

The Old Man of the Sea (Arabian Nights). A creature encountered by Sinbad the Sailor in his fifth voyage. This terrible Old Man contrived to get on the back of Sinbad, and would neither dismount again nor could he be shaken off. At last Sinbad gave him some wine to drink, which so intoxicated him that he relaxed his grip, and Sinbad made his escape.

At sea, Quite at sea. Wide of the mark; quite wrong; like a person in the open ocean without compass or chart.

Sea-blue Bird of March (The). The wheatear, not the kingfisher.

Sea-girt Isle

Glaucus, a fisherman of Boeotia, afterwards a marine deity. Ino, who threw herself from a rock into the sea, and was made a sea-goddess.

Neptune (2 syl.), king of the ocean. The Nereids (3 syl.) or Néréides (4 syl.), fifty in number.

Nereus (2 syl.) and his wife Doris. Their palace was at the bottom of the Mediterranean Sea. His hair was seaweeds. Océanos and his wife Thetys. Océanos was not god of the sea, but of the ocean, supposed to form a boundary round the world.

Oceanides (3 syl.). Daughters of Océanos.

Pâlémon, the Greek Portumnus. Portumnus, the protector of harbours. Poseidon (3 syl.), the Greek Neptune. Proteus (2 syl.), who assumed every variety of shape.

Sirens (The). Sea nymphs who charmed by song.

Tethys, wife of Océanos, and daughter of Uranus and Terra.

Thetis, a daughter of Nereus and mother of Achilleas.

Triton, son of Poseidon (3 syl.).

* The Naiads or Naiâdes (3 syl.) were river nymphs.

Sea-girt Isle. England. So called because, as Shakespeare has it, it is "hedgeed in with the main, that water-wall'd bulwark" (King John, ii. 1).

"This precious stone set in the silver sea, Which serves it in the office of a wall, Or as a moat defensive to a house, Against the envy of less happy lands." Shakespeare: King Richard II., ii. 1.

Sea-green Incorruptible (The). So Carlyle called Robespierre in his French Revolution.

"The sea is a short one, and may perhaps serve to qualify our judgment of the sea-green incorruptible." — Notes and Queries, September 19th, 1861, p. 239.

Sea Legs. He has got his sea legs. Is able to walk on deck when the ship is rolling; able to bear the motion of the ship without seasickness.

Sea Serpent. Pontoppidan, in his Natural History of Norway, speaks of sea serpents 600 feet long. The great sea serpent was said to have been seen off the coast of Norway in 1819, 1822, 1837. Hans Egede affirms that it was seen on the coast of Greenland in 1734. In 1815, 1817, 1819, 1833, and in 1869, it made its appearance near Boston. In 1841 it was "seen" by the crew of Her Majesty's frigate Dædalus, in the South Atlantic Ocean. In 1876 it was seen by the crew of the barque Pauline. Girth, nine feet.

Seaboard. That part of a country which borders on the sea; the coast-line. It should be seabord. (French, bord, the edge.)

Seal. The sire is called a bull, its females are cows, the offspring are called pups; the breeding-place is called a rookery, a group of young seals is called a pod. The male seal till it is full grown is called a bachelor. A colony of seals is called a herd. A sealer is a seal-hunter, seal-hunting is called sealing, and the seal trade sealerly.

Seamy Side (The). The "wrong" or worst side; as, the "seamy side of Australia," the "seamy side of life." Thus, in velvet, in Brussels carpets, in tapestry, etc., the "wrong" side shows the seams or threads of the pattern exhibited on the right side.

"You see the seamy side of human nature in its most seamy attire." — Review of R. Buchanan's play Alone in London, November, 1865.

"My present purpose is to call attention to the seamy side of the Australian colonies. There is, as we know, such a thing as cotton-laced satin; but the colonists take care to show us only the face of the goods." — Nineteenth Century, April, 1891, p. 324.

Seasons (The). In art. The four seasons have often been sculptured or painted by artists.

Poussin drew his symbolic characters from the Old Testament. Thus, Adam and Eve in Paradise represent Spring; Ruth in the cornfields represents Summer; Joshua and Caleb bringing grapes from the Land of Promise represent Autumn; and the Deluge represents Winter.

The Ancient Greeks characterised Spring by Mercury, Summer by Apollo, Autumn by Bacchus, and Winter by Hercules.

M. Girondet painted for the King of Spain four pictures, with allegoric character, from the Herculaneum.

Sebs'ra'im (4 syl.). Rabbis who lived after the Talmud was finished, and gave their judgment on traditionary difficulties (Ait derek sebaroth, "by way of opinion"). (Buxtorf.)

Sebastian (N.). Patron saint of archers, because he was bound to a tree and shot at with arrows. As the arrows stuck in his body, thick as pins in a pin-cushion, he was also made patron saint of pin-makers. And as he was a centurion, he is patron saint of soldiers.

The English St. Sebastian, St. Edmund, the martyr-king of East Anglia.
He gave himself up to his enemies under the hope of saving his people by this sacrifice. The Danes first scourged him with rods, and then, binding him to a tree, shot arrows at him, and finally cut off his head. A legend tells how a wolf guarded the head till it was duly interred. The monastery and cathedral of St. Edmundsbury were erected on the place of his burial.

Sebastianistes. Persons who believe that Dom Sebastian, who fell in the battle of Alcazarquivir in 1578, will return to earth, when Brazil will become the chief kingdom of the earth.

A similar tradition is attached to several other names.

Second. (See Two.)

Second-hand. Not new or original: what has already been the property of another: as, "second-hand books," "second-hand clothes," etc.

Second Sight. The power of seeing things invisible to others; the power of foreseeing future events by means of shadows thrown before them. Many Highlanders claim this power, which the ancient Gaels called shadow-sight (taiseachitaraugh).

"Nor less a' cuidh an optic sleuth,
And Scottish gift of second sight."—Tynnebull.

Second Wind (The), in running. All animals soon after the start get out of breath, but as the body becomes heated, breathing becomes more easy, and endures till fatigue produces exhaustion; this is called the second wind.

"That mysterious physical readjustment, known in animals as 'second breath,' came to the rescue of his faltering frame."—The Burton Experiment, chap. 1.

Second of Time (A). The sixtieth part of an hour was called by the Romans scrupulum, and the sixtieth part of a minute was scrupulum secundum.

Secondary Colours. (See under Colours.)

Secret de Polichinelle (Le). No secret at all. A secret known to all the world; old news. We have also "Hawker's News," "Piper's News." The secrets of Polichinelle are "stage whispers" told to all the audience.

"Entre nous, c'est qu'on appelle Le secret de polichinelle."—La Musettte, ii. 12.

Secular Clergy (The). The parish clergy who live in the world, in contradiction to monks, who live in monasteries, etc., out of the world. (Latin, ecclēsitiae.)

Secular Games. Those held by the Romans only once in a century. While the kings reigned they were held in the Campus Martius, in honour of Pluto and Proserpine, and were instituted in obedience to the Sibylline verses, with the promise that "the empire should remain in safety so long as this admonition was observed."

"Dulcissimi magnum
Tempus audimus
Quam Sibyllini monsēra versum."—Horace: Carmen Seculare, A. C.C., 737.

Sedan Chairs. So called from sedes (Latin, "a seat"). Their introduction into England is by Hume (vol. iv. 505) erroneously attributed to the Duke of Buckingham, who, it is said, gave great offence by employing men as beasts of burden. Sir S. Duncombe used one in 1634, when Buckingham was a boy, and we find it spoken of as far back as 1617. It was introduced into France (in 1617) by the Marquis de Montbrun, and called chaise à porteurs.

"It is generally said that these chairs were first made at Sedan, on the Meuse; but this is not at all probable, as, without doubt, the invention was introduced into France from England.

Sedrat. The lotus-tree which stands on the right-hand side of the invisible throne of Allah. Its branches extend wider than the distance between heaven and earth. Its leaves resemble the ears of an elephant. Each seed of its fruit encloses a houri; and two rivers issue from its roots. Numberless birds sing among its branches, and numberless angels rest beneath its shade.

See'dy. Weary, worn out, out of sorts; run to seed. A hat or coat is termed seedy when it has become shabby. A man is seedy after a debauch, when he looks and feels out of sorts.

Seel. To close the eyelids of a hawk by running a thread through them; to hoodwink. (French, ciller, cil, the eyelash.)

"She that so young could give out such a seeming
To see her father's eyes up, close as oak."—Shakespeare: Othello, ill. 3.

See'murgh. The wonderful bird that could speak all the languages of the world, and whose knowledge embraced past, present, and future events. (Persian mythology.)

Sedan Horse (The). A possession which invariably brought ill luck with it. Hence the Latin proverb "ile homo habet equum Sedanum." Cæsarius Seius had an Argive horse, of the breed of Selim. Son of Abdallah and cousin of Zuleika (3 syl.). When Giaffir (2 syl.) murdered Abdallah, he took Selim and brought him up as his own son. The young man fell in love with Zuleika, who thought he was her brother; but when she discovered he was Abdallah’s son, she promised to be his bride, and eloped with him. As soon as Giaffir discovered this he went after the fugitives, and shot Selim. Zuleika killed herself, and the old pacha was left childless. The character of Selim is bold, enterprising, and truthful. (Byron: Bride of Abydos.)

Selim (son of Akbar). The name of Jehangir, before his accession to the throne. He married Nourmahal’ (the Light of the Harem). (See Nourmahal.)

Sel’jucks, A Perso-Turkish dynasty which gave eleven kings and lasted 138 years (1056-1194). It was founded by Togrul Beg, a descendant of Seljuk, chief of a small tribe which gained possession of Boka’ra.

Sell. A saddle. “Vaulting ambition... o’erleaps its sell” (Macbeth, i. 7). (Latin, sella; French, selle.) Window sill is the Anglo-Saxon syl (a basement).

Sell, sold. Made a captive, as a purchased slave. St. Paul says he was “sold under sin” (Rom. vii. 14). (Anglo-Saxon, sell-an, to give.)

A sell. A “do,” a deception, a “take-in.” Street vendors who take in the unwary with catchphrases, chuckle like hens when they have laid an egg, “Sold again, and got the money!”

Selling Race (A), in which horses to be sold are run. These horses must have the sale price ticketed. The winner is generally sold by auction, and the owner gets both the selling price and the stakes. If at the auction a price is obtained above the ticketed price it is divided between the second-best horse and the race-fund. (See Handicap, Sweepstakes, Plate, Weight-for-Age Race.)

The owner of any of the horses may claim any horse in a selling race at the price ticketed.

Selling the Pass. This is a phrase, very general in all Ireland, applied to those who turn queen’s or king’s evidence, or who impeach their comrades for money. The tradition is that a regiment of soldiers was sent by Crotha, “lord of Atha,” to hold a pass against the invading army of Trathal, “King of Cael.” The pass was betrayed for money. The Fir-bolgs being subdued, Trathal assumed the title of "King of Ireland."

Seltzer Water. A corruption of Seltzers Water; so called from the Lower Selters, near Limburg (Nassau).

Semi-amis of the North. Margaret of Denmark, Sweden, and Norway. (1353-1412.) Catherine II. of Russia (1729-1796).

Sennanus (St.) fled to the island of Scattery, and resolved that no female form should ever step upon it. An angel led St. Conaír to the island, but the recluse refused to admit her. Tom Moore has a poem on this legend. St. Senanus and the Lady. (Irish Melodies, No. 1. (See KEVIN.)

Sen’ca. The Christian Sen’ca. Bishop Hall of Norwich. (1574-1656.)

Senior Optime (3 syl.) A Cambridge University expression meaning one of the second-class in the mathematical tripos. The first class consists of Wranglers.

"In the University of Cambridge every branch is divided into three classes, and the three classes are called triposes. In the mathematical tripos, those of the first class are called wranglers, those of the second class are senior optimes (3 syl.), and those of the third class junior optimes. Law, classical, and other triposes have no distinctive names, but are called Class I., II., or III., of the respective triposes.

Senna cherib, whose army was destroyed by the Angel of Death, is by the Orientals called King Moussal. (D’Herbelot, notes to the Koran.)

So’nights. A week; seven nights. Fort’nights. Fourteen nights. These words are relics of the ancient Celtic custom of beginning the day at sunset, a custom observed by the ancient Greeks, Babylonians, Persians, Syrians, and Jews, and by the modern representatives of these people. In Gen. i. we always find the evening proceeds the morning; as, "The evening and the morning were the first day," etc.

Sentences (3 syl.). The four books of Sentences, by Pierre Lombard, form the foundation of scholastic theology of the middle period. (See SCHOOLMEN.)

Master of the Sentences. Pierre Lombard, schoolman. (Died 1164.)

Sentinel. Archd. Smith says, "It is one set to watch the sentina (Lat.) or hold of a ship," but the Fr. sentier, a path or "beat," is far more probable. (French, sentinelle; Italian, sentinella; the French sentier is from the Latin sentinella.)

Seyer. The Indian soldier is so called, says Bishop Heber, from sip, a bow, their principal weapon in olden times. (Sipahi, a soldier.)

Sept. A clan (Latin, septem, a fold), all the cattle, or all the voters, in a given enclosure.

September Massacres. An indiscriminate slaughter of Loyalists confined at the time in the Abbaye and other French prisons. Danton gave order for this onslaught after the capture of Verdun by the allied Prussian army. It lasted the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of September, 1792. As many as 8,000 persons fell in this massacre, among whom was the Princess de Lamballe.

Septuagesima Sunday. In round numbers, seventy days before Easter. The third Sunday before Lent. Really only sixty-eight days before Easter.

Septuagint. A Greek version of the Old Testament, so called because it was made, in round numbers, by seventy Jews; more correctly speaking, by seventy-two. Dr. Campbell disapproves of this derivation, and says it was so called because it was sanctioned and authorised by the Jewish Sanhedrim or great council, which consisted of seventy members besides the high priest. This derivation falls in better with the modern notion that the version was made at different times by different translators between b.c. 270 and 130. (Latin, septuaginta, seventy.)

"The Septuagint contains the Apocrypha. According to legend, the Septuagint was made at Alexandria by seventy-two Jews in seventy-two days.

Seraglio. The palace of the Turkish sultan, situated in the Golden Horn, and enclosed by walls seven miles and a half in circuit. The chief entrance is the Sublime Gate; and the chief of the large edifices is the Harem, or "sacred spot," which contains numerous houses, one for each of the sultan’s wives, and others for his concubines. The black eunuchs form the inner guard, and the white eunuchs the second guard. The Seraglio may be visited by strangers; not so the Harem.

Seraphim. An order of angels distinguished for fervent zeal and religious ardour. The word means "to burn." (See Isaiah vi. 2.)

"Thousand celestial ardours [seraphs] where he stood Veiled with his gorgeous wings, up springing light, Flew through the midst of heaven." - Milton; Paradise Lost, v. 240.
Serapis. The Ptolemaic form of the Egyptian Osiris. The word is a corruption of oeropis (dead ape), or rather "osirified ape"), a deity which had so many things in common with Osiris that it is not at all easy to distinguish them.

Serapis. Symbol of the Nile and of fertility.

Serat (AD). The ordeal bridge over which everyone will have to pass at the resurrection. It is not wider than the edge of a scimitar, and is thrown across the gulf of hell. The faithful, says the Koran, will pass over in safety, but sinners will fall headlong into the dreary realm beneath.

Serbian Bog or Serbo's. A mess from which there is no way of extricating oneself. The Serbian bog was between Egypt and Palestine. Strabo, in a lake, and says it was 200 stadia long, and 50 broad; Pliny makes it 150 miles in length. Hume says that whole armies have been lost therein. Typhon lay at the bottom of this bog, which was therefore called Typhon's Breathing Hole. It received its name from Selaket-Bardoli, a king of Jerusalem, who died there on his return from an expedition into Egypt.

"Now, sir, I must say I know of no Serbian bog deeper than a £5 rating would prove to be." — H. Durrani (Choral of the Exch.), Times, March 19, 1967.

"A self profound as that Serbian bog. Betwixt Damastus and Mount Caurus old, Where armies whole have sunk." — Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 562.

Seremones (4 syl.). Brother-in-law of King Sardanapalus, to whom he entrusts his signet-ring to put down a rebellion headed by Arbaces the Mede and Bel'esus, the Chaldean soothsayer. He is slain in a battle with the insurgents. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Serena'de (3 syl.). Music performed in the serenade — i.e. in the open air at eventide (Latin, ser' evná, whence the French serémade and Italian serenate).

"Or serenate which the starred lover sings To his proud fair." — Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 769.

Sere'né (2 syl.). A title given to certain German princes. Those princes who used to hold under the empire were entitled Serene or Most Serene Highnesses.

"It's all serene. All right (Spanish, serve' no, "all right") — the sentinel's countersign. Serene, the night-watch." — Let us clearly understand each other. "All serene, responded Foster." — Watson: The Web of the Spider. chap. viii.

Serpent. An attribute of St. Cecilia, St. Euphemia, and many other saints, either because they trampled on Satan, or because they miraculously cleared some country of such reptiles. (See Dagon.)

Serpent, in Christian art, figures in Paradise as the tempter.

The brazen serpent gave newness of life to those who were bitten by the fiery dragons and raised their eyes to this symbol. (Num. xxiii. 8.)

"It is generally placed under the feet of the Virgin, in allusion to the promise made to Eve after the fall. (Gen. iii. 15.) Satan is called the great serpent because under the form of a serpent he tempted Eve. (Rev. xii. 9.)"

"It is rather strange that, in Hindu mythology, hell is called Nada (the region of serpents). (Sir W. Jones.)

Serpent metamorphoses. Cadmos and his wife Harmonia were by Zeus converted into serpents and removed to Elysium. Esculapius, god of Epidaurus, assumed the form of a serpent when he appeared at Rome during a pestilence. Therefore is it that the goddess of Health bears in her hand a serpent.

"O want, Hygæa, o'er Britannia's throne Thy serpent-wand, and mark it for thine own." — Jarvis: Economus of Vegetation, ii.

Jupiter Ammon appeared to Olym-pia in the form of a serpent, and became the father of Alexander the Great.

"When glides a silver serpent, treacherous guest! And fair Olympus folds him to her breast." — Jarvis: Economus of Vegetation, i. 2.

Jupiter Cupido'sius, in a similar form, became the father of Scipio Africanus.

The serpent is emblematical —

(1) Of wisdom. "Be ye therefore wise as serpents, and harmless as doves" (Matt. x. 16).

(2) Of subtlety. "Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field" (Gen. iii. 1).
It is said that the ocellus hides in sand that it may bite the horse’s foot and get the rider thrown. In allusion to this belief, Jacob says, “Dan shall be... an adder in the path, that biteth the horse’s heels, so that his rider shall fall backward” (Gen. xix. 17).

It is said that serpents, when attacked, swallow their young, and eject them again on reaching a place of safety.

Thomas Lodge says that people called Sauveurs have St. Catherine’s wheel in the palate of their mouths, and therefore can heal the stings of serpents.

The Bible also tells us that it stops up its ears that it may not be charmed by the charmer. (Ps. lviii. 4.)

The serpent is symbolical—

(1) Of deity, because, says Plutarch, “it feeds upon its own body: even so all things spring from God, and will be resolved into deity again.” (De Iside et Osiride, i. 2, p. 5; and Philo Byblius.)

(2) Of eternity, as a corollary of the former. It is represented as forming a circle and holding its tail in its mouth.

(3) Of renovation. It is said that the serpent, when it is old, has the power of growing young again “like the eagle,” by casting its slough, which is done by squeezing itself between two rocks.

(4) Of guardian spirits. It was thus employed by the ancient Greeks and Romans, and not unfrequently the figure of a serpent was depicted on their altars.

In the temple of Athenæ at Athens, a serpent was kept in a cage, and called “the Guardian Spirit of the Temple.” This serpent was supposed to be animated by the soul of Erichthonius.

To cherish a serpent in your bosom. To show kindness to one who proves ungrateful. The Greeks say that a husbandman found a serpent’s egg, which he put into his bosom. The egg was hatched by the warmth, and the young serpent stung its benefactor.

“Therefore think him as a serpent’s egg, which, hatched, would (as his kind) grow dangerous.” Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

Their ears have been serpent-licked. They have the gift of foreseeing events, the power of seeing into futurity. This is a Greek superstition. It is said that Cassandra and Helenus were gifted with the power of prophecy, because serpents licked their ears while sleeping in the temple of Apollo.

The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent’s head (Gen. iii. 15). The serpent bruised the heel of man; but Christ, the “seed of the woman,” bruised the serpent’s head.

Serpent’s food. Fennel is said to be the favourite food of serpents, with the juice of which it restores its sight when dim.

Serpents. Brazilian wood is a panacea against the bite of serpents. The Countess of Salisbury, in the reign of James I., had a bedstead made of this wood, and on it is the legend of “How soil vitu mal y pene.”

Serpentine Verses. Such as end with the same word as they begin with. The following are examples:

“Crescit amor numnum, quantum ipsa pecunia crescat.”
(Greater grows the love of gold, as petal itself grows greater.)

“Amico florentia et statibus, Arcades amae.”
(Both in the spring of life, Arcadians both.)

Serrapurda. High screens of rep cloth, stiffened with cane, used to enclose a considerable space round the royal tent of the Persian army.

Servant (Faithful). (See Adam.)

Serve. I’ll serve him out—give him a quid pro quo. This is the French deserver, to do an ill turn to one.

To serve a rope. To roll something upon it to prevent its from being fretted.

The “service” or material employed is spun yarn, small lines, sennit, ropes, old leather, or canvas.

Servus Servorum (Latin). The slave of slaves, the drudge of a servant. The style adopted by the Roman pontiffs ever since the time of Gregory the Great is Servus Servorum Dei.

Ses’ame (3 syl). Oily grain of the natural order Pedaliadceee, originally from India. In Egypt they eat sesame cakes, and the Jews frequently add the seed to their bread. The cakes made of sesame oil, mixed with honey and preserved citron, are considered an Oriental luxury; sesame is excellent also for puddings. (See Open Sesame.)

“Among the numerous objects... was a black horse... On one side of its manger there was clean barley and sesame, and the other was filled with rose-water.”—Arabian Nights (Third Calendar).

Se’aha. King of the serpent race, on which Vishnu reclines on the primeval waters. It has a thousand heads, on one of which the world rests. The coiled-up seshas is the emblem of eternity. (Hindu mythology.)

Set Off (A). A commercial expression. The credits are set off against the debits, and the balance struck.
Set Scene

Set off to advantage. A term used by jewellers, who set off precious stones by appropriate "settings."

Set Scene. In theatrical parlance, a scene built up by the stage carpenters, or a furnished interior, as a drawing-room, as distinguished from an ordinary or shifting scene.

Set-to (A). A boxing match, a pugilistic fight, a scolding. In pugilism the combatants are by their seconds "set to the scratch" or line marked on the ground.

Set'ebos. A deity of the Patagonians, introduced by Shakespeare into his Tempest.

"His art is of such power,
It would control my daunt'd soul, Setebos,
And make a vassal of him." Tempest, i. 2.

Seth'ites (2 syl.). A sect of the second century, who maintained that the Messiah was Seth, son of Adam.

Setting a Hen. Giving her a certain number of eggs to hatch. The whole number for incubation is called a setting.

Setting a Saw. Bending the teeth alternately to the right or left in order to make it work more easily.

Setting of a Jewel. The frame of gold or silver surrounding a jewel in a ring, brooch, etc.

"This precious stone set in the silver sea."
Shakespeare: Richard II., ii. 1.

Setting of Plaster or Paint. Its hardening.

Setting of Sun, Moon, and Stars. Their sinking below the horizon.

Setting the Thames on Fire. (See THAMES.)

Settle your Hash (Tu). "To cook his goose," or "make mince-meat of him." Our slang is full of similar phrases.

"About ears as goes mad in their castles,
And females what settles their hash."
Sims: Dougodet Ballads (Polly).

Seven (Greek, hepta; Latin, septem; German, sieben; Anglo-Saxon, seafan; etc.). A holy number. There are seven days in creation, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven days in the week, seven graces, seven divisions in the Lord's Prayer, seven ages in the life of man, and the just fall "seven times a day." There are seven phases of the moon, every seventh year was sabbatical, and seven times seven years was the jubilee. The three great Jewish feasts lasted seven days, and between the first and second of these feast were seven weeks. Levitical purifications lasted seven days. We have seven churches of Asia, seven candlesticks, seven stars, seven trumpets, seven spirits before the throne of God, seven horns, the Lamb has seven eyes, ten times seven Israelites go to Egypt, the exile lasts the same number of years, and there were ten times seven elders. Pharaoh in his dream saw seven kine and seven ears of corn, etc.

It is frequently used indefinitely to signify a long time, or a great many; thus in the Interlude of the Four Elements, the dance of apace is called the best "that I have seen this seven yere." Shakespeare talks of a man being "a vile thief this seven year."

Seven Bibles (The) or Sacred Books.

(1) The Bible of Christians. (Canon completed A.D. 494; Old Testament as we have it, B.C. 130.)

(2) The Eldas of the Scandinavians.

(3) The Five Kings of the Chinese. "King" here means web-of-cloth on which they were originally written.

(4) The Koran of the Mohammedans. (Seventh century, A.D.)

(5) The Tri Ítikes of the Buddhists. (Sixth century B.C.)

(6) The Three Vedas of the Hindús. (Twelfth century B.C.)

(7) Zendavesta of the Persians. (Twelfth century B.C.)

Seven Bodies in Alchemy. Sun is gold, moon silver, Mars iron, Mercury quicksilver, Saturn lead, Jupiter tin, and Venus copper.

"The bodies seven, eck, to hem heer anoom;
Rot gold is, and Luna silver we threpe.
At Mars yen, Mercuric quykalver we cleje;
Saturn lead, and Jupiter is ten;
And Venus copper, by my fathers key."
Chancer: Proli of the Chamoones Yemansel Tale.

Seven Champions of Christendom is by Richard Johnson, who lived in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

(1) St. George of England was seven years imprisoned by the Alm' дор, the black King of Morocco.

(2) St. Denys of France lived seven years in the form of a hart.

(3) St. James of Spain was seven years dumb out of love to a fair Jewess.

(4) St. Anthony of Italy, with the other champions, was enchanted into a deep sleep in the Black Castle, and was released by St. George's three sons, who quenched the seven lamps by water from the enchanted fountain.

(5) St. Andrew of Scotland, who delivered six ladies who had lived seven years under the form of white swans.
Seven Churches

(6) St. Patrick of Ireland was immured in a cell where he scratched his grave with his own nails.
(7) St. David of Wales slept seven years in the enchanted garden of Ormandine, but was redeemed by St. George.

Seven Churches of Asia.
(1) Ephesus, founded by St. Paul, 57, in a ruinous state in the time of Justinian.
(2) Smyrna, an important seaport. Polycarp was its first bishop.
(3) Pergamus, renowned for its library.
(4) Thyatira, now called Ak-hissar (the White Castle).
(5) Sardis, now a small village called Sart.
(6) Philadelphia, now called Allah Sheh (City of God), a miserable town.
(7) Laodicea, now a deserted place called Eski-hissar (the Old Castle).

It is strange that all these churches, planted by the apostles themselves, are now Mahometan. Read what Gamaliel said, Acts v. 38, 39.

Seven Deadly Sins (The). Pride, Wrath, Envy, Lust, Gluttony, Avarice, and Sloth.

Seven Dials (London). A column with seven dials formerly stood in St. Giles, facing the seven streets which radiated therefrom.

Where famed St. Giles's ancient limits spread
An in-rail'd column rears its lofty head,
Here to seven streets seven dials count the day,
And from each other catch the circling ray.
Gay: Tintern, ii.

Seven Joys of the Virgin. (See Mary.)

Seven Sages of Greece.
(1) Solon of Athens, whose motto was, "Know thyself."
(2) Chilo of Sparta—"Consider the end."
(3) Thales of Mile'tus—"Who hath soothsay in the sea?"
(4) Bias of Pri'e'n—"Most men are bad."
(5) Cloebu'loes of Lindos—"The golden mean," or "Avoid extremes."
(6) Pittacos of Mitle'n—"Seize Time by the forelock."
(7) Periander of Corinth—"Nothing is impossible to industry."

First, Solon, who made the Athenian laws:
While Ohio, in Sparta, was famed for his sons;
In Mile'tus did Thales astronomy teach;
Bias used in Pric'e'n his morals to preach;
Cloebu'loes of Lindos was handsome and wise;
Mitle'n's gainst thralldom saw Pittacos rise;
Periander is said to have gained through his craft
The title the' Mycon, the Chelan, ought.

Seven Senses. Scarred out of my seven senses. According to very ancient teaching, the soul of man, or his "inward holy body," is compounded of the seven properties which are under the influence of the seven planets. Fire animates, earth gives the sense of feeling, water gives speech, air gives taste, sun gives sight, flowers give hearing, the south wind gives smelling. Hence the seven senses are animation, feeling, speech, taste, sight, hearing, and smelling. (See Common Sense.) (See Ecclesiastes xvii. 5.)

Seven Sisters. Seven culverins so called, cast by one Borthwick.

"And these were Bor'hwick's sisters Seven,
And culverins which France had given:
Ill-omened gift! The guns remain,
The conqueror's spoil on Flodden plain."
Sir Walter Scott: Marmion, iv.

Seven Sleepers. Seven noble youths of Ephesus, who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave in Mount Celion. After 230 years they awoke, but soon died, and their bodies were taken to Marseilles in a large stone coffin, still shown in Victor's church. Their names are Constantine, Dionysius, John, Maximian, Mulchus, Martinian, and Serapion. This fable took its rise from a misapprehension of the words, "They fell asleep in the Lord"—i.e. died. (Gregory of Tours: De Gloria Martyrum, i. 9.) (See Koran, xviii.; Golden Legend, etc.)

Seven Sorrows of the Virgin. (See Mary.)

Seven Spirits stand before the Throne of God: Michael, Gabriel, La'mael, Raphael, Zachariel, Anael, and Orphiel. (Gustarini.)

Seven Spirits of God (The). (1) the Spirit of Wisdom, (2) the Spirit of Understanding, (3) the Spirit of Counsel, (4) the Spirit of Power, (5) the Spirit of Knowledge, (6) the Spirit of Righteousness, and (7) the Spirit of Divine Awfulness.

Seven Virtues (The). Faith, Hope, Charity, Prudence, Justice, Fortitude, and Temperance. The first three are called "the holy virtues." (See Seven Deadly Sins.)

Seven Weeks' War (The). From June 8th to July 26th, 1866, between Prussia and Austria, for German supremacy. Italy was allied to Prussia. Hostilities broke out between Austria and Italy July 25th, but the Bavarians were defeated the following day (July 26th).
The Treaty of Prague was signed August 23rd, 1866, and that of Vienna October 3rd. By these treaties, Austria was wholly excluded from Germany, and Prussia was placed at the head of the German States.

Seven Wise Masters. Lucien, son of Dolopithes, received improper advances from his stepmother, and, being repelled, she accused him to the king of offering her violence. By consulting the stars the prince found out that his life was in danger, but that the crisis would be passed without injury if he remained silent for seven days. The wise masters now take up the matter; each one in turn tells the king a tale to illustrate the evils of inconsiderate punishments, and as the tale ends the king resolves to relent; but the queen at night persuades him to carry out his sentence. The seven days being passed, the prince also tells a tale which embodies the whole truth, whereupon the king sentences the queen to lose her life. This collection of tales, called Sindbad's Parables, is very ancient, and has been translated from the Arabic into almost all the languages of the civilised world. John Holland, of Dalkeith, turned it into Scotch metre.

Seven Wonders of the World. (i) Of Antiquity.

The Pyramids at Giza, which in Egypt were laid;
Then Babylon's Gardens for Amaryia made;
Then Maacaras's Tomb of affection and guilt;
Fourth, the Temple of Dium, in Ephesus built;
Fifth, Colossus of Rhode, cast in brass, to the sun;
Sixth, Jupiter's Palace, by Pindar done;
The Pharos of Egypt, last wonder of old,
Or the Palace of Cyrus, cemented with gold.

(ii) Of the Middle Ages.

(1) The Colosseum of Rome.
(2) The Catacombs of Alexandria.
(3) The Great Wall of China.
(4) Stonehenge.
(5) The Leaning Tower of Pisa.
(6) The Porcelain Tower of Naukin.
(7) The Mosque of St. Sophia at Constantinople.

Seven Years' Lease. Leases run by seven years and its multiples, from the ancient notion of what was termed "climacteric years," in which life was supposed to be in special peril. (Levinus Lennius) (See Climacteric Years).

Seven Years' War. The third period of the War of the "Austrian Succession," between Maria Theresa of Austria and Friedrich II. of Prussia. It began 1756, and terminated in 1763. At the close, Silesia was handed over to Prussia.

Seven Years' War between Sweden and Denmark (1563-1570). Erik XIV. of Sweden was poisoned, and his successor put an end to the war.

Several = separate; that which is severed or separate; each, as "all and several."

Azariah was a leper, and "dwelt in a several house" (2 Kings xvi. 5).

Severn. (See Sabrina.)

Seve'srus (St.). Patron saint of fullers, being himself of the same craft. The Wall of Severus. A stone rampart, built in 208 by the Emperor Severus, between the Tyne and the Solway. It is to the north of Hadrian's wall, which was constructed in 120.

Sèvres Ware. Porcelain of fine quality, made at the French government works at Sèvres. Chiefly of a delicate kind, for ornament rather than use.

Sew the Button on. Jot down at once what you wish to remember, otherwise it may be lost or forgotten.

Sex. (See Gender Words.)

Sexagesima Sunday. The second Sunday before Lent; so called because in round numbers it is sixty days before Easter.

Sextile (2 syn.). The aspect of two planets when distant from each other sixty degrees or two signs. This position is marked thus *. As there are twelve signs, two signs are a sixth.

"In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite
Of noxious efficacy."

Milton: Paradise Lost, x. 650.

Sexton. A corruption of sa'cristan, an official who has charge of the sacra, or things attached to a specific church, such as vestments, cushions, books, boxes, tools, vessels, and so on.

Seyd [Serf]. Pacha of the Morea, assassinated by Gulnare, his favourite concubine. (Byron: The Corsair.)

Sforza. The founder of the illustrious house which was so conspicuous in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, was the son of a day-labourer. His name was Giacomuzzi. Attendolo, changed to Sforza from the following incident:—Being desirous of going to the wars, he consulted his hatchet thus: he flung it against a tree, saying, "If it sticks fast, I will go." It did stick fast, and he enlisted. It was because he threw it with such amazing force that he was called Sforza, the Italian for force.
Sforza (in Jerusalem Delivered) of Lombardy. He, with his two brothers, Achilles and Palame/des, were in the squadron of adventurers in the allied Christian army.

Shack. A scamp. To shack or shackle is to tie a log to a horse, and send it out to feed on the stubble after harvest. A shack is either a beast so shackled, the right of sending a beast to the stubble, or the stubble itself. Applied to men, a shack is a jade, a stubble-feeder, one bearing the same ratio to a well-to-do man as a jade sent to graze on a common bear to a well-stalled horse. (Anglo-Saxon, seccul; Arabic, shakal, to tie the feet of a beast.)

Shaddock. A large kind of orange, so called from Captain Shaddock, who first transplanted one in the West Indies. It is a native of China and Japan.

Shades. Wine vaults. The Brighton Old Bank, in 1819, was turned by Mr. Savage into a smoking-room and gin-shop. There was an entrance to it by the Pavilion Shades, and Savage took down the word bank, and inserted instead the word shades. This term was not inappropriate, as the room was in reality shaded by the opposite house, occupied by Mrs. Fitzherbert.

Shaddow or Shaddoff. A contrivance in Egypt for watering lands for the summer crops. It consists of a long rod weighted at one end, so as to raise the bucket attached by a rope to the other end.

Shadow. A ghost. Macbeth says to the ghost of Banquo—

   ‘Hence, horrible shadow! unrivalled mockery, hence!’

Shakespeare: Macbeth, iii, 4.

‘He would quarrel with his own shadow. He is so irritable that he would lose his temper on the merest trifles.’ (See SCHLEMIHL.)

Gone to the bad for the shadow of an ass. Demosthenes says a young Athenian once hired an ass to Megara. The heat was so great and the road so exposed, that he alighted at midday to take shelter from the sun under the shadow of the poor beast. Scarcely was he seated when the owner passed by, and laid claim to the shadow, saying he let the ass to the traveller, but not the ass’s shadow. After fighting for a time, they agreed to settle the matter in the law courts, and the suit lasted so long that both were ruined. ‘If you must quarrel, let it be for something better than the shadow of an ass.’

May your shadow never be less. When students have made certain progress in the black arts, they are compelled to run through a subterranean hall with the devil after them. If they run so fast that the devil can only catch their shadow, or part of it, they become first-rate magicians, but lose either all or part of their shadow. Therefore, the expression reserved to above means, May you escape wholly and entirely from the clutches of the foul fiend.

A servant earnestly desirèth the shadow (Job vii. 2)—the time of leaving off work. The people of the East measure time by the length of their shadow, and if you ask a man what o’clock it is, he will go into the sun, stand erect, and fixing his eye where his shadow terminates, will measure its length with his feet; having done so, he will tell you the hour correctly. A workman earnestly desires his shadow, which indicates the time of leaving off work.

Shadow (Th). To follow about like a shadow. This is done by some person or persons appointed to watch the movements and keep an eye on the doings of suspicious characters.

‘He [Jesus] was shadowed by spies, who were stirring up the crowd against Him.’—Longman’s Magazine, 1841, p. 230.

Shady. On the shady side of forty—the wrong side, meaning more than forty. As evening approaches the shadows lengthen, and as man advances towards the evening of life he approaches the shady side thereof. As the beauty of the day is gone when the sun declines, the word shady means inferior, bad, etc.; as a shady character, one that will not bear the light; a shadiy transaction, etc.

Shafal/us. So Bottom the weaver and Francis Flute the bellows-mender, call Cephal/us, the husband of Procris.

‘Pyramus: Not Shafalus to Procris was so true. Thisbe: Ah Shafalus to Procris, I to you.’

Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream, v. 1.

Sha’fites (2 syl.). One of the four sects of the Sunnites or orthodox Moslems; so called from Al-Shafai, a descendant of Mahomet. (See SHITEES.)

Shaft. I will make either a shaft or bolt of it. I will apply it to one use or another. The bolt was the crossbow arrow, the shaft was the arrow of the long-bow.

Shatton (Sir Pierce). In this character Sir Walter Scott has made familiar to us the euphuisms of Queen Elizabeth’s age. The fashionable cavalier or pedantic fop, who assumes the high-flown style rendered fashionable by Lyly, was grandson of old Oversitch the tailor. (Sir Walter Scott: Monastery.)

Shah. Have you seen the Shah? A query implying a hoax, popular with street arabs when the Shah of Persia visited England. (1873.)

Shah-pour, the Great (Sapor II.). Surnamed Zu-leetaf (shoulder-breaker), because he dislocated the shoulders of all the Arabs taken in war. The Romans called him Fort'hanous, because he was born after the death of his father Hormuz II. He was crowned in the tomb by the Magi placing the royal insignia on the body of his mother.

Shahzada. A prince, the son of a king. (Anglo-Indian.)

Shakedown. Come and take a shakedown at my house—a bed. The allusion is to the time when men slept upon litter or clean straw. (See below, Shakes.)

Shakeros. Certain agamists founded in North America by Ann Lee, called "Mother Anu," daughter of a poor blacksmith born in Toad Lane (Todd Street), Manchester. She married a smith named Stanley, and had four children, who died in infancy, after which she joined the sect of Jane Wardlaw, a tailoress, but was thrown into prison as a brawler. While there she said that Jesus Christ stood before her, and became one with her in form and spirit. When she came out and told her story six or seven persons joined her, and called her "the Lamb's bride." Soon after this she went to America and settled at Water Vliet, in New York. Other settlements were established in Hancock and Mount Lebanon.

Shakes. No great shakes. Nothing extraordinary; no such mighty bargain. The reference is to shingle for the roof of shanties, or to stumble left after harvest for the poor.

"The cabin itself is quite like that of the modern settlers, but the shingles, called shakes, make the roof roof unique."—Harper's Weekly, July 1861, 1861, p. 554.

*I'll do it in a brace of shakes—*instantly, as soon as you can shake twice the dice-box.

Shakespeare, usually called "Gentle Will."

His wife was Anne Hathaway, of Shotttery, about eight years older than himself.

He had one son, named Hamnet, who died in his twelfth year, and two daughters.

Ben Jonson said of him—"And though thou hast small Latin and less Greek . . ."

Milton calls him "Sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child," and says he will go to the well-trod stage to hear him "warble his native wood-notes wild." (L'Allegro, 133.)

Akeusido says he is "Alike the master of our smiles and tears." (Ode i.)

Dryden says of him—"He was a man who of all modern and perhaps ancient poets, had the largest and most comprehensive soul."

Young says—"He wrote the play the Almighty made." (Epistle to Lord Lansdowne.)

Mallett says—"Great above rule . . . Nature was his own." (Verbal Criticism.)

Collins says he "joined Tuscan fancy to Athenian force." (Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer.)

Pope says—

"Shakespeare (whom you and every play-house hall sit ye" the divine," the matchless," what you will"

For gain, not glory, winged his roving flight, And grew immortal in his own despite." Imitations of Horace, Ep. i.

The dedication of Shakespeare's Sonnets has provoked much controversy. It is as follows:—

TO THE ONLIE BEGETTER OF THESE INSULTING SONNETS MR. W. H. ALL HAPPINESSE AND THAT ETERNITIE PROMISED BY OUR EVER-LIVING POET WISHETH

—that is, Mr. William Herbert [afterwards Lord Pembroke] wisheth to [the Earl of Southampton] the only begetter or instigator of these sonnets, that happiness and eternal life which [Shakespeare] the ever-living poet speaks of. The rider is—

THE WELL-WISHING ADVENTURER IN SETTING FORTH. T. T.

That is, Thomas Thorpe is the adventurer who speculates in their publication. (See Athenæum, Jan. 25, 1862.)

Shakespeare. There are six accredited signatures of this poet, five of which are attached to business documents, and one is entered in a book called Florio, a translation of Montaigne, published in 1603. A passage in act ii. scene 2 of The Tempest is traced directly to this translation, proving that the Florio was possessed by Shakespeare before he wrote that play.

The Shakespeare of divines. Jeremy Taylor (1613-1667).

The Shakespeare of eloquence. So Barnave happily characterised the Comte de Mirabeau (1749-1791).

The Spanish Shakespeare. Calderon (1601-1687).

Shaking Hands.  Horace, strolling along the Via Sacra, shook hands with an acquaintance. Arreptâque manus, "Quid agis dulcisissimé verum?"

Æneas, in the temple of Dido, sees his lost companions enter, and "arbitus con-jungere dextrae ardentur" (Ec., i. 514.).

Nestor shook hands with Ulysses on his return to the Grecian camp with the stolen horses of Ajax.

And in the Old Testament, when Jehu asked Jehonadab if his "heart was right" with him, he said, "If it be, give me thine hand," and Jehonadab gave him his hand.

Shaky. Not steady; not in good health; not strictly upright; not well prepared for examination; doubtfully solvent. The allusion is to a table or chair out of order and shaky.

Shallow. A weak-minded country justice, intended as a caricature of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote. He is described as one who had been a madcap in his youth, and still dotes on his wild tricks; he is withal a liar, a blockhead, and a rogue. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, and Henry IV.)

Shalott (Lady of). A poem by Tennyson, the tale of which is similar to that of Elaine the "fair maid of Astolat" (q.v.). Part I. describes the island of Shalott, and tells us that the lady passed her life so secluded there that only the farm-labourers knew her. Part II. tells us that the lady passed her time in weaving a magic web, and that a curse would light on her if she looked down the river towards Camelot. Part III. describes how Sir Lancelot, in all his bravery, rode to Camelot, and the lady looked at him as he rode along. Part IV. says that the lady entered a boat, having first written her name on the prow, and floated down the river to Camelot, but died on the way. When the boat reached Camelot, Sir Lancelot, with all the inmates of the palace, came to look at it. They read the name on the prow, and Sir Lancelot exclaimed, "She has a lovely face, and may God have mercy on the lady of Shalott!"

Shambles means benches (Anglo-Saxon, scæmcl; Latin, scannum, and the diminutive scannellum, a little bench). The benches or banks on which meat is exposed for sale. (See Bank.)

"Whatever is sold in the shambles, that eat, asking no question."—1 Cor. x. 25.

Shamrock. The symbol of Ireland, because it was selected by St. Patrick to prove to the Irish the doctrine of the Trinity. (Irish and Gaelic, scenu-voig.)

Shamrock. According to the elder Pliny, no serpent will touch this plant.

Shan Van Voght. This excellent song (composed 1798) may be called the Irish Marceilaise. The title of it is a corruption of *An i-scan beon bocht* (the poor old woman—i.e. Ireland). (Halliday-Spurle: Irish Minstrelsy, p. 13.) The last verse is—

"Will Ireland then be free?"

"Said the Shan Van Voght? (repeat)"

"Yes, Ireland shall be free!"

"From the centre to the sea,"

"Hurrah for liberty!"

"Said the Shan Van Voght."

Shande's an Exactness. Sir Walter Scott says, "The author proceeds with the most unfeeling prolixity to give a minute detail of civil and common law, of the feudal institutions, of the architecture of churches and castles, of sculpture and painting, of minstrels, players, and parish clerks... Tristram can hardly be said to be fairly born, though his life has already attained the size of half a volume." (See below.)

"With a Shandes an exactness... Lady Anne begins her mourners of herself nine months before her nativity, for the sake of introducing a beautiful quotation from the Psalms."—Brow. Borealis, i. 292.

Shandy. Captain Shandy is called Uncle Toby. He was wounded at the siege of Numur, and had retired from the service. He is benevolent and generous, simple as a child, brave as a lion, and gallant as a courtier. His modesty with Widow Wadman and his military tastes are admirable. He is said to be drawn for Sterne's father. (Tristram Shandy.)

Mrs. Elizabeth Shandy, mother of Tristram. The beau-ideal of nonentity. Sir Walter Scott describes her as a "good lady of the poco-curante school." (Sterne: Tristram Shandy.)

Tristram Shandy. The hero of Sterne's novel so called.

Walter Shandy, Tristram's father. He is a metaphysical Don Quixote in his way, full of superstitious and idle conceits. He believes in long noses and propitious names, but his son’s nose is crushed, and his name is Tristan instead of Trismegistus. (Sterne: Tristram Shandy.)

Shandygaff is a mixture of beer and ginger-beer. (See Smiler.)

Shanks’ Nag. To ride Shanks’ nag is to go on foot, the shanks being the legs. A similar phrase is “Going by the narrow-bone stage” or by Walker’s bus. (Anglo-Saxon, scana, shanks.)

Shannon. Dipped in the Shannon. One who has been dipped in the Shannon loses all bashfulness. At least, sic avit.

Shanty. A log-hut. (Irish, sean, old; tig, house.)

Shanty Songs. Songs sung by sailors at work, to ensure united action. They are in sets, each of which has a different cadence adapted to the work in hand. Thus, in building topsails, weighing anchor, etc., one of the most popular of the shanty songs runs thus:—

“I’m bound away, this very day,
I’m bound for the Rio Grande.
Ho, you, Rio!
Then fare you well, my bonny blue bell,
I’m bound for the Rio Grande.”

(French, chanter, to sing; a sing-song.)

Shark. A swindler, a pilferer; one who snaps up things like a shark, which eats almost anything, and seems to care little whether its food is alive or dead, flesh, flesh, or human bodies.

“Shore thieves do rob us with our own good will,
And have Dame Nature’s warrant for it still:
Sometimes these sharks do work each other’s work.
The ravening belly often robs the lake.”

Taylor’s Works, ii. 117.

The shark bites the feather. This is a sailor’s proverb founded on observation. Though a shark is so voracious that it will swallow without distinction everything that drops from a ship into the sea, such as coracle, cloth, pitch, wood, and even knives, yet it will never touch a pilot-fish (q.v.) or a fowl, either alive or dead. It avoids sea-gulls, sea-mews, petrels, and every feathered thing. (St. Pierre: Studies, i.)

Sharp (Becky). The impersonation of intellect without virtue in Thackeray’s Vanity Fair. (See Sedley.)

“Becky Sharp, with a bonnet for a brother-in-law and an earl’s daughter for a friend, felt the holiness of human grandeur, and thought she was happier with the Bohemian artists in Bohemia.”

—The Expositor.

Sharp. Sharp’s the word. Look out, keep your eyes open and your wits about you. When a shopman suspects a customer, he will ask aloud of a brother-shopman if “Mr. Sharp is come in;” and if his suspicion is confirmed, will receive for answer, “No, but he is expected back immediately.” (Hotten.)

Sharp-beak. The Crow’s wife in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Sharp-set. Hungry. A term in falconry. (See Hawk.)

“An old man were so sharp-set as to eat fried fleshes, battered bees, strew smalls, either on Friday or Sandale, he could not be therefore indicted of humane treason.”—Snatchurde: Ireland, p. 19 (1658).

Shave. To shave a customer. Hotten says, when a master draper sees anyone capable of being imposed upon enter his shop, he strokes his chin, to signify to his assistant that the customer may be shaved.

“I shaved through; he was within a shave of a plug. I just got through [my examination] he was nearly rejected as not up to the mark. The allusion is to carpentry.

Shaveling. A lad; a young man. In the year 1348 the clergy died so fast of the Black Death that youths were admitted to holy orders by being shaven. William Bateman, Bishop of Norwich, dispensed with sixty shavelings to hold rectories and other livings, that divine service might not cease in the parishes over which they were appointed. (Blomefield: History of Norfolk, vol. iii.)

Shaving. Bondmen were commanded by the ancient order to shave, in token of servitude.

In the Turkish seraglio the slaves are obliged to shave their chins, in token of their servitude.

She Stoops to Conquer. This comedy owes its existence to an incident which actually occurred to its author. When Goldsmith was sixteen years of age, a wag residing at Ardagh directed him, when passing through that village, to Squire Fetherstone’s house as the village inn. The mistake was not discovered for some time, and then no one enjoyed it more heartily than Oliver himself.

Shear Steel. Steel which has been sheared. When the bars have been converted into steel, they are sheared into short pieces, and forged again from a pile built up with layers crossed, so as to produce a web-like texture in the metal by the crossing of the fibres. Great toughness results from this mode of manipulation, and the steel thus produced is used for shears and other Sheb-seze. The great fire festival of the Persians, when they used to set fire to large bunches of dry combustibles, fastened round wild beasts and birds, which, being then let loose, the air and earth appeared one great illumination. The terrified creatures naturally fled to the woods for shelter, and it is easy to conceive the conflagration they produced. (Richardson: Dissertation.)

She’ba (Queen of). The Assyrians say her name was Maqueda, but Arabs call her Belkis.

Shebeen. A small Irish store for the sale of whisky and something else, as bacon, eggs, general provisions, and groceries.

"Drinking your health wid Shamus O’Sheas at Katty’s shebeen."

Tennyson: To-morrow, stanza 2.

Sheep. Ram or tup, the sire; eucr. the dam; lamb, the new-born sheep till it is weaned, when it is called a hogget; the tup-lamb being a "tup-hogget;" and the ewe-lamb a "ewe-hogget;" if the tup is castrated it is called a wether-hogget.

After the removal of the first fleece, the tup-hogget becomes a sheepling, the ewe-hogget a grimmer, and the wether-hogget a dimount (hence the name "Dandy Dimont").

After the removal of the second fleece, the sheepling becomes a "two-shear tup," the grimmer a ewe, and the dimount a wether.

After the removal of the third fleece, the ewe is called a "teazer" and when it ceases to breed, a "draft ewe."

The Black Sheep (Kárá-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia, that lasted 108 years (1360-1468); so called from the device of their standard.

The White Sheep (Ak-koin-loo). A tribe which established a principality in Armenia, etc., on the ruin of the Black Sheep (1468-1608); so called from the device of their standard.

To cast a sheep’s eye at one is to look askance, like a sheep, at a person to whom you feel lovingly inclined.

"But he, the beast, was casting sheep’s eyes at her."—Colman: Brood Ofms.

Sheet Anchor. That is my sheet anchor—my chief stay, my chief dependence. The sheet anchor is the largest and heaviest of all. The word is a corruption of Shote-anchor, the anchor shot or thrown out in stress of weather. Many ships carry more than one sheet-anchor outside the ship’s waist.

"The surgeon no longer bleeds. If you ask him ‘why this neglect of what was once considered the sheet anchor of practice in certain diseases?’ he will . . ."—The Times.

Sheik (Arabic, elder). A title of respect equal to the Italian signor, the French sieur, Spanish señor, etc. There are seven sheiks in the East, all said to be direct descendants of Mahomet, and they all reside at Mecca.

Shekînah (shachen, to reside). The glory of the Divine Presence in the shape of a cloud of fire, which rested on the mercy-seat between the Chorubim.

Shekînah or Shekînah is not a biblical word. It was first mentioned in the Jeremiah Targum. The Shekînah was not supposed to dwell in the Second Temple. Its responses were given either by the Urim and Thummim of the high priest, by prophets, or orally. (See Deut. iii. 24; and Luke xvi. 2.)

Sheldonian Theatre. The "Senate House" of Oxford; so called from Gilbert Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, who built it. (1598-1609.)

Shell. Laid on the shell, or shelved. A government officer no longer actively employed; an actor no longer assigned a part; a young lady past the ordinary age of marriage; a pawn at the broker’s; a question started and set aside. All mean laid up and put away.

Shell (A). A hollow iron ball, with a fuse-hole in it to receive a fuse, which is a plug of wood containing gunpowder. It is constructed to burn slowly, and, on firing, the piece ignites, and continues to burn during its flight till it falls on the object at which it is directed, when it bursts, scattering its fragments in all directions.

Shell of an Egg. After an egg in the shell has been eaten, many persons break or crush the empty shell. Sir Thomas Brown says this was done originally "to prevent house-spirits from using the shell for their mischievous pranks." (Book v., chap. xxiii.)

Shells on churches, tombstones, and used by pilgrims:

1. If dedicated to James the Greater, the scallop-shell is his recognised emblem. (See James.) If not, the allusion is to the vocation of the apostles generally, who were fishermen, and Christ said He would make them "fishers of men."

2. On tombstones, the allusion is to the earthly body left behind, which is the mere shell of the immortal soul.
(3) Carried by pilgrims, the allusion may possibly be to James the Greater, the patron saint of pilgrims, but more likely it originally arose as a convenient drinking-cup, and hence the pilgrims of Japan carry scallop shells.

Shemitic. Pertaining to Shem, descendant of Shem, derived from Sem.
The Shemitic languages are Chaldee,
Syriac, Arabic, Hebrew, Samaritan, Ethiopic, and old Phoenician. The great characteristic of this family of languages is that the roots of words consist of three consonants.

Shemitic nations or Shemites (2 syl.).
(See above.)

Shepherd. The shepherd. Moses who fed the flocks of Jethro, his father-in-law.

Sing, heavenly muse, that on the secret top of Oreb or of Sinai didst inspire
That shepherd, who first taught the chosen seed
In the beginning how the heavens and earth
Rode out of chaos.
From Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. 1, 8.

N.B. Oreb, or Horeb and Sinai, are two heights of one mountain.

Shepherd Kings or Hyksos. Some 2,000 years B.C. a tribe of Arabian shephearders established themselves in Lower Egypt, and were governed by their own chiefs. Manetho says "they reigned 511 years;" Eratosthenes says 470 years;
Africaeus, 284 years; Eusebius, 103 years. Some say they extended over five dynasties, some over three, some give the name of one monarch, some of four, and others of six. Bunsen places them B.C. 1639: Lepsius, B.C. 1842:
others, 1900 or 2000. If there ever were such kings, they were driven into Syria by the rulers of Upper Egypt. (Hyk, ruler; shos, shepherd.)

Shepherd Lord (The). Henry, the tenth Lord Clifford, sent by his mother to be brought up by a shepherd, in order to save him from the fury of the Yorkists.
At the accession of Henry
VII. he was restored to all his rights and seignories. (Died 1523.)

* * The story is told by Wordsworth in The Song for the Feast of Brougham Castle.

Shepherd of Banbury (The). The ostensible author of a Weather Guide.
He styles himself John Claridge, Shephead; but the real author is said to have been Dr. John Campbell. (First published in 1744.)

Shepherd of Salisbury Plain (The).
Said to be David Saunders, noted for his homely wisdom and practical piety. Mrs. Hannah More wrote the religious tract so entitled, and makes the hero a Christian Arcadian.

Shepherd of the Ocean (The). So
Sir Walter Raleigh is called by Spenser, in his poem entitled Colin Clout's Come Home Again. (1552-1618.)

Shepherd's Sundial (The). The scarlet pimpernel, which opens at a little past seven in the morning, and closes at a little past two. When rain is at hand, or the weather is unfavourable, it does not open at all.

Shepherded. Watched and followed as suspicious of mischief, as a shepherd watches a wolf.

"Russian vessels of war are everywhere being carefully 'shepherded' by British ships, and it is easy to see that such a state of extreme tension cannot be continued much longer without an actual outbreak."—Newspaper leader, April 30th, 1858.

Sheppard (Jack). Son of a carpenter in Smithfield, noted for his two escapes from Newgate in 1724. He was hanged at Tyburn the same year. (1701-1724.)

Shepeter Time. The time of sheep-sharing.

Sheriffmuir. There was no fight at the Sheriffmuir. Don't grieve for your losses, for worse have befallen others before now. The battle of Sheriffmuir, in 1715, between the Jacobites and Hanoverians was very bloody; both sides sustained heavy losses, and both sides claimed the victory.

Sheva, in the satira of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir Roger Lestrange. (Part ii.)

Shewbread. Food for show only, and not intended to be eaten except by certain privileged persons. The term is Jewish, and refers to the twelve loaves which the priest "showed" or exhibited to Jehovah, by placing them week by week on the sanctuary table. At the end of the week, the priest who had been in office was allowed to take them home for his own eating; but no one else was allowed to partake of them.

Shewrel, a spirit-woman that haunts Mynydd Llanhiliddeh mountain, in Monmouthshire, to mislead those who attempt to cross it.

Shi'ahs. (See Shittites.)

Shibboleth. The password of a secret society; the secret by which those of a party know each other. The Shield

Ephraimites quarrelled with Jephthah, and Jephthah gathered together the men of Gilead and fought with Ephraim. There were many fugitives, and when they tried to pass the Jordan the guard told them to say Shibboleth, which the Ephraimites pronounced Sibboleth, and by this test it was ascertained whether the person wishing to cross the river was a friend or foe. ( Judges xii. 1-16.)

"Their foes a deadly Shibboleth devise."
Dryden: Hind and Panther, pt. iii.

Shield.
The Gold and Silver Shield. Two knights coming from different directions stopped in sight of a trophy shield, one side of which was gold and the other silver. Like the disputants about the colour of the chameleon, the knights disputed about the metal of the shield, and from words they proceeded to blows. Luckily a third knight came up at this juncture, to whom the point of dispute was referred, and the disputants were informed that the shield was silver on one side and gold on the other. This story is from Beaumont's Morallities. It was reprinted in a collection of Useful and Entertaining Passages in Prose, 1826.

The other side of the shield. The other side of the question. The reference is to the "Gold and Silver Shield." (See above.)

That depends on which side of the shield you look at. That depends on the standpoint of the speaker. (See above.)

Shield-of-Arms. Same as Coat of Arms; so called because persons in the Middle Ages bore their heraldic devices on their shields.

Shield of Expectation (Thc). The naked shield given to a young warrior in his virgin campaign. As he achieved glory, his deeds were recorded or symbolised on his shield.

Shields. The most famous in story are the Shield of Achilles described by Homer, of Hercules, described by Hesioc, and of Alcides described by Virgil.

Other famous bucklers described in classic story are the following:—That of Aepommon, a serpent.

Amphion (son of Poseidon or Neptune), a crane, symbol of prudence.
Achilles and his descendants, a dragon, to indicate their descent from the dragon's teeth.
Betas (4 syl.), one of the seven heroes against Theseus, a man scaling a wall.
Ector, a lion.
Idomeneus (4 syl.), a cock.
Menales, a serpent at his heart: alluding to the elopement of his wife with Paris.

Shingebis.
Parthenopaeus, one of the seven heroes, a sphinx holding a man in its claws.
Ulysses, a dolphin. Whence he is sometimes called Delphinusmeus.

Servius says that the Greeks in the siege of Troy had, as a rule, Neptune on their bucklers, and the Trojans Minerva.

It was a common custom, after a great victory, for the victorious general to hang his buckler on the walls of some temple.

The clang of shields. When a chief doomed a man to death, he struck his shield with the blunt end of his spear, by way of notice to the royal bard to begin the death-song. (See AEgis.)

"Fairer race in his arms,
The clank of shields is heard,"
Ossian: Temora, i.

Shilites (2 syl.). Those Mahomets who do not consider the Sunna, or oral law, of any authority, but look upon it as apocryphal. They wear red turbans, and are sometimes called "Red Heads." The Persians are Shiites. (Arabic, shiah, a sect.) (See SUNNITES.)

Shillelagh (pronounce she-lay-lah). An oaken sapling or cudgel (Irish).

Shilling. Said to be derived from St. Kilian, whose image was stamped on the "shillings" of Wurzburg. Of course this etymology is of no value. (Anglo-Saxon, settling or willing, a shilling.)

"According to Skeat, from the verb sceafen (to divide). The coin was originally made with a deeply-Indented cross, and could easily be divided into halves or quarters.

Shilly Shally. A corruption of "Will I, shall I," or "Shall I, shall I."

"There's no delay, they never stand shall I, shall I.
Herrings come with Delphinae daily,"
Taylor's Works, ii. 1 (1620).

Shim'el (2 syl.), in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is designed for Slingsby Bethel, the lord mayor.

"Shimel, whose oath did early promise bring,
Of zeal to God and hatred to his king;
But weakly from expensive sins refrain,
And never broke the Shimel but for gain."
Part i, lines 548-551.

Shit' nar. The land of the Chaldees.

Shindy. A row, a disturbance. To kick up a shindy, to make a row. (Gipsy, chinda, a quarrel.)

Shin'gebis, in North American Indian mythology, is a diver who dared the North Wind to single combat. The Indian Boreas rated him for staying in his dominions after he had routed away the flowers, and driven off the sea-gulls and herons. Shin'gebis laughed at him, and the North Wind went at night and tried to blow down his hut and put out his fire. As he could not do this, he defied the diver to come forth and wrestle with him. Shingibins obeyed the summons, and sent the blusterer bowling to his home. (Longfellow: Hiawatha.) (See KABIBONUKA.)

Ship (the device of Paris). Sauval says, "L’île de la cité est faite comme un grand navire enfoncé dans la rade, et échoué au fil de l’eau vers le milieu de la Seine." This form of a ship struck the heraldic scribes, who, in the latter half of the Middle Ages, emblazoned it in the shield of the city. (See VENUS.
When my ship comes home. When my fortune is made. The allusion is to the argosies returning from foreign parts laden with rich freights.

Ship Letters. These are to indicate when a ship is fully laden, and this depends on its destination.

F.W. (Fresh Water line), i.e. it may be laden till this mark touches the water when loading in a fresh-water dock or river.

I.S. (Indian Summer line). It was to be loaded to this point in the Indian seas in summer time.

S. The summer draught in the Mediterranean.

W. The winter draught in the Mediterranean.

Ship-shape. As methodically arranged as things in a ship; in good order. When a vessel is sent out temporarily rigged, it is termed "jury-rigged" (i.e. iour-y, meaning pro tem., for the day or time being). Her rigging is completed while at sea, and when the jury-rigging has been duly changed for ship-rigging, the vessel is in "ship-shape," i.e. due or regular order.

Ship of the Desert. The camel.

"Three thousand camels his rank pastures fed, Arabia’s wandering ships, for traffic bred."

Ships. There are three ships often confounded, viz. the Great Harry, the Regent, and the Henry Grâce de Dieu.

The Great Harry was built in the third year of Henry VII. (1488.) It was a two-decker with three masts, and was accidentally burnt at Woolwich in 1553.

The Regent was burnt in 1512 in an engagement with the French.

The Henry Grâce de Dieu was built at Erith in 1515. It had three decks and four masts. It was named Edward, after the death of Henry VIII. in 1547. There is no record of its destruction.

"Though we are not acquainted with all the particular ships that formed the navy of Henry VIII., we know that among them were two very large ones, viz. the Regent, and the Henry Grâce de Dieu. The former being burnt in 1521, in an engagement with the French, occasioned Henry to build the latter."—Willet: Naval Architecture, xi. 126.

Ships of the Line. Men-of-war large enough to have a place in a line of battle. They must not have less than two decks or two complete tiers of guns.

Shipton. (See Moher.)

Shire and County. When the Saxon kings created an earl, they gave him a shire or division of land to govern. At the Norman conquest the word count superseded the title of earl, and the earldom was called a county. Even to the present hour we call the wife of an earl a countess. (Anglo-Saxon, sceaf, from scervan, to divide.)

"He comes from the shires; has a seat in the shires, etc.—in those English counties which terminate in "shire": a belt running from Devonshire and Hampshire in a north-east direction. In a general way it means the midland counties.

"Anglesoy in Wales, and twelve counties of England, do not terminate in "shire."

Shire Horses originally meant horses bred in the midland and eastern shires of England, but now mean any draught-horses of a certain character which can show a registered pedigree. The sire and dam, with a minute description of the horse itself, its age, marks, and so on, must be shown in order to prove the claim of a "shire horse." Shire horses are noted for their great size, muscular power, and beauty of form; stallions to serve cart mares.

Clydesdale horses are Scotch draught-horses, not equal to shire horses in size, but of great endurance.

A hackney is not a thoroughbred, but nearly so, and makes the best roadster, hunter, and carriage-horse. Its action is showy, and its pace good. A first-class roadster will trot a mile in two and a half minutes. American trotters sometimes exceed this record. The best hackneys are produced from thorough sires mated with half-bred mares.

Shirt. (See Nessus.)

Shirt for enqun. When Sultan Saladin died, he commanded that no ceremony should be used but this: A priest was to carry his shirt on a lance, and say:
"Saladin, the conqueror of the East, carries nothing with him of all his wealth and greatness, save a shirt for his shroud and ensign." (Knolles: Turkish History.)

Close sit my shirt, but closer my skin—
i.e. My property is dear to me, but dearer my life; my belongings sit close to my heart, but "Ego proximus mihi."

Shittim Wood. The acacia.

"The scented acacia of Palestine furnished the shittim wood so much esteemed by the ancient Jews."—Bible Flowers, p. 142.

Shivering Mountain. Mam Tor, a hill on the Peak of Derbyshire; so called from the waste of its mass by "shivering,"—that is, breaking away in "shivers" or small pieces. This shivering has been going on for ages, as the hill consists of alternate layers of shale and gritstone. The former, being soft, is easily reduced to powder, and, as it crumbles away, small "shivers" of the gritstone break away from want of support.

Shoddy properly means the flue and stuff thrown off from cloth in the process of weaving. This flue, being mixed with new wool, is woven into a cloth called shoddy—i.e. cloth made of the flue "shod" or thrown off. Shoddy is also made of old garments torn up and re-spun. The term is used for any loose, thin, slack cloth, and metaphorically for literature of an inferior character compiled from other works. (Shed, provincial pret. "shod;" shoot, obsolete pret. shotten.)

Shoddy characters. Persons of tarnished reputation, like cloth made of shoddy or refuse wool.

Shoe. (See Chopine.)

Shoe. It was at one time thought unlucky to put on the left shoe before the right, or to put either shoe on the wrong foot. It is said that Augustus Cesar was nearly assassinated by a mutiny one day when he put on his left shoe first.

"Auguste, cet empeureur qui gouverne avec tant de raison que le regne fut si florissant, restoit immobile et consterne lorsqu'il arrivoit par mesure de mesure le soulier droit au pied gauche, et le soulier gauche au pied droit. St. Petz.

A shoe too large trips one up. A Latin proverb, "Calceus major subtortit." An empire too large fails to pieces; a business too large comes to grief; an ambition too large fails altogether.

Loose thy shoe from off thy foot, for the place wheron thou standest is holy (Josh. v. 15). Loosening the shoe is a mark of respect in the East, among Moslems and Hindus, to the present hour. The Mussulman leaves his slippers at the door of the mosque. The Mahometan moonshee comes barefooted into the presence of his superiors. The governor of a town, in making a visit of ceremony to a European visitor, leaves his slippers at the tent entrance, as a mark of respect. There are two reasons for this custom:

(1) It is a mark of humility, the shoe being a sign of dignity, and the shoeless foot a mark of servitude. (2) Leather, being held to be an unclean thing, would contaminate the sacred floor and offend the insulted idol. (See Sandal.)

Plucking off the shoe among the Jews, smoking a pipe together among the Indians, breaking a straw together among the Teutons, and shaking hands among the English, are all ceremonies to confirm a bargain, now done by "earnest money."

Put on the right shoe first. One of the auditions of Pythagoras was this: "When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot, but when about to step into a bath, let your left foot enter first." Iamblichus says the hidden meaning is that worthy actions should be done heartily, but base ones should be avoided. (Protreptics, symbol xii.)

Throwing the wedding-shoe. It has long been a custom in England, Scotland, and elsewhere, to throw an old shoe, or several shoes, at the bride and bridgroom when they quit the bride's home, after the wedding breakfast, or when they go to church to get married. Some think this represents an assault and refers to the ancient notion that the bridgroom carried off the bride with force and violence. Others look upon it as a relic of the ancient law and exchange, implying that the parents of the bride give up henceforth all right of dominion to their daughter. This was a Jewish custom. Thus, in Deut. xxxv. 5-10 we read that the widow refused by the surviving brother, asserted her independence by "loosing his shoe;" and in the story of Ruth we are told "that it was the custom" in exchange to deliver a shoe in token of renunciation. When Boaz, therefore, became possessed of his lot, the kinman's kinsman indicated his assent by giving Boaz his shoe. When the Emperor Vladimire proposed marriage to the daughter of Reginald, she rejected him, saying, "I will not take off my shoe to the son of a slave," Luther being at a wedding, told the bridegroom that he had placed the husband's shoe on the head of the bed, "afin qu'il prit ainsi la domination et le gouvernement." (Michel : Life of Luther.)

In Anglo-Saxon marriages the father delivered the bride's shoe to the bridegroom, who touched her with it on the head to show his authority.

In Turkey the bridegroom, after marriage, is chased by the guests, who either administer blows by way of adieu, or pull him with slippers. (Thirty Years in the Harem, p. 350.)

Another man's shoes. "To stand in another man's shoes." To occupy the place or lay claim to the honours of another. Among the ancient Northmen, when a man adopted a son, the person adopted put on the shoes of the adopter. (Brayley : Graphic Illustrator ; 1874.)

In the tale of Reynard the Fox (fourteenth century), Master Reynard, having turned the tables on Sir Bruin the Bear, asked the queen to let him have the shoes of the disgraced minister; so Bruin's shoes were torn off and put upon Reynard, the new favourite.

Another pair of shoes. Another matter.

"But how a world that notes his [the Prince of Wales'] daily doings—the everlasting round of wear fashion, the health-returnees, speeches, interviewings—can grudge him some relief, without compunction, there's quite another pair of shoes."—Punch, 11th June, 1891.

Dead men's shoes. Waiting or looking for dead men's shoes. Counting on some advantage to which you will succeed when the present possessor is dead.

"A man without sandals" was a proverbial expression among the Jews for a prodigal, from the custom of giving one's sandals in confirmation of a bargain. (See Deut. xxv. 9, Ruth iv. 7.)

Over shoes, over boots. In for a penny, in for a pound.

"Where true courage roots,
The proverb says, 'once over shoes, over boots.'"—Taylor's Works, ii. 146 (1684).

To die in one's shoes. To die on the scaffold.

"And there's Mr. Fuse, and Lieutenant Tregoose, And there is Sir Carnaby Jenks, of the Blues, All come to see a man die in his shoes."—Barham.

To shake in one's shoes. To be in a state of nervous terror.

"To step into another man's shoes. To take the office or position previously held by another.

"That will do, sir,' he thundered, 'that will do. It is very evident now what would happen if you stepped into my shoes."—Good Words, 1697.

Waiting for my shoes. Hoping for my death. Amongst the ancient Jews the transfer of an inheritance was made by the new party pulling off the shoe of the possessor. (See Ruth iv. 7.)

"Whose shoes I am not worthy to bear (Matt. iii. 11). This means, 'I am not worthy to be his humblest slave.' It was the business of a slave recently purchased to loan and carry his master's sandals. (John : Archeologica Biblica.)

Shoe-loosened. A man without shoes; an unnatural kinsman, a selfish prodigal (Hebrew). If a man refused to marry his brother's widow, the woman pulled off his shoe in the presence of the elders, spat in his face, and called him "shoe-loosened." (Deut. xxv. 9.)

Shoe Pinches. No one knows where the shoe pinches like the wearer. This was said by a Roman sage who was blamed for divorcing his wife, with whom he seemed to live happily.

"For, God it wot, he eat ful still and song,
When that his scho ful bitterly him wrong."—Chaucer : Canterbury Tales, 6254.

Shoe a Goose (To). To engage in a silly and fruitless task.

Shoe the Anchor (To). To cover the flukes of an anchor with a broad triangular piece of plank, in order that the anchor may have a stronger hold in soft ground. The French have the same phrase: enoser l'ancre.

Shoe the Cobbler (To). To give a quick peculiar movement with the front foot in sliding.

Shoe the Horse (To). (French, Ferrer la main.) Means to cheat one's employer out of a small sum of money. The expression is derived from the ancient practice of grooms, who charged their masters for "shoeing," but pocketed the money themselves.

Shoe the Wild Colt (To). To exact a fine called "footing" from a newcomer, who is called the "colt." Colt is a common synonym for a greenhorn, or a youth not broken in. Thus Shakespeare says—"Ay, that's a colt indeed, for he doth nothing but talk of his horse."—Merchant of Venice, i. 2.

Shoes. Scarpa's shoes for curing club feet, etc. Devised by Antonio Scarpa, an Italian anatmist.

Shoemakers. The patron saints of shoemakers are St. Crispin and his brother Crispian, who supported themselves by making shoes while they preached to the people of Gaul and Britain. In compliment to these saints the trade of shoemaking is called "the gentle craft."

Shoot the Moon (Teo). To remove house furniture by night to avoid distraint.

Shoot the Sun (Teo). To take a nautical observation.

"Unless a man understood how to handle his vessel, it would be very little use him being able to 'shoot the sun,' as sailors call it."—Notes and Queries, November 19th, 1862, p. 303.

Shooting-iron (A). A gun.

"Catch old Stripes [a tiger] coming near my galley, if he thought a 'shooting-iron' anywhere about."—Curneill, July, 1833 (My Tiger Watch).

Shooting-stars, called in ancient legends the "fiery tears of St. Lawrence," because one of the periodic swarms of these meteors is between the 9th and 14th of August, about the time of St. Lawrence's festival, which is on the 10th.

Shooting stars are said by the Arabs to be firebrands hurled by the angels against the inquisitive Jinns or Genii, who are for ever clambering up on the constellations to peep into heaven.

Shop. To talk shop. To talk about one's affairs or business, to illustrate by one's business, as when Ollipod the apothecary talks of a uniform with rhubarb-coloured facings.

Shop-lifting is secretly purloining goods from a shop. Dekker speaks of the lifting-law—i.e. the law against theft. (Gothic, kliffan, to steal; klifius, a thief; Latin, levare, to disburden.)

Shore (Jane). Sir Thomas More says, "She was well-born, honestly brought up, and married somewhat too soon to a wealthy yeoman." The tragedy of Jane Shore is by Nicholas Rowe.

Shoreditch, according to tradition, is so called from Jane Shore, who, it is said, died there in a ditch. This tale comes from a ballad in Pepys' collection; but the truth is, it receives its name from Sir John de Soerdich, lord of the manor in the reign of Edward III.

" I could not get one bit of bread Whereby my hunger might be fed... So, weary of my life, at length I yielded up my vital strength Within a ditch... which since that day is Shoreditch called, as writers say."

Duke of Shoreditch. The most successful of the London archers received this playful title.

"Good king, make not good Lord of Lincoln Duke of Shoreditch!"—The Poor Man's Petition to the King. (1833.)

Shorne (Sir John) or Master John Shorne, well known for his feat of conjuring the devil into a boot. He was one of the uncanonised saints, and was prayed to in cases ofague. It seems that he was a devout man, and rector of North Marston, in Buckinghamshire, at the close of the thirteenth century. He blessed a well, which became the resort of multitudes and brought in a yearly revenue of some £500.

"To Master John Shorne, that blessed man borne.
For the auge to him we apply
Which jugulaire with a bote; Ibeschrewe his herte rote
That will trust him, and it be 1."

_Fantastico of Idolatrie._

Short. My name is Short. I'm in a hurry and cannot wait.

"Well, but let us hear the wishes (said the old man); my name is short, and I cannot stay much longer.--"—Aesop: Fairy Tales of the Irish Poets, p. 246.

Short Stature (Noted Men of). Aesopus, commander of the Roman army in the days of Valentinian; Agesilasus (5 syl.) "Statura fuit humilis, et corpore exiguo, et claudibus altero pede" (Nepos); Alexander the Great, scarcely middle height; Attila, "the scourge of God," broad-shouldered, thick-set, sinewy, and short; Byron, Cervantes, Claverhouse, Condé the Great, Cowper, Cromwell, Sir Francis Drake, Admiral Keppel (called "Little Kepple"), Louis XIV., barely 5 feet 5 inches; Marshal Luxembourg, nicknamed "the Little"; Mehemet Ali, Angelo; Napoleon I., le petit caporal, was, according to his school certificate, 5 feet 6 inches, Lord Nelson, St. Paul, Pepin le Bref, Philip of Macedon (scarcely middle height), Richard Savage, Shakespeare; Socrates was stumpy; Theodore II., King of the Goths, stout, short of stature, very strong (so says Cassiodorus); Timon the Tartar, self-described as lame, decrepit, and of little weight; Dr. Isaac Watts, etc.

Shot. Hand out your shot or Hoon with your shot—your reckoning or quota, your money. (Saxon, sot; Dutch, schot.) (See SCOT AND LOT.)

"As the fund of our pleasure, let us each pay his shot." Ben Jonson.

_He shot wide of the mark._ He was altogether in error. The allusion is to shooting at the mark or bull's-eye in archery, but will now apply to our modern ride practice.

Shot in the locker. I haven't a shot in the locker—a penny in my pocket or in my purse. If a sailor says there is not a shot in the locker, he means the ship is wholly without ammunition, powder and shot have all been expended.

Shot Window (A)—i.e. shot-out or projecting window, and not, as Ritson explains the word, a “window which opens and shuts.” Similarly, a projecting part of a building is called an out-shot. The aperture to give light to a dark staircase is called a “shot window.”

“Mrs. Hugh flew to the shot window... ‘St. Mary,’ sweet lady, here come two well-mounted salamanders.”—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chaps. xiv. and xvi.

Shotten Herring. A lean spiritless creature, a Jack-o’-Lent, like a herring that has shot or ejected its spawn. Herrings gutted and dried are so called also.

“Though they like shotten-herrings are to see, Yet shoot at them, and laugh at their teeth they be, That two of them, like greedy curmudgeons, Devour more then sixe honest Protestants.”—Taylor’s Works, iii. 5.

Shoulder. Shoving the cold shoulder. Receiving without cordiality some one who was once on better terms with you. (See Cold.)

“The government shall be upon his shoulders.” (Isaiah ix. 6). The allusion is to the key slung on the shoulder of Jewish stewards on public occasions, and as a key is emblematic of government and power, the metaphor is very striking.

Straight from the shoulder. With full force. A boxing term.

“He was letting them have it straight from the shoulder.”—T. Pytll: Lady Delmar, chap. v.

Shovel-board. A game in which three counters were shoved or slid over a smooth board; a game very popular in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: the table itself, and sometimes even the counters were so called. Slender speaks of “two Edward shovel-boards.” (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 1.)

Show. Show him an egg, and instantly the whole air is full of feathers. Said of a very sanguine man.

Shrew-mouse. A small inactivorous mammal, resembling a mouse in form. It was supposed to have the power of injuring cattle by running over them; and to provide a remedy our forefathers used to plug the creature into a hole made in an ash-tree, any branch of which would cure the mischief done by the mouse. (Anglo-Saxon, sewenca, a shrew-mouse; mouse is expletive.)

_Shrinking Sisterhood (The). Women who clamour about “women’s rights.”

“By Jove, I suppose my life wouldn’t be worth a moment’s purchase if I made public these sentiments of mine at a meeting of the Shrinking Sisterhood.”—The World, 25th February, 1882, p. 25.

Shrimp. A child, a puny little fellow, in the same ratio to a man as a shrimp to a lobster. Fry is also used for children. (Anglo-Saxon, serine-an, to shrink; Danish, skrimp; Dutch, krimpens.)

“It cannot be this week and writhed shrimp Would strike such terror to his enemies.”—Shakespeare: i Henry VI, ii. 3.

Shropeshire. A contraction of Shrewsbury-shire, the Saxon Scrobbesbury (shrub-borough), corrupted by the Normans into Stoppes-burie, whence our Salop.

Shrovetide Cocks. Shrove Tuesday used to be the great “Derby Day” of cock-fighting in England.

“Or merrylest heat, like shrovetide cocks with hats.”—Peter Fantar: Snapes for Paneters.

Shunamite’s House (The). An inn kept for the entertainment of the preachers at Paul’s Cross. These preachers were invited by the bishop, and were entertained by the Corporation of London from Thursday before the day of preaching, to the following Thursday morning. (Maitland: London, ii. 949.)

Shunt. A railway term. (Anglo-Saxon, sewn-run, to shun.)

Shut up. Hold your tongue. Shut up your mouth.

Shy. To have a shy at anything. To fling at it, to try and shoot it.

Shylock. The grasping Jew, who “would kill the thing he hates.” (Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice.)

Shylock (A). A grasping money-lender. (See above.)

“Respectable people withdrew from the trade, and the money-lending business was entirely in the hands of the Shylocks... Those who had to borrow coin were obliged to submit to the exorbitant rates of the Shylocks, from whose not once caught, there was little chance of escape.”—A. Burnett-Huke: Fire Trade in Capital, chap. vii.

Si, the seventh note in music, was not introduced till the seventeenth century. The original scale introduced by Guido d’Arezzo consisted of only six notes. (See Arabitnian Syllables.)

St Quis. A notice to all whom it may concern, given in the parish church before ordination, that a resident means to offer himself as a candidate for holy orders; and St Quis—i.e. if anyone knows any just cause or impediment Siamese Twins: Yoke-fellows, inseparables; so called from two youths (Eng and Chang), born of Chinese parents at Bang Mecklong. Their bodies were united by a band of flesh, stretching from breast-bone to breast-bone. They married two sisters, and had offspring. (1825-1872.)

Siamese Twins. The Biddenden Maids, born 1100, had distinct bodies, but were joined by the hips and shoulders. They lived to be thirty-four years of age.

Sibberidge (s. yl.). Banns of marriage. (Anglo-Saxon sibbe, alliance; whence the old English word sibrede, relationship, kindred.) (See Gossir.)

"For every man it schulde drede
And Nameliche in his sibrede.
Gower: Confessio Amantis.

Sibyl. (See Amalthaea.)

Sibyls. Plato speaks of only one (the Erythrean); Martian Capella says there were two, the Erythrean and the Phrygian; the former being the famous "Cumean Sibyl:" Solfius and Jackson, in his Chronologic Antiquitates, maintains, on the authority of Ælian, that there were four—the Erythrean, the Samian, the Egyptian, and the Sardian; Varro tells us there were ten, viz. the Cumean (who sold the books to Tarquin), the Delphic, Egyptian, Erythrean, Hellespontine, Libyan, Persian, Phrygian, Samian, and Tiburtine.

The name of the Cumean sibyl was Amalthaea.

"How know we but that she may be an eleventh sibyl or a second Cassandra?"—Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, vii. 16.

Sibyls. The medieval monks reckoned twelve Sibyls, and gave to each a separate prophecy and distinct emblem:

(1) The Lib'yan Sibyl: "The day shall come when men shall see the King of all living things." Emblem, a lighted taper.

(2) The Sa'mian Sibyl: "The Rich One shall be born of a pure virgin." Emblem, a rose.

(3) The Cumean Sibyl: "Jesus Christ shall come from heaven, and live and reign in poverty on earth." Emblem, a crown.

(4) The Cumean Sibyl: "God shall be born of a pure virgin, and hold converse with sinners." Emblem, a cradle.

(5) The Erythrean Sibyl: "Jesus Christ, Son of God, the Saviour." Emblem, a horn.

(6) The Persian Sibyl: "Satan shall be overcomen by a true prophet." Emblem, a dragon under the Sibyl's feet, and a lantern.

(7) The Tiburtine Sibyl: "The Highest shall descend from heaven, and a virgin be shown in the valleys of the deserts." Emblem, a dove.

(8) The Delphic Sibyl: "The Prophet born of the virgin shall be crowned with thorns." Emblem, a crown of thorns.

(9) The Phrygian Sibyl: "Our Lord shall rise again." Emblem, a banner and a cross.

(10) The European Sibyl: "A virgin and her Son shall flee into Egypt." Emblem, a sword.

(11) The Agrippine Sibyl: "Jesus Christ shall be outraged and scourged." Emblem, a whip.

(12) The Hallexpontine Sibyl: "Jesus Christ shall suffer shame upon the cross." Emblem, a T cross.

This list of prophecies is of the sixteenth century, and is manifestly a clumsy forgery or mere monkish legend. (See below, Sibylline Verses.)

The most famous of the ten sibyls was Amalthaea, of Cumae in Æo'tia, who offered her nine books to Tarquin the Proud. The offer being rejected, she burnt three of them; and after the lapse of twelve months, offered the remaining six at the same price. Again being refused, she burnt three more, and after a similar interval asked the same price for the remaining three. The sum demanded was now given, and Amalthaea never appeared again. (Liv.)

Sibyl. The Cumean sibyl was the conductor of Virgil to the infernal regions. (Æn. vi.)

Sibyl. A fortune-teller.

"How they will fare it needs a sibyl to say."—The Times.

Sibylline Books. The three surviving books of the Sibyl Amalthaea were preserved in a stone chest underground in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, and committed to the charge of custodians chosen in the same manner as the high priests. The number of custodians was at first two, then ten, and ultimately fifteen. The books were destroyed by fire when the Capitol was burnt (A.D. 670).

Sibylline Books. A collection of poetical utterances in Greek, compiled in the second century (138-167). The collection is in eight books, relates to Jesus Christ, and is entitled Oracles Sibyllina.

Sibylline Leaves. The Sibylline prophecies were written in Greek, upon palm-leaves. (Ivar.)
Sibylline Verses. When the Sibylline books were destroyed (see above), all the floating verses of the several Sibyls were carefully collected and deposited in the new temple of Jupiter. Augustus had some 2,000 of these verses destroyed as spurious, and placed the rest in two gilt cases, under the base of the statue of Apollo, in the temple on the Palatine Hill; but the whole perishied when the city was burnt in the reign of Nero. (See Sibyls [of the medieval monks].)

Sicula pedibus [with dry feet]. Metaphorically, without notice.

"It may be worth noticing that both Mrs. Shelley and Mr. Rometti pass over the line sicula pedibus."—Notes and Queries (30th May, 1863, p. 417).

Sic (1 syl.). A sizing, an allowance of bread and butter. "He'll print for a sice." In the University of Cambridge the men call the pound loaf, two inches of butter, and pot of milk allowed for breakfast, their " sizings;" and when one student breakfasts with another in the same college, the bed-maker carries his sizings to the rooms of the entertainer. (See SIZINGS.)

Sicilian Dishes (Sicula dapès) were choice foods. The best Roman cooks were Sicilians. Horace (3 Odes, i. 18) tells us that when a sword hangs over our head, as in the case of Damocles, not even "Sicula dapès dulcem elaborabunt saporem."

Sicilian Vespers. The massacre of the French in Sicily, which began at the hour of vespers on Easter Monday in 1282.

Sick Man (The). So Nicholas of Russia (in 1811) called the Ottoman Empire, which had been declining ever since 1386.

"I repeat to you, that the sick man is dying; and we must never allow such an event to take us by surprise."—Annual Register, 1853.

N.B. Don John, Governor-General of the Netherlands, writing in 1579 to Philip II. of Spain, calls the Prince of Orange "the sick man," because he was in the way, and he wanted him "finished."

"Money! the same in his butter! in the gruel with which we must cure this sick man [for spices and seasonings are expensive drugs]."—Motley: Dutch Republic, b. v. 2.

Sick as a Cat. (See SMILES.)

Sick as a Dog. (See SMILES.)

Sick as a Horse. Nausea unrelieved by vomiting. A horse is unable to vomit, because its diaphragm is not a complete partition in the abdomen, perforated only by the gullet, and against which the stomach can be compressed by the abdominal muscles, as is the case in man. Hence the nausea of a horse is more lasting and more violent. (See Notes and Queries, C. S. xii., August 16th, 1865, p. 134.)

Siddons (Mrs.). Sidney Smith says it was never without awe that he saw this tragedy queen stab the potatoes; and Sir Walter Scott tells us, while she was dining at Astebiel, he heard her declaim to the footman, "You've brought me water, boy! I asked for beer."

Side of the Angels. Punch, Dec. 10, 1864, contains a cartoon of Dиссаi, dressing for an Oxford bat masqué, as an angel, and underneath the cartoon are these words—

"The question is, is man an ape or an angel? I am on the side of the angels."—Disraeli's Oxford Speech, Friday, Nov. 22 (1844).

Sidney (Algernon), called by Thomson, in his Summer, "The British Cassius," because of his republican principles. Both disliked kings, not from their misrule, but from a dislike to monarchy. Cassius was one of the conspirators against the life of Caesar, and Sidney was one of the judges that condemned Charles I. to the block (1617-1683).

Sidney (Sir Philip). The academy figure of Prince Arthur, in Spenser's Faerie Quevne, and the poet's type of magnanimity.

Sir Philip Sidney, called by Sir Walter Raleigh "the English Petrarch," was the author of Arcadia. Queen Elizabeth called him "the jewel of her dominions;" and Thomson, in his Summer, "the plume of war." The poet refers to the battle of Zutphen, where Sir Philip received his death-wound. Being thirsty, a soldier brought him some water: but as he was about to drink he observed a wounded man eye the bottle with longing looks. Sir Philip gave the water to the wounded man, saying, "Poor fellow, thy necessity is greater than mine." Spenser laments him in the poem called Astrophel (q.v.).

Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother. Mary Herbert (née Sidney), Countess of Pembroke, poetess, etc. (Died 1621.) The line is by William Browne (1645).

Sidney-Sussex College, Cambridge, founded by Lady Frances Sidney, Countess of Sussex, in 1598.
Siegfried (2 syl.). Hero of the first part of the Nibelungen-Lied. He was the youngest son of Siegmund and Sieglinde, king and queen of the Netherlands, and was born in Rhinecastle called Xanten. He married Kriemhild, Princess of Burgundy, and sister of Günther. Günther craved his assistance in carrying off Brunhild from Island, and Siegfried succeeded by taking away her talisman by main force. This excited the jealousy of Günther, who induced Hagan, the Dane, to murder Siegfried. Hagan struck him with a sword in the only vulnerable part (between the shoulder-blades), while he stooped to quench his thirst at a fountain. (Nibelungen-Lied.)

Horny Siegfried. So called because when he slew the dragon he bathed in its blood, and became covered all over with a horny hide which was invulnerable, except in one spot between the shoulders, where a linden-leaf stuck. (Nibelungen-Lied, st. 100.)

Siegfried’s cloak of invisibility, called “tarnkappe” (tarnen, to conceal; kappe, a cloak). It not only made the wearer invisible, but also gave him the strength of twelve men. (Tarnkappe, 2 syl.)

“Tarnkapse, in which is so huge a sight of men.”—Tales of the House of Acre, 13th cent.

Sight (Far). Zarga, the Arabian heroine of the tribe Judis, could see at the distance of three days’ journey. Being asked by Hassan the secret of her long sight, she said it was due to the ore of antimony, which she reduced to powder, and applied to her eyes as a collyrium every night.

Sign your Name. It is not correct to say that the expression “signing one’s name” points to the time when persons could not write. No doubt persons who could not write made their mark in olden times as they do now, but we find over and over again in ancient documents these words: “This [grant] is signed with the sign of the cross for its greater assurance (or) greater inviolability,” and after the sign follows the name of the donor. (See Rymer’s Palaeography, vol. i. pt. i.)

Signs instead of words. A symbolic language made by gestures. Members of religious orders bound to silence, communicate with each other in this way. John, a monk, gives, in his Life of St. Osmon, a number of signs for bread, altar, beans, eggs, fish, cheese, honey, milk, cherries, onions, etc. (See Sussex Archaeological Collection, vol. iii. p. 190.)

Significavit. A writ of Chancery given by the ordinary to keep an excommunicate in prison till he submitted to the authority of the Church. The writ, which is now obsolete, used to begin with “Significavit nobis venerabilis pater,” etc. Chaucer says of his Sompnour—

“...And also were him of a significavit.”—Canterbury Tales (Prologue), 1385.
Sigrun’a. Wife of Loki. She nurses him in his cavern, but sometimes, as she carries off the poison which the serpents gorge, a portion drops on the god, and his writhings cause earthquakes. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Siegfurd. The Norse Siegfried (q.v.). He falls in love with Brynhild, but, under the influence of a love-potion, marries Gudrun, a union which brings about a volume of mischief. Siegfurd the Horned. A German romance based on a legend in the Sagas. An analysis of this legend is published by Weber in his Illustrations of Northern Antiquities. (See Siegfried, Horned.)

Silkes (Bill). A ruffian housebreaker of the lowest grade in Oliver Twist, by Charles Dickens.

Silk. (Hindu sikh, disciple.) The Sikhs were originally a religious body like the Mahometans, but in 1764 they formally assumed national independence. Since 1849 the Sikhs have been ruled by the English.

Silbury, near Marlborough. An artificial mound, 130 feet high, and covering seven acres of ground. Some say it is where “King Sel” was buried; others, that it is a corruption of Solis-bury (mound of the sun); others, that it is Sel-harrow (great tumulus), in honour of some ancient prince of Britain. The Rev. A. C. Smith is of opinion that it was erected by the Celts about B.C. 1600. There is a natural hill in the same vicinity, called St. Martin’s Nell or Sill, in whose case silt or silt means seat or throne. These etymologies of Silbury must rest on the authority of those who have suggested them.

Silchester (Berks) is Silicis castrum (flint camp), a Saxon-Latin form of the Roman Calleva or Galleva. Galleva is the Roman form of the British Great kawr (great wall), so called from its wall, the ruins of which are still striking. Leland says, “On that wall grow some oaks of ten cart-load the piece.” According to tradition King Arthur was crowned here; and Ninnius asserts that the city was built by Constantius, father of Constantine the Great.

Silence gives Consent. Latin, “Qui tacet consentivit videtur;” Greek, “Auto de to nigan homologountos eisn sou” (Euripides); French, “Assez consent qui ne dit mot;” Italian, “Chi tace confessa.”

Sileneus. The foster-father of Bacchus, fond of music, and a prophet, but indomitably lazy, wanton, and given to debauch. He is described as a jovial old man, with bald head, pug nose, and face like Bardolph’s.

Silhouette (3 syll.). A black profile, so called from Etienne de Silhouette, Contrôleur des Finances, 1757, who made great savings in the public expenditure of France. Some say the black portraits were called Silhouettes in ridicule; others assert that Silhouette devised this way of taking likenesses to save expense.

Silk. Received silk, applied to a barrister, means that he has obtained licence to wear a silk gown in the law courts, having obtained the degree or title of sergeant.

Silk Gown. A queen’s counsel. So called because his canonical robe is a black silk gown. That of an ordinary barrister is made of stuff or prunello.

Silk Purse. You cannot make a silk purse of a sow’s ear. “You cannot make a horn of a pig’s tail.” A sow’s ear may somewhat resemble a purse, and a curled pig’s tail may somewhat resemble a twisted horn, but a sow’s ear cannot be made into a silk purse, nor a pig’s tail into a cow’s horn.

Silken Thread. In the kingdom of Lilliput, the three great prizes of honour are “fine silk threads six inches long, one blue, another red, and a third green.” The emperor holds a stick in his hands, and the candidates “jump over it or creep under it, backwards or forwards, as the stick indicates,” and he who does so with the greatest agility is rewarded with the blue ribbon, the second best with the red cordon, and the third with the green. The thread is girt about their loins, and no ribbon of the Legion of Honour, or Knight of the Garter, is won more worthily or worn more proudly. (Gulliver’s Travels.)

Silly is the German selig (blessed), whence the infant Jesus is termed “the harmless silly babe,” and sheep are called “silly,” meaning harmless or innocent. As the “holy” are easily taken in by worldly cunning, the word came to signify “gullible,” “foolish.” (See Simplicity.)
Silly Season (The), for daily newspapers, is when Parliament is not in session, and all sorts of "silly" stuff are vamped-up for padding. Also called the "Big Gooseberry Season," because paragraphs are often inserted on this subject.

Silurian—that is, Hereford, Monmouth, Radnor, Brecon, and Glamorgau. The "sparkling wines of the Silurian vale" are cider and perry.

"From Silurian vale, high-sparkling wines.\nFrom in transparent floods."

Thomson: Autumn.

Silurian Rocks. A name given by Sir R. Murchison to what miners call gray-wacke, and Werner termed transition rocks. Sir Roderrick called them Silurian because it was in the region of the ancient Silures that he investigated them.

Silva na. A maga or fata in Tasso's Amadigi, where she is made the guardian spirit of Alido'ro.

Silvanella. A beautiful maga or fata in Bojardo, who raised a tomb over Narcissus, and then dissolved into a fountain. (Lib. ii. xvii. 56, etc.)

Silver was, by the ancient alchemists, called Diana or the Moon.

Silver. The Frenchman employs the word silev to designate money, the wealthy Englishman uses the word gold, and the poorer old Roman brass (as).

Silver and gold articles are marked with five marks: the maker's private mark, the standard or assay mark, the hall mark, the duty mark, and the date mark. The standard mark states the proportion of silver, to which figure is added a lion passant for England, a harp crowned for Ireland, a thistle for Edinburg, and a lion rampant for Glasgow. (For the other marks, see Mark.)

Silver Cooper. A kidnapper. "To play the silver cooper," to kidnap.

A cooper is one who coops up another.

"You rob me, you murder, and you want me to play the silver cooper."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxi.

Silver Fork School. Those novelists who are sticklers for etiquette and the graces of society, such as Theodore Hook, Lady Blessington, Mrs. Trollope, and Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton (Lord Lytton).

Silver-hand. Nuad, the chieftain who led back the tribe of the Danaans from Scotland to Ireland, whence they had migrated. Nuad of the Silver-hand had an artificial hand of silver made by Cred, the goldsmith, to supply the loss sustained from a wound in the battle of Moytura. Miach, son of Dian Kech, set it on the wrist. (O'Flaherty: Orygria, part iii. chap. x.) (See IEON HAND.)

Silver Lining. The prospect of better days, the promises of happier times. The allusion is to Milton's Comus, where the lady lost in the wood resolves to hope on, and sees a "sable cloud turn forth its silver lining to the night."

Silver Pheasant. A beautiful young lady of the high aristocracy.

"One would think you were a silver pheasant, you give yourself such airs."—Ouida: Under Two Flags.

Silver Spoon. Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to luck and wealth. The allusion is to silver spoons given as prizes at christenings. The lucky man is born with it in his mouth, and needs not stop to earn it.

"One can see, young fellow, that you were born with a silver spoon in your mouth."—Longman's Magazine, 1860.

Silver Star of Love. When Gama was tempest-tossed through the machinations of Bacchus, the "Silver Star of Love" appeared to him, caressed the sea, and restored the elements to harmony again.

The sky and ocean blending, each on fire,
Seemed as all nature struggled to expire;\nWhen now the Silver Star of Love appeared,
Bright in the East her radiant front she reared."—Camoes: Lusiad, bk. vi.

Silver Streak. The British Channel.

"Steam power has much lessened the value of the silver streak as a defensive agent."—Nepaper, 1895, November, 1945.

Silver Tongued. William Bates, the Puritan divine. (1625-1699.)

Anthony Hammond, the poet, called Silver-tongue. (1668-1738.)

Henry Smith, preacher. (1550-1600.)

Joshua Sylvester, translator of Du Bartas. (1663-1618.)

Silver Trumpet. A smooth-tongued orator. A rough, unpolished speaker is called a ram's horn.

Silver Weapon. With silver weapons you may conquer the world, is what the Delphic oracle said to Philip of Macedon, when he went to consult it. Philip, acting on this advice, sat down before a fortress which his staff pronounced to be impregnable. "You shall see," said the king, "how an ass laden with gold will find an entrance."

Silver Wedding. The twenty-fifth anniversary, when, in Germany, the woman has a silver wreath presented her.
On the fiftieth anniversary, or GOLDEN WEDDING, the wreath is of gold.

Silver of Guthrum, or Guthrum's Lane. Fine silver; so called because in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the principal gold- and silver-smiths resided there.

Silverside of Beef (The). The upper side of a round, which not only shows the shining tissue uppermost, but, when carved cold has a silvery appearance. Generally boiled.

Simeon (St.) is usually depicted as bearing in his arms the infant Jesus, or receiving Him in the Temple.

Similes in common use:

- BALD as a coat.
- BITTER as a gall, as sour.

White as driven snow, as milk, as a swan, as a sheet, as chalk.
Wise as a serpent, as Solomon.
Yellow as a guinea, as gold, as saffron.

Simili Similibus Curantur. Like cures like. (See under Hire: Take a hair of the dog that bit you.)

Simms' Hole. The cavity which Captain John C. Simms maintained existed at the North and South Poles.

Simnel Cakes. Rich cakes eaten in Lancashire in Mid-Lent. Simmel is the German simnel, a manchet or roll; Danish and Norwegian simle; Swedish, simla. In Somersetshire a teacake is called a simlin. A simnel cake is a cake manchet, or rich simmel. The eating of these cakes in Mid-Lent is in commemoration of the banquet given by Joseph to his brethren, which forms the first lesson of Mid-Lent Sunday, and the feeding of five thousand, which forms the gospel of the day. (See Mid-Lent.)

Simon (St.). is represented with a saw in his hand, in allusion to the instrument of his martyrdom. He sometimes bears fish in the other hand, in allusion to his occupation as a fishmonger.

Simon Magnus. Isidore tells us that Simon Magnus died in the reign of Nero, and adds that he (Simon) had proposed a dispute with Peter and Paul, and had promised to fly up to heaven. He succeeded in rising high into the air, but at the prayers of the two apostles he was cast down to earth by the evil spirits who had enabled him to rise into the air.

Milman, in his History of Christianity, vol. ii. p. 51, tells another story. He says that Simon offered to be buried alive, and declared that he would reappear on the third day. He was actually buried in a deep trench, "but to this day," says Hippolytus, "his disciples have failed to witness his resurrection."

Simon Pure. The real man. In Mrs. Centlivre's Bold Stroke for a Wife, a Colonel Feignwell passes himself off for Simon Pure, and wins the heart of Miss Lovely. No sooner does he get the assent of her guardian, than the veritable Quaker shows himself, and proves, beyond a doubt, he is the real Simon Pure.

Simony. Buying and selling church livings; any unlawful traffic in holy things. So called from Simon Magus, who wanted to purchase the "gift of the Holy Ghost," that he might have the power of working miracles. (Acts viii. 9-23.)

Simony. The friar in the tale of Reynard the Fox; so called from Simon Magus.

Simple (Thc). Charles III. of France. (879, 893-929.)

Simplex est. (See Battersea.)

Simple Simon. A simpleton. The character is introduced in the well-known nursery tale, the author of which is unknown.

Simplicity is sine plica, without a fold; as duplicity is duplex plica, a double fold. Conduct "without a fold" is straightforward, but thought without a fold is mere childlihood. It is "tor- tuousity of thought" that constitutes philosophic wisdom, and "simplicity of thought" that prepares the mind for faith.

"The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable."—Lamb and Giber: The Provoked Husband.

Simpson Road. Commenced in 1800 by Napoleon, and finished in 1806. It leads over a shoulder of what is called "the Pass of the Simplon" (Switzerland).

Sin, according to Milton, is twin-keeper with Death of the gates of Hell. She sprang full-grown from the head of Satan.

"... Woman to the waist, and fair,
But ending foul in many a scaly fold,
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed
With mortal song."—Paradise Lost, ii. 450-452.

Original sin. (See Adam.)

Sin-eaters. Persons hired at funerals in ancient times, to take upon themselves the sins of the deceased, that the soul might be delivered from purgatory.

"Notice was given to an old squire before the door of the house, when some of the family came out, and dressed him with a cracket [low stool], on which he sat down facing the door; then they gave him a great which he put in his pocket, a crore of bread which he ate, and a bowl of wine which he drank off at a draught. After this he got up from the cricket and pronounced the case and rest of the soul departed, for which he would pawn his own soul."—Bagford’s letter on Leland’s Collections, 17. 70.

Since’re (2 syll.) properly means without wax (sine cera). The allusion is to the Roman practice of concealing flaws in pottery with wax, or to honey from which all the wax has been extracted. (See Trench: On the Study of Words, lect. vii. p. 322.)

Sin’drum. The ancient name of the river Indus. (Sanskrit, syand, to flow.)

Sin’den. A thin manufacture of the Middle Ages used for dresses and hangings; also a little round piece of linen or lint for dressing the wound left by trepanning. (Du Cange gives its etymology Cymru tenus; but the Greek muston means "fine Indian cloth." India is Sindi, and China Sina.)

Sine Die (Latin). No time being fixed; indefinitely in regard to time. When a proposal is deferred sine die, it is deferred without fixing a day for its reconsideration, which is virtually "for ever."

Sine qua Non. An indispensable condition. Latin, Sine qua non; vulg. esse or fieri (that without which [the thing] cannot be, or be done).

S’neour [si-ne-kur]. An enjoyment of the money attached to a benefice without having the trouble of the "cure"; also applied to any office to which a salary is attached without any duties to perform. (Latin, sine cura, without cure, or care.)

Sinews of War. Money, which buys the sinews, and makes them act vigorously. Men will not fight without wages, and the materials of war must be paid for.

Sing a Song o’ Sixpence. (See Macaronic Verse.)

Sing my Music, and not Yours, said Guglielmi to those who introduced their own ornaments into his operas, so eminently distinguished for their simplicity and purity. (1727-1804.)

Sing Old Rose. Sing Old Rose and burn the bellows. "Old Rose" was the title of a song now unknown; thus, Izaak Walton (1590-1683) says, "Let’s sing Old Rose." Burn the bellows is said to be a schoolboy’s perversion of burn libello. At breaking-up time the boys might say, "Let’s sing Old Rose [a popular song], and burn our schoolbooks" (libello). This does not accord with the words of the well-known catch, which evidently means "throw aside all implements of work."

"Now we’re met like jovial fellows,
Let us call a wise man to give us counsel.
Sing Old Rose and burn the bellows."
Sing Out. To cry or squall from chagrin.
To sing small. To cease boasting and assume a lower tone.

Sing-sun-hay. A lake of Thibet, famous for its gold sands.
"Bright are the waters of Sing-sun-hay
And the golden floods that thitherward flow."—Thomas Moore: "Paradise and the Peri."

Singing Apple was a ruby apple on a stem of amber. It had the power of persuading anyone to anything merely by its odour, and enabled the possessor to write verses, make people laugh or cry, and itself sang so as to ravish the ear.

Singing Bread, consecrated by the priest singing. (French, pain à chanter.) The reformers directed that the sacramental bread should be similar in fineness and fashion to the round bread-and-water singing-cakes used in private masses.

Singing Chambermaids, in theatrical parlance, mean those smart young light comedians who perform chambermaids and are good singers.

Singing Tree. A tree whose leaves were so musical that every leaf sang in concert. (Arabian Nights: Story of the Sisters who Enjoined their Younger Sister.) (See Singing Apple.)

Singing in Tribulation. Confessing when put to the torture. Such a person is termed in gaol slang a "canary bird."

"This man, sir, is condemned to the gallows for being a canary bird." "A canary bird!" exclaimed the knight. "Yes, sir," added the arch-chancellor; "I mean that he is very famous for his singing." "What!" said Don Quixote. "Are people to be sent to the gallows for singing?" "Marry, that they are," answered the alcalde; "for there is nothing worse than singing in tribulation."—Coronado: Don Quixote, II, 8.

Sing-Speech Hamilton. The Right Hon. W. G. Hamilton, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland, spoke one speech, but that was a masterly torrent of eloquence which astounded everyone. (November 13th, 1755.)

"No one likes a reputation analogous to that of 'single-speech Hamilton.'"—The Times.

"Or is it he, the worthy youth, so greatly trained for statesmen's part,
Who talks of honour, faith, and truth,
As things that he has got by heart,
Whose ethics Chesterfield can teach,
Who's logic is from 'single-speech'"—Scott: "Bridal of Triermain," II, 4.

Sinner (Latin, on the left hand). According to augury, birds, etc., appearing on the left-hand side forbode ill-luck; but, on the right-hand side, good luck. Thus, corona sinistra (a crow on the left-hand) is a sign of ill-luck which belongs to English superstitions as much as to the ancient Roman or Etruscan. (Virgil: Aeneid, i. 18.)

"That raven on you left-hand rakes
At random on his ill-heeding occult;
Bodes me no good."—Gray: "Elegy xxxvii.

Sinner. (See BAR SINISTER.)

Sinning One's Mercies. Being ungrateful for the gifts of Providence.

"I know your good father would term this 'sinning my mercies.'"—Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet.

S'non. A Greek who induced the Trojans to receive the wooden horse. (Virgil: Aeneid, ii, 102, etc.) Anyone deceiving by betrayal is called "a S'non."

"And now securely trusting to destroy,
As erst false S'non shared the sum of Troy."—Corneille: L'Amour, bk. 1.

Sintram. The Greek hero of the German romance, Sintram and his Companions, by Baron Lamotte Fouqué.

Sintram's famous sword was called "Welsung." The same name was given to Dietlein's sword. (See SWORD.)

Sir. Latin, senex; Spanish, señor; Italian, signor; French, sire; Norman, sire; English, sir. According to some, Greek οἶχος is connected with Sir; on the analogy of μαρτυς (μαρτυς) = Latin sum; εὐπέρσ ὁ Latin scouter; or = Latin sapo.

Sir (a clerical address). Clergymen had at one time Sir prefixed to their name. This is not the Sir of knighthood, but merely a translation of the university word dominus given to graduates, as "Dominus Hugh Evans," etc.

Sir Oracle. (See Oracle.)

Sir Roger de Coverley. An imaginary character by Addison; type of a benevolent country gentleman of the eighteenth century. Probably the model was William Bovey, lord of the manor of Flaxley.

Siren. A woman of dangerous blandishments. The allusion is to the Sirius

Fabulous sirens said by Greek and Latin poets to entice seamen by the sweetness of their song to such a degree that the listeners forgot everything and died of hunger (Greek, sirenes, entanglers). In Homeric mythology there were but two sirens; later writers name three, viz. Parthenope, Lighea, and Lycosiaia; but the number was still further augmented by those who loved “lords many and gods many.”

“There were several sirens up and down the coast; one at Panormus, another at Naples, others at Surrenturn, but the greatest number lived in the delightful Ceprea; whence they passed over to the rocky Sirenum which bear their name.”—Inquiry into the Life of Homer

Sirens. Plato says there are three kinds of sirens—the celestial, the genera tive, and the catarhctic. The first are under the government of Jupiter, the second under the government of Neptune, and the third under the government of Pluto. When the soul is in heaven, the sirens seek, by harmonic motion, to unite it to the divine life of the celestial host; and when in Hades, to conform them to the infernal regimen; but on earth they produce generation, of which the sea is emblematic. (Proclus: On the Theology of Plato, bk. vi.)

Sirius. The Dog-star; so called by the Greeks from the adjective sirios, hot and scorching. The Romans called it canicula; and the Egyptians, sothis.

Sirloin of Beef. A corruption of Surlioun. (French, surloign.). La partie du bœuf qui reste après qu'on en a coupé l'épaule et la cuisse. In Queen Elizabeth’s “Progresses,” one of the items mentioned under March 31st, 1573, is a “sorolyne of biff.” Fuller tells us that Henry VIII. jocularly knighted the surlioun. If so, James I. could claim neither wit nor originality when, at a banquet given him at Hoerros Tower, near Blackburn, he said, “Bring hither that surlioun, sirrah, for ‘tis worthy of a more honourable post, being, as I may say, not surlioun, but sirloin.”

“Dining with the Abbot of Reading, he [Henry VIII.] ate so heartily of a loin of beef that the abbot said he would give 1,000 marks for such a stomach. “Done!” said the king, and kept the next day a tournament in the Tower, on his 1,000 marks, and knighted the beef.”—See Fuller: Church History, vi. 2, p. 293 (1665).

Sixpence (Latin: Sestisphos, Greek). A fraudulent avaricious king of Corinth, whose task in the world of shades is to roll a huge stone to the top of a hill, and fix it there. It so falls out that the stone no sooner reaches the hill-top than it bounds down again.
Six-and-Eightpence

Six-and-Eightpence used to be called a "noble" (q.v.), the third of a pound. The half-noble was often called "ten greats," and was in Shakespeare’s time the usual lawyer’s fee.

"As fit as ten greats is for the hand of an attorney."—Shakespeare: All’s Well that Ends Well, ii. 2.

Six Articles (33 Henry VIII.) rejoin the belief in (1) the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist; (2) the sufficiency of communion in one kind; (3) the divinity of the priests; (4) the obligation of vows of chastity; (5) the expediency of private masses; and (6) the necessity of auricular confession.

Six Hooped Pot. A two-quart pot. Quart pots were bound with three hoops, and when three men joined in drinking each man drank his hoop. Mine host of the Black Bear calls Tressilian “A six hooped pot of a traveller,” meaning a first-class guest, because he paid freely, and made no complaints. (Knutworth, chap. iii.)

Six Members. The six members that Charles I. went into the House of Commons to arrest were Lord Kimbolton, Pym, Hollis, Hampden, Sir Arthur Haselrig, and Straud. Being warned in time, they made good their escape.

Six Months’ War. The Franco-Prussian (July 28th, 1870, to January 28th, 1871).

Six Nations (The). The Iroquois confederacy since the Tuscaroras was added.

Six Points. (See People’s Charter.)

Six-Principle Baptists (The). Those whose creed is Hebrews iv. 1, 2.

Sixes and Sevens (All). Ill-assorted; not matched; higgledy-piggledy.

To be at sixes and sevens. Spoken of things, it means in confusion; spoken of persons, it means in disagreement or hostility. “Six, ye seven,” was a Hebrew phrase meaning an indefinite number; hence we read in Job (v. 19), “He [God] shall deliver thee in six troubles, yea in seven,” etc. What is indefinite is confused. Our modern phrase would be five or six things here, and five or six things there, but nothing in proper order.

“Old Oden’si odeone makes not thee uneven, Nor carelessly set at six and seven.”—Taylor: Works, ii. 71 (1590).

Long and short sixes. Certain dip candles, common in the first half of the nineteenth century. Long sixes were those eight inches long, short sixes were thicker and about five inches long. Called sixes because six went to a pound.

Sixteen-string Jack. John Rann, a highwayman, noted for his forgeries. He wore sixteen tags, eight at each knee. (Hanged in 1774.)

“Dr. Johnson said that Gray’s poetry towered above the ordinary run of verse an sixteen-string Jack above the ordinary foot-pad.”—Bowell: Life of Johnson.

Sisar. A poor scholar whose assize of food is given him. Sisars used to have what was left at the fellows’ table, because it was their duty at one time to wait on the fellows at dinner. Each fellow had his sisar. (Cambridge University.)

SIsings. The quota of food allowed at breakfast, and also food “sized for” at dinner. At Cambridge, the students are allowed meat for dinner, but tart, jelly, ale, etc., are obtained only by paying extra. These articles are called sizens, and those who demand them size for them. The word is a contraction of assize, a statute to regulate the size or weight of articles sold. (See Size.)

“A size is a portion of bread or drinks; it is a farthing which scholars in Cambridge have at the buttery. It is noted with the letter S:—Mushen. (See also Etica: Literary Letters, p. 176.)

Skains-mate or Skaines-mate. A dagger-comrade: a fencing-school companion; a fellow cut-throat. Skain is an Irish knife, similar to the American Bowie-knife. Swift, describing an Irish feast, says, “A cubit at least the length of their skaines.” Given, in his Gipsy, for an Upright Courier, speaks of “an ill-favoured knife, who bore by his side a skane, like a brewer’s hanger-knife.”

“Scurvy knave. The scurvy kind of the skaines-mate.”—Shakespeare: Rom. and Juli., iv. 4.

Skald. An old Norse poet, whose aim it was to celebrate living warriors or their ancestors; hence they were attached to courts. Few complete Skaldic poems have survived, but a multitude of fragments exist.

Skedaddled. To run away, to be scattered in rout. The Scotch apply the word to the milk spill over the pail in carrying it. During the late American war, the New York papers said the Southern forces were “skedaddled” by the Federals. (Saxon, skedan, to pour out; Chaldee, sheeda; Greek, skeda, to scatter.)

Skeggs. Miss Caroline Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs. A pretender to gentility who boasts of her aristocratic connections, but is atrociously vulgar, and complains of being "all of a muck of sweat." (Goldsmith: Year of WAKEfield.)

Skeleton. There is a skeleton in every house. Something to annoy and to be kept out of sight.

That is my skeleton—my trouble, the "crook in my lot."

A woman had an only son who obtained an appointment in India, but his health failed, and his mother longed for his return. One day he wrote a letter to his mother, with this strange request: "Pray, mother, get someone who has no cares and troubles to make me six shirts." And then she opened a closet which contained a human skeleton. "Madam," said the lady, "I try to keep my trouble to myself, but every night my husband compels me to kiss that skeleton." She then explained that the skeleton was once her husband's rival, killed in a duel. "Think you I am happy?" The mother wrote to her son, and the son wrote home: "I knew when I gave the commission that everyone had his cares, and you, mother, must have yours. Know then that I am condemned to death, and can never return to England. Mother, mother! there is a skeleton in every house."

Skeleton Jackets. Jackets on which the trousers buttoned, very commonly worn by boys in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. In the illustrations of Kate Greenaway, The Pickwick Papers, Nicholas Nickleby, etc., are plenty of such skeleton suits. Shell-jackets are short fatigue jackets worn especially by military officers.

Skivington’s Daughter. Corrupted into Skivanger’s Daughter, was an instrument of torture invented by Skivington, lieutenant of the Tower under Henry VIII. It consisted of a broad hoop of iron in two parts, fastened together by a hinge. The victim was made to kneel while the hoop was passed under his legs; he was then squeezed gradually till the hoop could be got over his back, where it was fastened.

Skibbereen and Connemara (in Ireland). Types of poverty and distress. "You would then see the United Kingdom one vast Skibbereen or Connemara; you might convert its factories into poor-houses, and its parks into pauper fields to bury stragglers in."—C. Thospeck: Autobiography, p. 807.

Skibbereen Eagle (The). The chief amanuens, takin' notes. It was the Skibbereen, or West Cork Eagle newspaper, that solemnly told Lord Palmerston that it had "got its eye both upon him and on the Emperor of Russia." This terrible warning has elevated the little insignificant town of Skibbereen, in the south-west coast of Ireland, quite into a Lilliputian pre-eminence. Beware, beware, ye statesmen, emperors, and thrones, for the Skibbereen Eagle has its eye upon you!

Skid. A drag to check the wheels of a carriage, cart, etc., when going down hill. (Anglo-Saxon, scid, a splinter.)

Skiddaw. Wherever Skiddaw hath a cap, Scruffell wots full well of that. When my neighbour’s house is on fire mine is threatened; when you are in misfortune I also am a sufferer; when you mourn I have cause also to lament. Skiddaw and Scruffell are two neighbouring hills—one in Cumberland and the other in Annandale in Scotland. When Skiddaw is capped with clouds, it will be sure to rain ere long at Scruffell. (Fuller: Worthers.)

Skied. Pictures are said to be skied when they are hung so high as not to be easily seen.

"Bad pictures are hung on the line by dozens, and many excellent ones are rejected or skied."
—Pratt, p. 481 (September 17, 1866).

Skillygolee. Slip-slop, wish-wash, twaddle, talk about gruel. "Skilly" is prison-gruel or, more strictly speaking, the water in which meat has been boiled thickened with oatmeal. Broth served on board the hulks to convicts is called skilly.

"It is the policy of Curator Street and skillygolee."—Daily Telegraph.

Skimble-Skamble. Rambling, worthless. "Skamble" is merely a variety of scramble, hence "scamblng days," those days in Lent when no regular meals are provided, but each person "scrambles" or shifts for himself. "Skimble" is added to give force. (See REDUPLICATED WORDS.)

"And such a deal of skimble-skamble stuff As put me from my faith."
—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, iii. 1.

"With such scramble-scramble, spatter-sputter, As puts me clean inside the money-matter."
—Taylor’s Workes, ii. 90 (1613).

Skim’ington. To ride the skim’ington, or Riding the stag. To be hen-pecked. Gross tells us that the man rode behind the woman, with his face to the horse’s tail. The man held a distaff, and the woman beat him about the jowls with a ladle. As the procession passed a house where the woman was paramount, each gave the threshold a sweep. The "stang" was a pole supported by two stout lads, across which the rider was made to stride. Mr. Douce derives "skimmington" from the skimming-ladle with which the rider was buffeted.

The custom was not peculiar to Scotland and England; it prevailed in Scandinavia; and Hoefnagel, in his Views in Seville (1591), shows that it existed in Spain also. The procession is described at length in Hudibras, pt. ii. ch. ii.

"Hark ye, Dame Ursley Saddles corrobor, and Jenkin, starting up, his eyes flashing with anger; remember, Iam none of your husband, and if you would do well not to forget whose threshold was swept when they last rode the skimmington upon such another welding jade as yourself." — Scot. Fortunes of Nisig.

Skin. To sell the skin before you have caught the bear. To count of your chickens before they are hatched. In the South Sea mania (1720), dealing in bear-skins was a great stock-jobbing item, and thousands of skins were sold as more time bargains. Shakespeare alludes to a similar practice:—

"The man that once did sell the lion's skin While the beast lived, was killed with hunting him." — Henry IV., ii. 3.

Skin a Flint. To be very exacting in making a bargain. The French say, "Tendre sur un enfant." The Latin, lata verpa (goat's wool), means something as worthless as the skin of a flint or fuse of an eggshell. (See Skinflint.)

Skin of his Teeth. I am escaped with the skin of my teeth (Job xix. 20). Just escaped, and that is all—having lost everything.

Skinfæxi. In Scandinavian mythology, is the "shining horse which draws Day-light over the earth." (See Horse.)

Skinflint. A pinch-farting; a niggard. In the French, "pince-maille." Maille is an old copper coin.

Skinners. A predatory band in the American Revolutionary War which roamed over the neutral ground robbing and fleecing those who refused to take the oath of fidelity. (See Economists.)

Skirt. To sit upon one's skirt. To insult, or seek occasion of quarrel. Tarlton, the clown, told his audience the reason why he wore a jacket was that "no one might sit upon his skirt." Sitting on one's skirt is, like stamping on one's coat in Ireland, a fruitful source of quarrels, often provoked.

"Crosse me not, Lisa, neither be so fertile.
For if thou dost, I'll sit upon thy skirt.
"—The Abortion of an Idle Honour (1620).
(Quoted by Halliwell: Archae Writs.)

Skogan (Henry). A poet in the reign of Henry IV. Justice Shallow says he saw Sir John Falstaff, when he was a boy, "break Skogan's head at the court gate, when he [Sir John] was a crack [child] not thus high." (2 Henry IV., ii. 2.)

"Skogan? What was he? A fine gentleman, and a master of arts
Of Henry the Fourth's time, that made disguises
For the king's son, and went in bailed royal Dainty well." — Ben Jonson: The Fortunate Isles (1628).

John Skogan. The favourite buffoon of the court of King Edward IV. Scojin's Jests were published by Andrew Borde, a physician, in the reign of Henry VIII.

Skeops, Skepti, or White Dares. A Russian religious sect who, taking Matt. xix. 12 and Luke xxiii. 29 as the bases of their creed, are all cowards, and the women are mutilated in a most barbarous manner, as they deem it a Christian grace not to be able to bear children. They are vegetarians and total abstainers. Origen was a Skop in everything but name.

"Look at the Mormons,—the Skopii the Skeptes the Shakers, the Rawling Devishers, the Theosophists, and the Fakirs.—With the Immortal, Vol. ii. p. 50.

Skull. You shall quaff beer out of the skulls of your enemies. (Scandinavian.) Skull means a cup or dish; hence a person who washes up cups and dishes is called a scullery-maid. (Scotch, skoll, a bowl; French, cuvette; Danish, kaal, a drinking-vessel; German, schale; our shell.)

Skurry. A scratch race, or race without restrictions.

Hurry-skurry. A confused bustle through lack of time; in a confused bustle. A reduplicated or ricochet word.

Sky, slang for pocket. Explained under the word Chivy (q.v.).

Sky. To elevate, ennoble, raise. It is a term in ballooning; when the ropes are cut, the balloon mounts upwards to the skies. (See Skirt.)

"We found the same distinguished personage doing his best to skry some dozen or so of his best friends [referring to the peeks made by Gladstone]." — The Times, November 16, 1899.

If the sky fails we shall catch larks. A bantering reply to those who suggest some very improbable or wild scheme.
Sky-blue. Milk and water, the colour of the skies.

“...its name derivation and reproach pursue.
And strangers tell of three times skimmed sky-blue.”
—Bloomsfield: Farmer’s Boy.

Sky-rakers, strictly speaking, is a sail above the fore-royal, the main-royal, or the mizen-royal, more frequently called “sky-scrapers.” In general parlance any top-sail is so called.

“Dashed by the strange wind’s sport, we wore sunk deep in the green sea’s trough; and before we could utter an ejaculatory prayer, we appeared upon the crown of some fantastic saucer, peering our sky-rakers into the azure vault of heaven.” —C. Thoson: Autobiography, p. 120.

Skye (Isle of) means the isle of gaps or indentations (Celtic, skyb, a gap). Hence also the Skibbereen of Cork, which is Skyb-bohren, the byway gap, a pass in a mountain to the sea.

Skylark. A sparrow.

Sky-lark, among sailors, is to mount the highest yards (called sky-scrapers), and then slide down the ropes for amusement. (See Lark.)

Slander. Offence. Slander is a stumbling-block or something which trips a person up (Greek, skánadai, through the French esclandre). Offence is the striking of our foot against a stone (Latin, ob fendo, as secpulsum affexit navis, the ship struck against a rock).

Slang. Slangs are the greaves with which the legs of convicts are fettered; hence convicts themselves; and slang is the language of convicts.

Slang. The difficulty of tracing the fons et origo of slang words is extremely great, as there is no law to guide one. Generally, a perversion and a pun may be looked for, as Monseigneur = fœc (q.v.), Monspessan = venire (i.e., mon-pnees, my paunch or belly), etc. (See Sandis, Squash, and numerous other examples in this dictionary). For rhyming slang see Chivy.

Slap-bang. In sport, means that the gun was discharged incessantly; it went slap here and bang there. As a term of laudation it means “very dashing,” both words being playful synonyms of “dashing,” the repetition being employed to give intensity. Slap-bang, here we are again, means, we have “popped” in again without ceremony. Pop, slap, bang, and dash are interchangeable.

* Dickens uses the word to signify a low eating-house.

“They lived in the same street, walked to town every morning at the same hour, dined at the same slap-bang every day.”

Slap-dash. In an off-hand manner. The allusion is to the method of colouring rooms by slapping and dashing the walls, so as to imitate paper. At one time slap-dash walls were very common.

Slap-up. Prime slap-up or slap-hang up. Very exquisite or dashing. Here slap is a playful synonym of dashing, and “up” is the Latin supr, as in “superfine.” The dress of a dandy or the equipage of an exquisite is “slap-up,” “prime slap-up,” or “slap-bang-up.”

“The more slap-up still have the shields painted on the panels with the coronet over.” —Thackeray.

Slato. He has a slate or tile house. He is a little cracked; his head or roof is not quite sound.

Slate Club (A). A sick benefit club for working-men. Originally the names of the members were entered on a folding slate; in the universities the names of members are marked on a board, or on boards; hence such expressions as “his name is on the boards,” “I have taken my name off the boards.”

Slate One (2d). To criticise, expose in print, show up, reprove. A scholastic term. Rebellious and idle boys are slated, that is, their names are set down on a slate to expose their offence, and some punishment is generally awarded.

“The journalist there lead each other a dance, if one man ‘slates’ another for what he has done, it is parlous for two, and then colloquy for one.”

Punch (The Pugnacious Penmen), 1885.

Slating (4). A slashing review.

“He cut it up neat and branch... He gave it what he technically styled ‘a bang’; and as he threw down his pen... he muttered, ‘I think I’ve pretty well settled that dunce’s business’... The World, February 21st, 1884, p. 21.

Slave (1 syl.). This is an example of the strange changes which come over some words. The Slavi were a tribe which once dwelt on the banks of the Danube, and were so called from slav (noble, illustrious); but as, in the lower ages of the Roman empire, vast multitudes of them were spread over Europe in the condition of captive servants, the word came to signify a slave.

Similarly, Goths means the good or godlike men; but since the invasion of the Goths the word has become synonymous with barbarous, bad, ungodlike.

Distraction is simply “dis-tra-hoe,” as diversion is “di-vert.” The French still employ the word for recreation or amusement, but when we talk of being distracted we mean anything but being amused or entertained.
Sleeveless Errand

Sleepers. Timbers laid asleep or resting on something, as the sleepers of a railway. (Anglo-Saxon, slepere.)

The Seven Sleepers. (See Seven.)

Sleeping Beauty. From the French La Belle au Bois Dormant, by Charles Perrault (Contes du Temps). She is shut up by enchantment in a castle, where she sleeps a hundred years, during which time an impenetrable wood springs up around. Ultimately she is disenchanted by a young prince, who marries her. Epimenes, the Cretan poet, went to fetch a sleep, and after sleeping fifty-seven years continued his search, and was surprised to find when he got home that his younger brother was grown grey. (See Rip Van Winkle.)

Sleepless Hat (A). A worthless, worn-out hat, which has no nap.

Sleepy Hollow. The name given, in Washington Irving's Sketch Book, to a quiet old-world village on the Hudson.

Sleeve. To hang on one's sleeve. To listen devoutly to what one says; to surrender your freedom of thought and action to the judgment of another. The allusion is to children hanging on their mother's sleeve.

To have in one's sleeve is to offer a person's name for a vacant situation. Dean Swift, when he waited on Harley, had always some name in his sleeve. The phrase arose from the custom of placing pockets in sleeves. These sleeve-pockets were chiefly used for memoranda, and other small articles.

To laugh in one's sleeve. To ridicule a person not openly but in secret; to conceal a laugh by hiding your face in the large sleeves at one time worn by men. Rive son s cape.

To put in one's sleeve, as, "I shall not pin my faith to your sleeve," meaning, "I shall not slavishly believe or follow you." The allusion is to the practice of knights, in days of chivalry, pinning to their sleeve some token given them by their ladylove. This token was a pledge that he would do or die.

Sleeve of Care. (See Sleeve.)

Sleeve of Hildebrand (The), from which he shook thunder and lightning.

Sleeveless Errand. A fruitless errand. It should be written sleeveless, as it comes from sleeve, ravelled thread, or the raw-edge of silk. In Troilus and Cressida, Thersites the railler calls Patroclus an "idle immaterial skein of sleeve silk" (v. 1).
Sleight-of-Hand is artifice by the hand. (Icelandic, slekgh; German, schleich, cunning or trick.)

"And still the less they understand,
The more they admire his sleight of hand."—Burton: Hudibras, pt. ii. c. 3.

Sleip'nir (2 syl.). Odin's grey horse, which had eight legs, and could carry his master over sea as well as land. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Slender. A country lout, a booby in love with Anne Page, but of too faint a heart to win so fair a lady. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Sleuth-Hound. A bloodhound which follows the sleuth or track of an animal. (Sleuth, the track of a deer, is the Anglo-Saxon sleoting; Icelandic, sloth, trail; Dutch, sluot.)

"There is a law also among the Borderers in time of peace, that whoever demeth entrance or egress of a sleuth-hound in pursuit made after fellows and stolen goods, shall be held as accessory unto the theft."—Guthrie: Description of Scotland, p. 11.

Slew'd. Intoxicated. When a vessel changes her tack, she staggers and gradually heels over. A drunken man moves like a ship changing her angle of sailing. (Probably from the Icelandic, suna, turn.)

"Mr. Horby was just a bit slew'd by the liquor he'd taken."—W. C. Russell: A Sporting Voyage, chap. xii. p. 25.

Slick (Sam). A Yankee clock-maker and pedlar, wonderfully 'cute, a keen observer, and with plenty of "soft sawder." Judge Hahburton wrote the two series called Sam Slick, or the Clockmaker.

Slick Off. To finish a thing there and then without stopping; to make a clean sweep of a job in hand. Judge Hahburton's Sam Slick popularised the word. (German, schlisch, sleek, polished, hence clean; Icelandic, slike, sleek.) We say, "To do a thing clean off" as well as "slick off."

Sliding Scale. A schedule of payment which slides up and down as the article to which it refers becomes dearer or cheaper. In government duty it varies as the amount taxed varies.

Slip. Many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip. Everything is uncertain till you possess it. (See ANCEORS.)

"Non caudum inter calicem supremaque labyrin."—Horace.

To give one the slip. To steal off unperceived; to elude pursuit. A sensephrase. In fastening a cable to a buoy, the home end is slipped through the hawse-pipe. To give the slip is to cut away the cable, so as to avoid the noise of weighing anchor.

Slippers. The Turks wear yellow slippers; the Arme'nians, red; and the Jews, blue.

Slipshod, applied to literature, means a loose, careless style of composition; no more fit for the public eye than a man with his shoes down at heels.

Slipslop. A ricochet word meaning wissy-washy. (Anglo-Saxon, slip-an, to melt, which makes slopen in the past participle.)

Sloane MSS. 3,560 MSS. collected by Sir Hans Sloane, now in the British Museum. The museum of Sir Hans formed the basis of the British Museum, (1660-1753.)

Slogan. A war-cry, a Scotch gathering-cry. (Anglo-Saxon, slean, to fight, pret. sleg; Gaelic, slugh-gairm, an army-yell.)

Slop (Dr.). A choleric physician in Sterne's Tristram Shandy.

Dr. Slop. Sir John Stoddart, M.D., a choleric physician who assailed Napoleon most virulently in The Times, of which he was editor. (1773-1856.)

Slops (The). The police; originally "eclop."

"I draged you in here and saved you, And sent out a call for the slops; Ha! they're acomin', sir! Listen, The noise and the shouting slops."

Sims: Ballads of Babylon (The Matron's Story).

Slo'p'ard (Dame). The wife of Grimbard, the brock (or badger), in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Sliepe (1 syl.). To decamp; to run away.

Slough of Despond. A deep bog which Christian has to cross in order to get to the Wicket Gate. Help comes to his aid. Neighbour Pliable went with Christian as far as the Slough, and then turned back again. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, part i.)

Slow. Stupid, dull. A "quick boy" is one who is sharp and active. Awfully slow, sliang for very stupid and dull.

Slow Coach. A dawdle. As a slow coach in the old coaching-days "got on" slowly, so one that "gets on" slowly is a slow coach.

Slubber-Degullion. A nasty, paltry fellow. A stub is a roll of wool drawn out and only slightly twisted; hence to stubber, to twist loosely, to do things by halves, to perform a work carelessly. Deception is compounded of the word "gull," or the Cornish "gulian," a simpleton.

"Quoth she, 'Although thou hast deserved, these subtle-deceits, to be served As thou diest vow to deal with me.'"

Butler: Hudibras, i. a.

Slug-abe (a). A late riser.

"The harrierviva is no slug-abe." Notes and Queries (Aug. 1, 1861, p. 1118, col. 2).

Slumland. The localities of the destitute poor who dwell in the slums.

"Not only have the inhabitants of Slumland to deal with, but a steadily growing number of skilled and fairly educated artisans." Nineteenth Century, December, 1885, p. 88.

Slums. "The back slums"—i.e. the purilieus of Westminster Abbey, etc., where vagrants get a night's lodging.

Sly (Christopher). A keeper of boars and a tinker, son of a pedlar, and a sad, drunken sot. In the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy called Taming of the Shrew, he is found dead drunk by a lord, who commands his servants to put him to bed, and on his waking to attend upon him like a lord, to see if they can bamboozle him into the belief that he is a great man, and not Christopher Sly at all. The "commotion" of Taming of the Shrew is performed for his deception. The trick was played by the Caliph Haroun Ablaschid on Abou Hassan, the rich merchant, in the tale called The Sleeper Awakened (Arabian Nights), and by Philippe the Good, Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor, as given in Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (pt. ii. sec. 2, num. 4).

Sly-Boots. One who appears to be a doll, but who is really wide awake; a cunning doll.

"The fox called the lazy one several times, but in vain; there was no such thing as stirring him, though the six-hoards heard well enough all the while."—Adventures of Abdullah, p. 32 (1726).

Sly Dog. You're a sly dog. "Un fin mouton." A playful way of saying. You pretend to be disinterested, but I can read between the lines.

Sly as a Fox. (See Similes.)

Slyme (Ghaly). In Martin Chuzzlewit, by Charles Dickens.

Small. Small by degrees and beautifully less. Prior, in his Henry and Emma, wrote "Fine by degrees," etc.

Small-back. Death. So called because he is usually drawn as a skeleton.

"Small-back must lead down the dance with us all in our time."—Sir Walter Scott.

Small Beer. "To suckle fools and chronicle small beer." (Iago in the play of Othello, ii. 1.)

He does not think small beer of himself. He has a very good opinion of number one.

"To express her self-steeem [sic might be said] that she did not think small beer of herself."—De Quincey: Historical Essays.

Small-endians. The Big-endians of Lilliput made it a point of orthodoxy to crack their eggs at the big end; but were considered heretics for so doing by the Small-endians, who insisted that eggs ought to be broken at the small end. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels.)

Small Hours of the Morning (The). One, two, three, four, etc., before daybreak. A student who sits up all night, and goes to bed at one, two, three, etc., is said to work till the small hours of the morning, or to go to bed in the small hours of the morning.

Smalls. In for his smalls; Passed his smalls—his "Little-go, or previous examination; the examination for degree being the "Great-go," or "Greats."

Smart Money. Money paid by a person to obtain exemption from some disagreeable office or duty; in law it means a heavy fine; and in recompense it means money given to soldiers or sailors for injuries received in the service. Each makes the person "smart," i.e. suffer, or else the person who receives it is paid for smarting.

Smash. Come to smash—to ruin. Smashed to pieces, broken to atoms. Smash is a corruption of wash; Latin, mastico, to bite to pieces. (See Store.)

"I have a great mind to... let social position u. to smash."—Ingoldsby Faith Doctor, p. 43.

Smeec (in Hudibras). A contraction of Smeectynnuus, a word made from the initial letters of five rebels—

"The handkerchief about the neck, Canonical cravat of Smeec."—Beiler: Hudibras, pt. 1. 5.

Smeectynnuus. Anti-Episcopalian.

Smeectynnuus. (See Smeec.)

Smell (an acute sense). James Mitchell was deaf, dumb, and blind from birth, "but he distinguished persons by their smell, and by means of the same cause formed correct judgments as to character.” (Nineteenth Century, April, 1894, p. 579.)

Smell a Rat (To). To suspect something about to happen. The allusion is to a cat or dog smelling out vermin. I smell treason. I discern treason involved; I have some aim that would lead to treason.

Smelling Sin. Shakespeare says, “Do you smell a fault?” (King Lear, i. 1); and Iago says to Othello, “One may smell in this a will most rank.” Probably the smell of dogs may have something to do with such phrases, but St. Jerome furnishes even a better source. He says that St. Hilairon had the gift of knowing what sins or vices anyone was inclined to by simply smelling either the person or his garments; and by the same faculty he could discern good feelings and virtuous propensities. (Life of Hilairon, a.d. 390.)

Smells of the Lamp. Said of a literary production manifestly laboured. Plutarch attributes the phrase to Pythias the orator, who said, “The orations of Democles’ smell of the lamp,” alluding to the current tale that the great orator lived in an underground cave lighted by a lamp, that he might have no distraction to his severe study.

Smelts (Stock-Exchange term), meaning “English and Australian copper shares.” (See Stock-Exchange Slang.)

Smiler, the name of a drink, is a mixture of bitter beer and lemonade. In the United States, a drink of liquor is called a ‘smile,’ and the act of treating one at the bar is giving one a ‘smile.’ Of course this is metaphorical. (See Shandy-Gaff.)

Smith. A proper name. (See Brewer.)

Smith of Nottingham. Ray, in his Collection of Proverbs, has the following couplet:—

“The little Smith of Nottingham,
Who don’t the work that no man can.”

Applied to conceited persons who imagine that no one is able to compete with themselves.

Smith’s Prize-man. One who has obtained the prize (£25) founded in the University of Cambridge by Robert Smith, D.D. (once master of Trinity), for proficiency in mathematics and natural philosophy. There are annually two prizes, awarded to two commencing Bachelors of Arts.

Smithfield. The smooth field (Anglo-Saxon, smetthe, smooth), called in Latin Campus Planus, and described by Fitz-Stephen in the twelfth century as a “plain field where every Friday there is a celebrated rendezvous of fine horses brought thither to be sold.”

Smoke. To detect, or rather to get a scent, of some plot or scheme. The allusion is to the detection of robbers by the smoke seen to issue from their place of concealment.

“No smoke without fire. Every slander has some foundation. The reverse proverb, “No fire without smoke,” means no good without some drawback.

To end in smoke. To come to no practical result. The allusion is to kindling, which smokes, but will not light a fire.

To smoke the calumet (or pipe) of peace. (See CALUMET.)

Smoke Farthings. An offering given to the priest at Whitsuntide, according to the number of chimneys in his parish.

“The Bishop of Ely hath out of every parish in Cambridgeshire a certain tribute called...smoke-farthings, which the churchwardens do love according to the number of...chimneys that he in a parish.”—Mrs. Baker, xxxix. 326.

Smoke Silver. A modus of 6d. in lieu of tithe firewood.

Snack. The snack of a door (Nbrfolk), the latch. Generally called the “snack” (q.v.).

To take a snack. To take a morsel.

To go snacks. To share and share alike.

Snails have no sex, “chausen remissant les deux sexes.” (Anglo-Saxon, snegil.)

Snake-Stones. Small rounded stones or matters compounded by art, and supposed to cure snake-bites. Mr. Quckett discovered that two given to him for analysis were composed of vegetable matters. Little perforated stones are sometimes hung on cattle to charm away adders.

Snake in the Grass. A secret enemy; an enemy concealed from sight. Rhyming slang, “a looking-glass.”

“Lacet angius in herbis.”

Virgil, Elogium, lli. 91.

Snakes in his Boots (To have). To suffer from D.T. (delirium tremens). This is one of the delusions common to those so afflicted.

“He’s been pretty high on whisky for two or three days...and they say he’s got snakes in his books now.”—The Burton Experiment, ch. iv.
Snap-Dragons. (See FLAP-DRAGON.)

Snap of the Fingers. Not worth a snap of the fingers. A fico. (See FIG.)

Snap One’s Nose Off. (See under NOSE.)

Snarling Letter (Latin, lit’era ca-nin’a). The letter r. (See R.)

Sneak Posset. To give one a sneak posset is to slam the door in his face (Cumberland and Westmorland). The “sneak” or snick is the latch of a door, and to “sneak the door in one’s face” is to shut a person out. Mrs. Browning speaks of “ nicking ” the door.

“...the lady closed that door and nicked the lock.”
—Aurora Leigh, Book VI, line 1087.

Probably allied to niche, to put the latch into its niche.

Sneeze. It is not to be sneezed at—not to be despised. (See SNUFF.)

Sneezing. Some Catholics attribute to St. Gregory the use of the benediction “God bless you,” after sneezing, and say that he enjoined its use during a pestilence in which sneezing was a mortal symptom, and was therefore called the death-sneeze. Aristotle mentions a similar custom among the Greeks; and Thucydides tells us that sneezing was a crisis symptom of the great Athenian plague. The Romans followed the same custom, and their usual exclamation was “Abit omen!” We also find it prevalent in the New World among the native Indian tribes, in Semmaur, Monomatapa, etc. etc.

“...It is almost incredible how ancient and how widely diffused is the notion that sneezing is an omen which requires to be averted. The notion prevailed not only in ancient Greece and Rome, but is evident in Persia, India, and even Africa. The rabbi tells us that Jacob in his flight saved a sneeze, the evil effects of which were averted by prayer.

In the rebellion of Monomatapa, in Africa, the king sneezed, and a signal of the fact being given, all the faithful subjects instantly made tons and offerings for his safety. The same is practiced in Senmaur, in Nubia, in Sweden, etc.

The Sudder (one of the sacred books of the Parsee) enjoins that all people should have recourse to prayer if a person sneezes, because sneezing is a proof that the “Evil Spirit is abroad.” Footze, in his face of Dr. Long in his Charlot, makes one of the consulting doctors ask why, when a person sneezes, all the company laugh? and the answer given was that “sneezing is a mortal symptom which once depopulated Athens.”

“...in Sweden...you sneeze, and they cry God bless you.”—Longfellow.

Snickerbans. A large clasp-knife, or combat with clasp-knives. (“Snick,” Icelandic snikka, to clip; verb, snitka,” to cut. “Snee” is the Dutch snee, an edge; snijden, to cut.) Thackeray, in his Little Billee, uses the term “snickerness.”

“One man being busy in lighting his pipe, and another in sharpening his snickerness.—Irving: Bracebridge Hall, p. 462.

Snob. (See GUVR.)

Snob. Not a gentleman; one who arrogates to himself merits which he does not deserve. Thackeray calls George IV. a snob, because he assumed to be “the greatest gentleman in Europe,” but had not the genuine stamp of a gentleman’s mind. (S privative and nob.)

Snood. The basick lost her silken snood. The snood was a riband with which a Scotch laird braided her hair, and was the emblem of her maiden character. When she married she changed the snood for the curch or coif; but if she lost the name of virgin before she obtained that of wife, she “lost her silken snood,” and was not privileged to assume the curch. (Anglo-Saxon, snith.)

Snooks. An exclamation of incredulity; a Mrs Harris. A person tells an incredible story, and the listener cries Snooks—gammon; or he replies, It was Snooks—the host of the Château d’Espagne. This word “snook” may be a corruption of Noakes or Nokes, the mythical party at one time employed by lawyers to help them in actions of ejectment. (See STYLES.)

Snore. You snore like an owl. It is very generally believed that owls snore, and it is quite certain that a noise like snoring proceeds from their nests; but this is most likely the “purring” of the young birds, nesting in comfort and warmth under the parent wing.

Snow King. Gustavus Adolphus, of Sweden. (1594, 1611-1632.)

“At Vienna he was called in derision the Snow King, who was kept together by the cold, but would melt and disappear as he approached a warmer soul.”—Dr. Crichton: Scandinavia, Vol. II, p. 61.

Snowdonia. The district which contains the mountain range of Snowdon.

The King of Snowdonia, Moel-y-Wyddfa (the conspicuous peak), the highest in South Britain. (3,571 feet above the sea-level.)

Snowdrop (The). Tickell’s tale is that King Albion’s son fell in love with Kenna, daughter of Oberon, but Oberon in anger drove the lover out of fairyland. Albion’s son brought an army to avenge the indignity, and was slain. Kenna Snuff. Up to snuff. Wide awake, knowing, sharp; not easily taken in or imposed upon; alive to scent (Dutch, snufsen, to scent, snuff; Danish, sniffte).

took it in snuff—in anger, in huff.

"You'll mar the light by taking it in snuff."

Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, i. 2.

"Who... when it next came there, took it in snuff."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. 3.

Snuff Out. He was snuffed out—put down, eclipsed. The allusion is to a candle snuffed with snuffers.

Soane Museum, formed by Sir John Soane, and preserved in its original locality, No. 13, Lincoln's Inn Fields, the private residence of the founder. Sir
John Soane died in 1837.

Soap. An English form of savon, the French for soap.

How are you off for soap? (for money or any other necessity). The insurgent women of Paris, in February, 1793, went about crying, "Du pain et du savon!"
(bread and soap).

A deputation of washerwomen petitioned the Convention for soap, and their plaintive cry was heard round the Salle de Manche, "Du pain et du savon!"—Carlyle: French Revolution, pt. iii. bk.
iii. 1.

Soap (Carla). A hard white soap made of olive oil, sometimes mottled with ferruginous matter.

There are also Marseille soap, Spanish soap, Venetian soap, and marine soap (usually made of cocconut oil, and used with sea-water).

Soap-ed pig Fashion (In). Vague; a method of speaking or writing which ever leaves a way of escape. The allusion is to the custom at fairs, etc., of soaping the tail of a pig before turning it out to be caught by the tail.

"He is vague as a pig—writing in what is called the 'soap-ed pig' fashion."—Carlyle: The Diamond Diadem, chap. iv.

Soapy Sam. Samuel Wilberforce,
Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Winchester, (1805-1873.) It is somewhat remarkable that the floral decorations above the stall of the bishop and of the principal of Cuddesdon, were
S. O. A. P. (the initials of Sam Oxon and Alfred Pott. When Samuel Wilberforce went to inspect the building he was dismayed at seeing his sobriquet thus perpetuated.

Someone asked the bishop why he was so called, the bishop replied, "Because I am often in hot water, and always come out with clean hands."

Sober or Sobrius is the Latin s-private, and sobrius, drunk. (S private is for securum.)

Sober as a Judge—i.e. grave and seated. (See Smiles.)

Sobri'no (in Orlando Furioso). One of the most valiant of the Saracen army.
He is called the Sage. He was aged, and counselled Agramant to give up the war and return home, or, if he rejected that advice, to entrust the fight to single combat, on condition that the nation of the champion overthrown should pay tribute to the other. Rogero was chosen for the pagan champion, and Rinaldo for the Christian, but Agramant broke the league. Sobri'no soon after this received the rite of baptism.

Don Quixote asks—

"Who more prudent than Sobri'no?"

So'briquet (French). A nickname.
Ménage thinks the etymology is the Latin sobri'deculum (somewhat ridiculous); Count de Gebelin suggests the Romance words sopra-quest (a name acquired over and above your proper names); while Leglay is in favour of sonbriquet, a word common in the fourteenth century to express a sound of contempt, half whistle and half jeer, made by raising quickly the chin.
Probably sous-brec'het, where brec'het means the breast, seen in our word "brisket."

So'cialism (3 syl.). The political and social scheme of Robert Owen, of Montgomeryshire, who in 1816 published a work to show that society was in a wretched condition, and all its institutions and religious systems were based on wrong principles. The prevailing system is competition, but Owen maintained that the proper principle is cooperation; he therefore advocated a community of property and the abolition of degrees of rank. (1771-1838.)

The Socialists are called also Owenites
(3 syl.). In France the Fourrissiers and St. Simonians are similar sorts of communists, who receive their designations from Fourier and St. Simon (g.v.).

Société de Momus. One of the minor clubs of Paris for the reunion of song-writers and singers. The most noted of these clubs was the Caveau, or in full Les Diners du Caveau, founded in 1733 by Piron, Crébillon, jun., and Col-et. This club lasted till the Revolution.
In the Consulate was formed Les Diners du Vaudenelle, for the habitués of the drama; these diners were held in the house of Juljett, an actor. In 1806 the old Caveau was revived under the name of the Caveau Moderne, and the mucket was once a month at a restaurant entitled La Rocher de Cancale, famous for fish dinners, and Lanjon (the French Anacreon) was president. Beranger belonged to this club, which lasted ten years. In 1824 was founded the Gymnase Lyrique, which, like the Caveau, published an annual volume of songs; this society was dissolved in 1841. In 1834 was founded La Lice Chansonniers, for those who could not afford to join the Caveau or the Gymnase, to which we owe some of the best French songs.

Society. The upper ten thousand, or "the upper ten." When persons are in "society," they are on the visiting lists of the fashionable social leaders. The "society" of a district are the great pandurns thereof.

"All the society of the district were present at the prince's ball."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1863.

Sock [comedy]. The Greek comic actors used to wear a sandal and sock. The difference between the sock and the tragic buskin was this—the sock went only to the ankle, but the buskin extended to the knee. (See Buskin.)

"Then to the well-fed stage anon,
If Jenson's learned sock be on."—Milton: L'Allegro.

Sock a Corpse (To). To shroud it. (French, nuc, a cement or shroud.)

1697. Item paid for a sheet to sock a poor man that died at Bynece. 16. 6d.—Parish Register.

Socrates. The greatest of the ancient philosophers, whose chief aim was to amend the morals of his countrymen, the Athenians. Cicero said of him that "he brought down philosophy from the heavens to earth;" and he was certainly the first to teach that "the proper study of mankind is man." Socrates resisted the unjust sentence of the senate, which condemned to death the Athenian generals for not burying the dead at the battle of Arginusc.

"Socrates—Who, firmly good in a corrupted state, against the rage of tyrants single stood invincible."

Thomson: Winter.

Socrates used to call himself "the midwife of men's thoughts." Out of his intellectual school sprang those of Plato and the Dialectic system; Euclid and the Megaric; Aristippus and the Cynics; and Antisthenes and the Cynic.

Sodom. Apples of Sodom or mad apples. Strabo, Tacitus, and Josephus describe them as beautiful externally and filled with ashes. These "apples" are in reality gall-nuts produced by the insect called Ozympe inus'a.

Softarides (3 syll.). A dynasty of four kings, which lasted thirty-four years and had dominion over Khorassan, Seistan, Pars, etc. (873-907); founded by Yacoub ebn Laith, surnamed al Softar (the brazier), because his father followed that trade in Seistan.

Soft. He's a soft—half a fool. The word originally meant effeminate, unmanly; hence soft in brains, silly, etc., "soft in courage." (3 Henry VI., ii. 2.)

Soft Sawder. Flattery, adulation. A play is intended between solder (pronounced sawder) and sawder, a compound of saw (a saying). Soft solder, a composition of tin and lead, is used for soldering zinc, lead, and tin; hard solder for brass, etc. (French, soudure, Latin, solidus.)

Soft Soap. Flattery, complimentary words. (See Soapy Sam.)

Soft as Soap—as "silk," as "velvet." (See Similes.)

Soft Fire makes Sweet Malt (A). Too fierce a fire would burn malt and destroy its sweetness, and too much hurry or precipitation spoils work. "Soft and fair goes far;" "Love me little, love me long;" "Slow and steady wins the race;" "He who is in haste fishes in an empty pond;" "The more haste the worse speed;" "He who walks too hastily will stumble in a plain way;" "Hastily and well never met;" "It is good to have a hatch before the door;" "Hasty climbers have sudden falls."

Soft Words Butter no Parusips, or "Fair words," etc. Saying "Be thou fed" will not feed a hungry man. "Good words will not fill a sack." To "but fier parusips" means also "dorer la pilele" ("soft words will not gild the pill of distress").

Softly. To walk softly. To be out of spirits. In Greece, mourners for the dead used to cut off their hair, go about muffled, and walk softly to express want of spirit and strength. When Elijah denounced the judgments of heaven against Ahab, that wicked king "fasted, and lay in sackcloth, and went softly" to show that his strength was exhausted with sorrow (1 Kings xxii. 27). Isaiah says, "I shall go softly all my years in the bitterness of my soul" (xxxviii. 15). The Psalmist says, "My clothing was sackcloth... I walked as [for] a friend. or brother." The French Je vais danse- ment means precisely the same thing: "I go softly," because I am indisposed, out of sorts, or in low spirits.

Sofly. A soft, simple person.

"She were but a softy after all."—Mrs. Gaskell: Wieland's Lover, chap. xv.

Soho! The cry made by huntsmen when they uncouple the dogs in hunting the hare. Also to pointers and setters when they make a point. Tally-ho! (q.v.) is the cry when a fox breaks cover. So! or see! is to call attention, and ho! is virtually "hie after him."

"Now is the fox drevin to hole. Hou to hyn! Hou! Hou! Fur and he ape out he will you sile undo."—Excerpts Historians, p. 279.

"If ye haunt at the hare, ye shall say, atte un- coupling, hare de couple, dawder! And after, three times, Soho! Soho! Soho!"—A fifteenth-century translation of Reliquiae Antiquae.

When a stag breaks covert the cry is "haybo!" when a hare, "herbert: In Eni Sports, vol. iii. appendix B, p. 313.

* Of course "Ho!" is often used merely to call attention. Thus we say to one in advance, "Ho! stop!" and "Ho! every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters" (Isaiah lv, 1). This use of the word is a contracted form of hallo! In the hunting-field "So-ho" is doubtless a cry to encourage the dogs to follow up the quarry.

Soi-disant (French). Self-styled, would-be.

Soil. To take soil. A hunting term, signifying that the deer has taken to the water. Soil, in French, is the mire in which a wild boar wallows. (Danish, söl, mire; Swedish, söta, to wallow.)

"Fide went downe the daile to secke the hunde. And found hende takyn toun with a flood."—Brown: Britannia's Pastoral 164.

Soil the Milk before Using It. Yorkshire for "Sile the milk, etc."—i.e. strain it, or skim it. A sile is a sieve or strainer.

"Take a heefulde of sauc, and stampe it, and temper it with hale saile, and sythene sile it throwe to a hate clothes."—Mrs. Lucas, A. 4, 17: 781.

"Drink the licour siled throogh a clodele."—Mr. Pettigrew's possession (fifteenth century)

Sojourn (2 syl.) is the Italian sog- giro—i.e. sub-giorno; Latin, sub-dies- mus (for a day, temporarily).

Sol (Latin). The sun.

"And when Zeb Sol to loppe his wheels began."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, canto 1.

So-il. The term given by the ancient alchemists to gold. Silver was luna.

In the Edda was the daughter of Mainifieri, and sister of Mani. She was so beautiful that at death she was placed in heaven to drive the sun-chariot. Two horses were yoked to it, named Arvakur and Alsbirth (watchful and rapid). (Scandinavian mythology.) (See MANI.)

Sol-de (See Do, Re, etc.)

Soldan Goose. The gannet. (French, Oie de Soland (ou) d'Écouse; Icelandic, sula.)

Sola-no. Ask no favour during the Solano (Spanish). Ask no favour during a time of trouble, panic, or adversity. The Solano of Spain is a south-east wind, extremely hot, and loaded with fine dust. It produces giddiness and irritation. Called the Sirocco in Italy.

Solatium (A). A recompensce; a sop; a solace. (Latin, solatium.)

"It may be that Mr. Eldin will be persuaded to take one,heap of solatium for his defeat in Somersetshire."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1853.

Soldan or Sowdan. A corruption of sultan, meaning in mediæval romance the Saracen king; but, with the usual inaccuracy of these writers, we have the Soldan of Egypt, the Soudan of Persia, the Sowdan of Babylon, etc., all represented as accompanied by grim Saracens to torment Christians.

The Soldan, meant for Felipe of Spain, who used all his power to bide and seduce the subjects of Elizabeth. Queen Mercilla sent to negotiate a peace, but the ambassador sent was treated like a dog, referring to Felipe's detention of the deputies sent by the States of Holland. Sir Artesal demands of the soldan the release of the damsel "held as wrongful prisoner," and the soldan "swearing and banning most blasphemously," mounts his "high chariot," and prepares to maintain his cause. Prince Arthur encounters him "on the green," and after a severe combat uncovers his shield, at sight of which the soldan and all his followers take to flight. The "swearing and banning" refer to the excomuniactions thundered out against Elizabeth; the "high chariot" is the Spanish Armas'da; the "green" is the sea; the "uncovering of the shield" indicates that the Armas'da was put to flight, not by man's might, but by the power of God. Flavi Joehweh et dis- sipati sunt (God blew, and they were scattered). (Spenser: Faerie Queen, v. 8.)

Soldats (Des). Money. Shakespeare, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2; has "Money is a good soldier, sir, and will on." Doubtless the French use of the word is derived from the proverbial truth that "Money is the sinews of war," combined with a pun on the word soldus (the pay of a soldier). The Norman soud (i.e. soud) means "wages;" Swedish, besolda, to pay; Danish, besold, to pay wages; the French soldat, our soldier, a hireling or mercenary, and the French sol or sou.

Soldier originally meant a hireling or mercenary; one paid a soldius for military service; but hireling and soldier convey now very different ideas. (See above.)

To come the old soldier over one. To dictate peremptorily and profess superiority of knowledge and experience.

Soldier's Heart. A complaint common in the English army, indicated by a weak voice and great feebleness of the chest, for which soldiers are discharged. It is said to be the result of the present system of drill, which enforces expansion of the chest by restraining free breathing.

Soldiers' Battles (The). Malplaquet, 1709, and Inkermann, 1854, were both "soldiers' battles."

Soldiers of Fortune. Chevaliers de l'industrie; men who live by their wits. Referring to those men in mediæval times who let themselves for hire into any army.

"His father was a soldier of fortune, as I am a soldier."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xvi.

Soldiering. A barrack term for furbishing up of accoutrements.

"I got the screws last night, but I was busy soldiering till too late."—J. H. Barrie: Story of a Short Life, p. 25.

Solecism (3 syl.). Misapplication of words: an expression opposed to the laws of syntax; so called from the city of Soli, in Cilicia, where an Athenian colony settled, and forgot the purity of their native language. (Sodias.)

Solemn. Habitual, customary. (Latin, solemnis, strictly speaking means "once a year," "annual," solenn-asinn.)

"Solemn night with this here solemn bird" (i.e. the nightingale, the bird familiar to night)—Milton: Paradise Lost, v.

"Of course the usual meaning of "solemn" is devout; but an annual festival, like Good Friday, etc., may be both devout and serious. The Latin for "it is usual," is solemnne est, and to "solemnise" is to celebrate an annual custom.

The Solemn Doctor. Henry Goethals was so called by the Sorbonne, (1227-1293.)

Solemn League and Covenant, for the suppression of Popery and Prelacy, adopted by the Scotch Parliament in 1638, and accepted by the English in 1643. Charles II. swore to the Scotch that he would abide by it and therefore they crowned him in 1651 at Dunbar; but at the Restoration he not only rejected the covenant, but had it burnt by the common hangman.

Soler. An upper room, a loft, a garret. (Latin, solarium.)

"Hasily they went that all,
And sought him in the maidens hall,
In chambers high, as night at hide,
And in solers on the side."—Virg., Aeneid, xvi, 557.

Solid Doctor. Richard Middleton, a cordeliier; also called the Profound Doctor. (c. 1304.)

Soli. The Shefield of Germany, famous for swords and fencing-foils.

Solomon. The English Solomon. James I., called by Sully "the wisest fool in Christendom." (1566, 1603-1625.)

Henry VII. was so called for his wise policy in uniting the York and Lancaster factions. (1497, 1485-1509.)

Solomon of France. Charles V., le Sage. (1337, 1364-1380.)

St. Louis or Louis IX. (1215, 1226-1270.)

Solomon's Carpet. (See CARPET.)

Solomon's Ring. The rabbins say Solomon wore a ring with a gem that told him all he desired to know.

Solon of Parnassus. So Voltaire called Boileau, in allusion to his Art of Poetry. (1636-1711.)

So long. Good-bye, till we meet again.

Solstice (2 syl.). The summer solstice is June 21st; the winter solstice is December 22nd; so called because, on arriving at the corresponding points of the ecliptic, the sun is stopped and made to approach the equator again. (Latin, sol sistil or stat, the sun stops.)

Solyman. king of the Turks (in Jerusalem Delivered), whose capital was Nice. Being driven from his kingdom, he fled to Egypt, and was there appointed leader of the Arabs (bk. ix.). He and Argantes were by far the most doughty of the pagan knights. Solyma was slain by Rinaldo (bk. xx.), and Argantes by Tancred.
Soma. The moon, born from the eyes of Ati, son of Brahma; made the sovereign of plants and planets. Soma ran away with Tara (Star), wife of Vrishapata, preceptor of the gods, and Buddha was his offspring. (Hindu mythology.)

To drink the Soma. To become immortal. In the Vedic hymns the Soma is the moon-plant; the juice of which confers immortality, and exhilarates even the gods. It is said to be brought down from heaven by a falcon. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Somag'ia (singular somagianum). Horse-load. Italian, soma, a burden; somer'a, a beast of burden, an ass. (See SUMTER.)

Sombrero. A Spanish hat with a very wide brim.

Somerset. Anciently Sumorsate or Sumorsaet—i.e. Suth-mor-set (south moor camp).

Somerset or Somersault. A leap in which a person turns head over heels in the air and lights on his feet. (Latin, super saltem; French, sombrenerait.) Sometimes a person will turn twice or thrice in the air before he touches the ground.

"First that could make love faces, or could do
The valier's somersaults.

Dona: Poema. p. 300.

Somerset House occupies the site of a princely mansion built by Somerset the Protector, brother of Lady Jane Seymour, and uncle of Edward VI. At the death of Somerset on the scaffold it became the property of the Crown, and in the reign of James I. was called Denmark House in honour of Anne of Denmark, his queen. Old Somerset House was pulled down in the eighteenth century, and the present structure was erected by Sir William Chambers in 1776.

Somers. (See ZAMORIN.)

Son (or descendent of). Norman, Fitz, Gaelic, Mac; Welsh, Ap- (sometimes contracted into P, as P-richard); Irish, O'; Hebrew and Arabic, Ben-, all prefixes; English, -son; Russian, -vitch or -vitch, postfixes.

Son of Be'lial. One of a wicked disposition; a companion of the wicked. (See Judges xix. 22.)

"Now the sons of Eli were sons of Be'ial, they knew not the Lord."—1 Samuel ii. 12.

Son of Dripping (A). A man cook, a turnspit.

"Yet, son of dripping... let us halt; Soft fires, the proverb tells us, make sweet malt."—Peter Panther: The Lusked, canto ii.

Son of One Year. A child one year old; similarly a "son of sixty years," etc. (Exodus xii. 5.)

Son of Perdition. Judas Iscariot. (John xvii. 12.)

Son of perdition. Antichrist, who not only draws others to perdition, but is himself devoted to destruction. (2 Thessalonians ii. 3.)

Son of the Morning. A traveller. An Oriental phrase, alluding to the custom of rising early in the morning to avoid the mid-day heat, when on one's travels.

Son of the Star [Bar Cawhah]. A name assumed by Simon the Jew, in the reign of Hadrian, who gave himself out to be the "Star out of Jacob" mentioned in Numbers xxiv. 17.

Sons of God. Angels, genuine Christians, or believers who are the sons of God by adoption.

"As many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Romans viii. 14.

Sons of God. When Judæa was a theocracy the representative of God on earth was by the Jews called god; hence angels, rulers, prophets, and priests were called gods. Moses as the messenger of Jehovah was "a god to Pharaoh" (Exodus vii. 1); magistrates generally were called gods; thus it is said, "Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people" (Exodus xxii. 28). By a still further extension, anyone who gave a message to another was his god, because he "inspired him," as Moses was a god to Aaron his spokesman (Exodus iv. 10). Our Lord refers to this use of the word in John x. 34. (See also Genesis vi. 2, 4; Job i. 6; ii. 1; Psalm lxxxii. 6; Exodus iv. 22, 29; Hosea xi. 1.)

Sons of the King. soldiers rank and file. (2 Chronicles xxv. 13.)

Sons of the Mighty. Heroes. (Psalm xxxix. 1.)

Sons of the Prophets. Disciples or scholars belonging to the "college of the prophets," or under instruction for the ministry. In this sense we call the University where we were educated our "Alma mater." (See 1 Kings xx. 35.)

Sons of the Sorceress. Those who study and practise magic. (Isaiah lvii. 3.)

Song. Father of modern French song. Panard; also called the "Le Fontaine of the Vaudeville." (1691-1765.)
Song of Degrees. The fifteen Psalms, cxx. to cxxiv.; so called because they are prophetic of the return or "going up" from captivity. Some think there is a connection between these Psalms and the fifteen steps of the Temple porch. (Ezekiel xlii. 22-26.) In the Revised Version called "Song of Ascents."

Song of Roland, the renowned nephew of Charlemagne, slain in the pass of Roncesvalles. At the battle of Hastings, Taillefer advanced on horseback before the invading army, and gave the signal for onset by singing this famous song.

"Taillefer, who sang well and loud,
Came mounted on a charger prouder;
Before the duke the martial strain
And the Song of Roland rang.

Brunt of Waec (translated).

Song of Songs. The Canticles, or "Solomon's Song."

Sonna or Sunna. The Mishna or oral law of the Mahometans. Ireland (De Relig. Mahom., p. 54) says these traditions were orally delivered by Mahomet, and subsequently committed to writing. Albalphar'a-gius asserts that Ali, the son-in-law and cousin of Mahomet, was set aside because he refused to regard the oral traditions of the prophet of the same authority as the Koran. (Hist. Dynast., 182.) (Arabic, sunna, tradition.) (See Sunnites.)

Sonnambula (La). (See Amina, Elvino.)

Sonnet. Prince of the sonnet. Joachim du Bellay, a French sonneteer (1524-1560); but Petrarch better deserves the title. (1334-1374.)

Sop. A sop in the pan. A bimbouche, tit-bit, dainty morsel; a piece of bread soaked in the dripping of meat caught in a dripping-pan; also a bribe. (See below.)

To give a sop to Cerberus. To give a bribe, to quiet a troublesome customer. Cerberus is Pluto's three-headed dog, stationed at the gates of the infernal regions. When persons died the Greeks and Romans used to put a cake in their hands as a sop to Cerberus, to allow them to pass without molestation.

Sopf. A student at Cambridge is a Freshman for the first term, a Junior Sopf for the second year, and a Senior Sopf for the third year. The word Sopf is a contraction of "sophister," which is the Greek and Latin sophistes (a sophist). At one time these students had to maintain a given question in the schools by opposing the orthodox view of it. These opponents are now limited to Law and Divinity degrees.

Sophi or Saft [mystic], applied in Persia to ascetics generally, was given to Sheik Juneyd u Dien, grandfather of Shah Ismail, a Mahometan sectary or Shiite, who claimed descent, through Ali, from the twelve saints.

Sophia. The twelfth dynasty of Persia, founded by Shah Ismail I., grandson of Sheik Juneyd (1509). (See above.)

Sophia (Gk.), at Constantinople, is not dedicated to a saint named Sophiu, but to the "Logos," or Second Person of the Trinity, called Hagia Sophia (Sacred Wisdom).

Sophist, Sophistry, Sophiam, Sophisticator, etc. These words have quite run from their legitimate meaning. Before the time of Pythagoras (c. 586-506) the sages of Greece were called sohistes (wise men). Pythagoras out of modesty called himself a philosofeter (a wisdom-lover). A century later Protagoras of Abdera resumed the title, and a set of quibblers appeared in Athens who professed to answer any question on any subject, and took up the title discarded by the Wise Samian. From this moment sophos and all its family of words were applied to "wisdom falsely so called," and philo-sophos to the "modest search after truth."

Sorbon'ca. The public disputations sustained by candidates for membership of the Sorbonne. They began at 5 a.m. and lasted till 7 p.m.

Sorbonne. The institution of theology, science, and literature in Paris founded by Robert de Sorbon, Canon of Cambrai, in 1252. In 1808 the buildings were given to the University, and since 1821 have been the Académie universitaire de Paris.

Soroeress. (See Canidia, Cirsie, etc. etc.)

Sordello. A poem by Robert Browning, showing the conflict of a minstrel about the best way of making his influence felt, whether personally or by the power of song.

Sor'itea (Greek). A heaped-up or cumulative syllogism. The following will serve as an example:

All men who believe shall be saved.
Sorrows of Werther. A novel by Goethe. The heroine is Charlotte.

Sortes Virgiliae. Same as the Sortes Virgiliana (q.r.), only the Bible was substituted for the works of the poet.

Sortes Virgiliae. Telling one's fortune by consulting the Æneid of Virgil. You take up the book, open it at random, and the passage you touch at random with your finger is the oracular response. Seve'rus consulted the book, and read these words: "Forget not thou, O Roman, to rule the people with royal sway." Gordianus, who reigned only a few days, hit upon this verse: "Fate only showed him on the earth, but suffered him not to tarry." But, certainly, the most curious instance is that given by Dr. Wellwood respecting King Charles I. and Lord Falkland while they were both at Oxford. Falkland, to amuse the king, proposed to try this kind of augury, and the king hit upon bk. iv. ver. 881-893, the gist of which passage is that "evil wars would break out, and the king lose his life." Falkland, to laugh the matter off, said he would show his Majesty how ridiculously the "lot" would foretell the next fate, and he lighted on book xi. ver. 230-237, the lament of Evander for the untimely death of his son Pallas. King Charles, in 1643, mourned over his noble friend, who was shot through the body in the battle of Newbury.

Sorts. Out of sorts. Not in good health and spirits. The French être dérangé explains the metaphor. If cards are out of sorts they are deranged, and if a person is out of sorts the health or spirits are out of order.

In printers' language it means out of some particular letter, in which case they substitute for a time another letter.

To run upon sorts. In printing, said of work which requires an unusual number of certain letters, etc.; as an index, which requires a disproportionate number of capitals.

Sosia. The living double of another, as the brothers Antiphon and brothers Dromio in the Comedy of Errors, and the Corsican brothers in the drama so called. Sosia is a servant of Amphitryon, in Plautus's comedy so called. It is Mercury who assumes the double of Sosia, till Sosia doubts his own identity. Both Dryden and Molière have adapted this play to the modern stage, but the Comedy of Errors is based on another drama of the same author, called the Menechmi. (See AMPHITRYON.)

Sotadics or Sotadic Verse. One that reads backwards and forwards the same, as "Ille vid I did live, and evil I did dwell." So called from Sotades, the inventor. These verses are also called palindromic. (See PALINDROME.)

N.B. II is the old way of writing a capital L.

Sotric Year. The Persian year consists of 365 days, so that a day is lost in four years, and the lost bits in the course of 1,460 years amount to a year. This period of 1,460 years is called a sotric period, and the reclaimed year made up of the bits is called a notic year. (Greek, nothos, the dog-star, at whose rising it commences.)

Soul. The Moslems fancy that it is necessary, when a man is bow-stung, to relax the rope a little before death occurs to let the soul escape. The Greeks and Romans seemed to think that the soul made its escape with life out of the death-wound.

Soul. The Moslems say that the souls of the faithful assume the forms of snow-white birds, and nestle under the throne of Allah until the resurrection.

Soul. Heroicites held the soul to be a spark of the stellar essence: "scintillo stellaris essentiae." (Macrobius: Somnium Scipiorum, lib. i. cap. 14.)

"Vital spark of heavenly flame, Quit, oh! quit this mortal frame."

Pope: The Dying Christian to his Soul.

Soul, in Egyptian hieroglyphics, is represented by several emblems, as a basket of fire, a heron, a hawk with a human face, and a ram.

Soul Cakes. Cakes given in Staffordshire and Cheshire on All Souls' Day. to the poor who go a-souling, i.e., begging for soul-cakes. The words used are—

"Soul, soul, for soul-cake
Pray you, good mistress, a soul cake."

Soul and Spirit. VICE (the soul) contains the passions and desires, which animals have in common with man. VERBO (the spirit) is the highest and distinctive part of man. In 1 Thess. Paul says, "I pray God your whole spirit, soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ." (See also Heb. iv. 12; 1 Cor. ii. 14 and 15; xv. 45, 46.)

Soul of a Goose or Capon. The liver, called by the French ancre. The renowned Strasbourg "patès de foie gras" are made of these souls.

"Draw out all the entrails... but leave the soul,"—Brigg: English Dictionary of Cookery.

Sound, a narrow sea, is the Anglo-Saxon miuð; hence such words as Bomarsund, etc.

Sound Dues. A toll or tribute which was levied by the king of Denmark on all merchant vessels passing through the Sound. (Abolished 1857.)

Sound as a Bell. Quite sound. A cracked bell is useless as a bell.

"Blinde Fortune did so hapilly contrive,
That we, as sound as bell, did safe arrive
At Dover,"—Taylor's World, ii. 22 (1659).

Sound as a Roach. Quite sound. A pun upon roach or roach the fish, and the French roche, a rock.

Soundings. In nautical language, the depths of water in rivers, harbours, along shores, etc.

Sour Grapes. Things despised because they are beyond our reach. Many men of low degree call titles and dignities "sour grapes;" and men of no parts turn up their noses at literary honours. The phrase is from Æsop's fable called The Fox and the Grapes.

Sour Grapesim. An assumed contempt or indifference to the unattainable. (See above.)

"There, economy was always 'elegant,' and money-spending always 'vulgar' and outrageous—a sort of sour grapesim, which made us very peaceful and satisfied."—Mrs. Gaskell: Cranford, chap. i.

South-Sea Scheme or Bubble. A stock-jobbing scheme devised by Sir John Hunt, a lawyer. The object of the company was to buy up the National Debt, and to be allowed the sole privilege of trading in the South Seas. The £100 shares soon realised ten times that sum, but the whole bubble burst in 1720 and ruined thousands. (1710-1720.) The term is applied to any hollow scheme which has a splendid promise, but whose collapse will be sudden and ruinous. (See Mississippi Bubble.)

Southampton Street (London). So called in compliment to the noble family of that title, allied to the Bedford family, the proprietors.

Southampton's Wise Sons. In the early part of the present century, the people of Southampton cut a ditch for barges between Southampton and Redbridge; but as barges could go without paying dues through the "Southampton Water," the ditch or canal was never used. This wise scheme was compared to that of the man who cut two holes through the wall—one for the great cat and the other for its kitten.

Southern Gate of the Sun. The sign Capricornus or winter solstice. So called because it is the most southern limit of the sun's course in the ecliptic.

Soutras. The discourses of Buddha. (See Trīṭṭāka.)

Sovereign. A strangely misspelled word, the last syllable being mistaken for the word reign. It is the Latin spern (supreme over all), with the p changed to v. The French souverain is nearer the Latin word; Italian, sovrano; Spanish, soberano.

Sovereign. A gold coin of the value of twenty shillings, was first issued by Henry VIII., and was called because he was represented on it in royal robes.

Sow (to rhyme with "now"). You have got the wrong sow by the ear. Sow is a large tub with two ears or handles; it is used for pickling or sousing. The expression means, therefore, You have got hold of the wrong vessel, or, as the Latin phrase has it, "Pva ow'phor'd vn'cees" (You have brought me the little jug instead of the great gotch). French, seau (a bucket).

"You have got the right sow by the ear.
You have hit upon the very thing.
Sow. (See Pig Iron.)

Spa or Spa Water. A general name for medical springs. So called from Spa, in Belgium, in the seventeenth century, the most fashionable watering-place in Europe.

Spade. Why not call a spade a spade? Do not palliate sins by euphemisms.

"We call a horse but a horse, and the faults of tools but folly,"—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 1.

"I have learned to call wickedness by its own terms: a fig a fig, and a spade a spade."—John Addis.
Spanish Language 1164

Spades in cards. A corruption of the Spanish spadón, pikes or swords, called by the French piques (pikes).

Spanish Language (fr). In plain English without euphuism; calling a spade a "spade."

"Had I attempted to express my opinions in full "Spanish" language, I should have had to say many harder things." —Fra Olla.

Spa'elds (London). So called from "the Loudon Spa," the name of certain tea-gardens once celebrated for their "spa-water."

Spag'iric Art. Alchemy.

Spag'iric Food. Tegliostio's "elixir of immortal youth" was so called from the Latin word spagiricōs (chemical). Hence, chemistry is termed the "spagiric art," and a chemist is a spagirist.

Spagnaletto (the little Spaniard). José Ribera, the painter. Salvator Rosa and Guercino were two of his pupils. (1588-1659).

Spaie. A red deer of the third year.

"The young male is called in the first year a cull; in the second a brat; the third a span; the fourth a stagon or stag; the fifth a great stag; the sixth an heir, and so forth unto his death." —Harrison.

Spain. Château d'Espagne. (See Castle.)

Patron saint of Spain. St. James the Greater, who is said to have preached the Gospel in Spain, where he is called his "relics" are preserved.

Span New. (See Spick.)

Spaniel. The Spanish dog, from español, through the French.

Spanish Blades. A sword is called a tole'do, from the great excellence of the Toledo steel.

Spanish Brutus (Thr). Alfonzo Perez de Guzman (1258-1399). Lope de Vega has celebrated this hero. When besieged, he was threatened with the death of his son, who had been taken prisoner, unless he surrendered. Perez replied by throwing a dagger over the walls, and his son was put to death in his sight.

Spanish Main. The circular bank of islands forming the northern and eastern boundaries of the Caribbe'an Sea, beginning from Mosquito, near the isthmus, and including Jamaica, St. Domingo, the Leeward Islands, and the Windward Islands, to the coast of Vene-zuela in South America.

"We turned conquerors, and invaded the main of Spain." —Bacon.

Spanish Money. Fair words and compliments. The Spanish government is a model of dishonest dealings, the byword of the commercial world, yet no man is more irate than a Spaniard if any imputation is laid to his charge as inconsistent with the character of a man of honour.

Spanish Worm. A nail concealed in a piece of wood, against which a carpenter jars his saw or chisel. So called from Spanish woods used in cabinet-work.

Spank (1). A slap to urge one to greater energy. (See below.)

Spanker (1). A fore and aft sail set upon the mizen-mast of a three-masted vessel, and the jigger-mast of a four-masted vessel. There is no spanker in a one- or two-masted vessel of any rig. A "spanker" used to be called a "driver." (Supplied by an old sailor of long service.)

Spanking. Large, rapid, strong; as a "spanking big fellow," a "spanking speed," a "spanking breeze." Nautical term. (See above.)

Spare the Rod and Spoil the Child. Solomon (Prov. xiii. 24) says: "He that spareth the rod turneth his son;" but Samuel Butler, in his Hudibras (pt. ii. canto I, line 843), says: "Love is a bay, by poets styled, Then spare the rod, and spoil the child."

Sparkling Heat. Heat greater than white heat.

"There be several degrees of heat, in a smith's forge, according to the purpose of their work: (1) a blooded heat; (2) a white flame heat; (3) a sparkling or welding heat, used to weld hars or pieces of iron." —Keen's: MS. London, 1633, I. 360.

Spartan Dog. A blood-hound; a blood-thirsty man.

"(6) Spartan dog. More fell than anguish, hunger, or the sea." —Shakespeare: Othello, v. 11.

Spasmodic School. A name applied by Professor Ayton, to certain authors of the nineteenth century, whose writings are distinguished by spasmodic or forced conceits. Of this school the most noted are Carlyle, Bailey, (author of Festus), Alexander Smith, Sydney Dobell, etc.

Speaker's Eye. To catch the Speaker's eye. The rule in the House of Commons is that the member whose rising to address the House is first observed by the Speaker is allowed precedence.

Speaking. They are on speaking terms. They just know each other.
Speaking Heads

They are not on speaking terms. Though they know each other, they do not even salute each other in the street, or say "How d'ye do?"

Speaking Heads and Sounding Stones.
(1) Jabel Nagus [mountain of the bell], in Arabia Petraea, gives out sounds of varying strength whenever the sand slides down its sloping flanks.
(2) The white dry sand of the beach in the isle of Eigg, of the Hebrides, produces, according to Hugh Miller, a musical sound when walked upon.
(3) The statue of Mennon, in Egypt, utters musical sounds when the morning sun darts on it.
(4) The speaking head of Orpheus, at Lesbos, is said to have predicted the bloody death which terminated the expedition of Cyrus the Great into Scythia.
(5) The head of Minos, brought by Odin to Scandinavia, is said to have uttered responses.
(6) Gerbert, afterwards Pope Sylvester II., constructed a speaking head of brass (tenth century).
(7) Albertus Magnus constructed an earthen head in the thirteenth century, which both spoke and moved. Thomas Aquinas broke it, whereupon the mechanist exclaimed, "There goes the labour of thirty years!"
(8) Alexander made a statue of Esculapius which spoke, but Lucian says the sounds were uttered by a man concealed, and conveyed by tubes to the statue.
(9) The "ear of Dionysius" communicated to Dionysius, Tyrant of Syracuse, whatever was uttered by suspected subjects shut up in a state prison. This "ear" was a large black opening in a rock, about fifty feet high, and the sound was communicated by a series of channels not unlike those of the human ear.

Spear. Cairbar asks if Fingal comes in peace, to which Moi-anual replies:
"In peace he comes not, king of Erin, I have seen his forward spear." If a stranger kept the point of his spear forward when he entered a strange land, it was a declaration of war; if he carried the spear on his shoulder with the point behind him, it was a token of friendship.
(Osborn: Temora, i.)

Achilles' spear. Telephus, King of Myaia, in attempting to hinder the Greeks from marching through his country against Troy, was wounded by Achilles' spear, and was told by an oracle that the wound could be cured only by the weapon that gave it; at the same time the Greeks were told that they would never reach Troy except by the aid of Telephus. So, when the Myrian king repaired to Achilles' tent, some of the rust of the spear was applied to the wound, and, in return for the cure which followed, Telephus directed the Greeks on their way to Troy.

"Telephus utens consumptus est cenae perspect. Si non quem non aut dextra unius opus." Hor. Sat.

The spear of Telephus could both kill and cure. (Pollock, Sec. Achilles's spear.)

The heavy spear of Valere was of great repute in the days of chivalry.

Arthur's spear. None or Ron.

To break a spear. To fight in a tournament.

Spear-half. The male line. The female line was called by the Anglo-Saxons the Spindle-half (q.v.).

Spear of Ithuriel (Thor), the slightest touch of which exposed deceit. Thus when Ithuriel touched with his spear Satan squating like a toad close to the ear of Eve, the "toad" instantly resumed the form of Satan. (Milton: Paradise Lost, bk. iv. 810-811.)

"The sweet pen of Lord Halles, which, like Ithuriel's spear, confused so many shadows from scottish history, dissipated among the rest those of Banquo and Fleanacht."—Ser W. Scott.

Special Pleading. Quibbling; making your own argument good by forcing certain words or phrases from their obvious and ordinary meaning. A pleading in law means a written statement of a case pro and con, and "special pleaders" are persons who have been called to the bar, but do not speak as advocates. They advise on evidence, draw up affidavits, state the merits and demerits of a cause, and so on. After a time most special pleaders go to the bar, and many get advanced to the bench.

Specie, Species, means simply what is visible. As things are distinguished by their visible forms, it has come to mean kind or class. As drugs and condiments at one time formed the most important articles of merchandise, they were called species—still retained in the French espèces, and English species. Again, as bank-notes represent money, money itself is called specie, the thing represented.

Spectacles, the device of Thackeray in drawings made by him. In Punch, vol. xx. No. 495, p. 8, is a butcher's boy chalkling up "No Popery," and the tray forms a pair of spectacles, showing it was designed by Thackeray.
Spectre of the Brocken. The Brocken is the highest summit of the Harz mountains in Hanover. This summit is at times enveloped in a thick mist, which reflects in a greatly magnified degree any form opposite at sunset. In one of De Quincey's opium-dreams there is a powerful description of the Brocken spectre.

Spectrum, Spectra, Spectre (Latin, specto, to behold). In optics a spectrum is the image of a sunbeam beheld on a screen, after refraction by one or more prisms. Spectra are the images of objects left on the eye after the objects themselves are removed from sight. A spectre is the apparition of a person no longer living or not bodily present.

Speculate means to look out of a watch-tower, to spy about (Latin). Metaphorically, to look at a subject with the mind's eye, to spy into it; in commerce, to purchase articles which your mind has speculated on, and has led you to expect will prove profitable. (Speculatifs limis is what we should now call window-glass.)

Speech. Speech was given to conceal or disguise men's thoughts. Voltaire. But erroneously fathered on Taleyrand.

Speed. A great punster, the serving-man of Valentine, one of the Two Gentlemen of Verona. Launce is the serving-man of Proteus, the other gentleman. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Spell. (a), in workman's language, means a portion of time allotted to some particular work, and from which the men are relieved when the limited time expires.

To spell is to relieve another at his work.

Spell ho! An exclamation to signify that the allotted time has expired, and men are to be relieved by another set.

A pretty good spell. A long bout or pull, as a 'spell at the capstan,' etc. (The German spell means a performance as well as a play, game, or sport.)

Spellbinders. Orators who hold their audience spellbound. The word came into use in America in the presidential election of 1888.

"The Hon. Daniel De Quincey says: 'The broadest day of his life was when he beheld his name among the 'spellbinders' who held the audience in rapture with their eloquence.'"—Liberty Review, July 7th, 1894, p. 18.

Spelter. A commercial name for zinc. Also an abbreviation of spelter-solder.

Spheres. The music or harmony of the spheres. Pythagoras, having ascertained that the pitch of notes depends on the rapidity of vibrations, and also that the planets move at different rates of motion, concluded that the sounds made by their motion must vary according to their different rates of motion. As all things in nature are harmoniously made, the different sounds must harmonize, and the combination he called the 'harmony of the spheres.' Kepler has a treatise on the subject.

Spence. A salle à manger, the room in which meals are taken, a dining-room; also a store-room or pantry. (Dispensatorium, Old French dispense, a buttery.)

"The rest of the family held counsel in the spences."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xxx.

Spencer. An outer coat without skirts; so named from the Earl Spencer, who wore this dress. (George III.)

Spendthrift. The Danish thrift is the noun of the word thrive (to increase or prosper). Shakespeare says, "I have a mind presages me such thrift" (increase, profit). As our frugal ancestors found saving the best way to grow rich, they applied the word to frugality and careful management. A spendthrift is one who spends the thrift or saving of his father, or, as Old Adam says, the 'thriftly hire I saved." (As You Like It.)

Spenser (Edmund), called by Milton "the sage and serious Spenser." Ben Jonson, in a letter to Drummond, states that the poet "died for lack of bread." (1553-1599.)

Spenserian Meter (The). The metre in which Spenser's Faerie Queen is written. It is a stanza of nine iambic lines, all of ten syllables except the last, which is an Alexandrine. Only three different rhymes are admitted into a stanza, and these rhymes are thus disposed: Lines 1 and 3 rhyme; lines 2, 4, 6, 7 rhyme; lines 6, 8, 9 rhyme; thus:—

Spent. Weary. A hunting term. A deer is said to be spent when it stretches out its neck, and is at the point of death. In sea language, a broken mast is said to be "spent."
Sphinx (The Egyptian). Half a woman and half a lion, said to symbolise the "rising of the Nile while the sun is in Leo and Virgo." This "saying" must be taken for what it is worth.

Sphinx. Lord Bacon's ingenious resolution of this fable is a fair specimen of what some persons call "spiritualising" incidents and parables. He says that the whole represents "science," which is regarded by the ignorant as "a monster." As the figure of the sphinx is heterogeneous, so the subjects of science "are very various."

The female face "denotes volubility of speech:" her wings show that "knowledge like light is rapidly diffused:" her hooked talons remind us of "the arguments of science which enter the mind and lay hold of it." She is placed on a crag overlooking the city, for "all science is placed on an eminence which is hard to climb." If the riddles of the sphinx brought disaster, so the riddles of science "perplex and harass the mind."

You are a perfect sphinx.—You speak in riddles. You are nothing better than a sphinx.—You speak so obscurely that I cannot understand you. The sphinx was a sea-monster that proposed a riddle to the Thebans, and murdered all who could not guess it. Oedipus solved it, and the sphinx put herself to death. The riddle was this—

"What goes on four feet, on two feet, and three. But the more feet it goes on the weaker it is?"

Spice. A small admixture, a flavoursome; as, "He is all very well, but there's a spice of conceit about him." Probably the French espace.

God's bounty is all pure, without any space of evil."—Cato's Morals of the World.

Spick and Span New. Quite and entirely new. A spic is a spick or nail, and a span is a chip. So that a spick and span new ship is one in which every nail and chip is new. Halliwell mentions "span new." According to Dr. Johnson, the phrase was first applied to cloth just taken off the spanners or stretchers. (Dutch, spickspeldernew.)

Spider. Bruce and the spider. In the spring of 1305, Robert Bruce was crowned at Stene king of Scotland, but, being attacked by the English, retreated first to the wilds of Athole, and then to the little island of Rathlin, off the north coast of Ireland, and all supposed him to be dead. While lying perliu in this island, he one day noticed a spider near his bed try six times to fix its web on a beam in the ceiling. "Now shall this spider (said Bruce) teach me what I am to do, for I also have failed six times."

The spider made a seventh effort and succeeded; whereupon Bruce left the island (in the spring of 1307), collecting together 300 followers, landed at Carrick, and at midnight surprised the English garrison in Turnberry Castle; he next overthrew the Earl of Gloucester, and in two years made himself master of well-nigh all Scotland, which Edward III. declared in 1328 to be an independent kingdom. Sir Walter Scott tells us, in his Tales of a Grandfather (p. 26, col. 2), that in remembrance of this incident, it has always been deemed a foul crime in Scotland for any of the name of Bruce to injure a spider.

"I will grant you, my father, that this valiant burgher of Perth is one of the best-hearted men that draws breath... He went to his bed, in wantonness, to kill a spider, as if he were a kingman to King Robert of happy memory."—Sir Walter Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, ch. i.

Frederick the Great and the spider. While Frederick II. was at Sans Souci, he one day went into his ante-room, as usual, to drink a cup of chocolate, but set his cup down to fetch his handkerchief from his bedroom. On his return he found a great spider had fallen from the ceiling into his cup. He called for fresh chocolate, and next moment heard the report of a pistol. The cook had been suborned to poison the chocolate, and, supposing his treachery had been found out, shot himself. On the ceiling of the room in Sans Souci a spider has been painted (according to tradition) in remembrance of this story.

Spider. When Mahomet fled from Mecca he hid in a certain cave, and the Koreshites were close upon him. Suddenly an acacia in full leaf sprouting up at the mouth of the cave, a wood-pigeon had its nest in the branches, and a spider had woven its net between the tree and the cave. When the Koreshites saw this, they fell persuaded that no one could have recently passed that way, and went on.

Spider, anciently supposed to envenom everything it touched. In the examination into the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, one of the witnesses deposed that "the countess wished him to get the strongest poison that he could..." Accordingly he brought seven great spiders.

"There may be in the cup
A spider steeped, and one may drink, depart,
And yet partake no venom."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 1.
Spid'reen. According to old wives' fable, fever may be cured by wearing a spider in a nutshell round the neck.

"Cured by wearing a spider hung round one's neck in a nutshell." Longfellow: Evangeline.

Spiders will never set their webs on a cedar roof. (Caughey: Letters, 1845.)

Spiders spin only on dark days.

"The subtle spider never spins, But on dark day s, his sticky arms." S. Butler: On a Nonconformist, iv.

Spider. The shool called the Shambles at the entrance of Portland Roads was very dangerous before the breakwater was constructed. According to legend, at the bottom of the gigantic shaft are the wrecks of ships seized and sunk by the huge spider Krakien, called also the fish-monster.

Spid'reen or Spidereen. The anonyuma of ships. If a sailor is asked what ship he belongs to, and does not choose to tell, he will say, "The spidereen frigate with nine decks." Officers who will not tell their quarters, give B.K.S. as their address. (See B.K.S.)

Spigot. Spout of the spigot and spill at the bung. To be parsimonious in trifles and wasteful in great matters, like a man who stops his beer-tub at the vent-hole and leaves it running at the bung-hole.

Split Milk. (See CRY.)

Spindle-half. The female line. A Saxon term. The spindle was the pin on which the thread was wound from the spinning-wheel. (See SPEAR-HALF.)

Spinning Jenny. Jennie is a diminutive and corruption of engine ('ginie). A little engine invented by James Hargreaves, a Lancashire weaver, in 1767. It is usually said that he called it after his wife and daughter; but the name of his wife was Elizabeth, and he never had a daughter.

Spino'za's System. The "system of Spinoza" is that matter is eternal, and that the universe is God.

Spinster. An unmarried woman. The fleece which was brought home by the Anglo-Saxons in summer, was spun into clothing by the female part of each family during the winter. King Edward the Elder commanded his daughters to be instructed in the use of the distaff. Alfred the Great, in his will, calls the female part of his family the spindle side; and it was a regularly received axiom with our frugal forefathers, that no young woman was fit to be a wife till she had spun for herself a set of body, table, and bed linen. Hence the maiden was termed a spinner or spinster, and the married woman a wife or "one who has been a spinner." (Anglo-Saxon, wef, from the verb wyfan or wefan, to weave.)

"The armorial bearings of women are not painted on a shield, like those of men, but on a spindle (called a "lozenge"). Among the Romans the bride carried a distaff, and Homer tells us that Kryseis was to spin and share the king's bed.

Spirit. To give up the spirit. To die. At death the "spirit is given back to Him who gave it."

Spirits. Inflammable liquors obtained by distillation. This is connected with the ancient notion of bottle-umps (q.r.), whence these liquors were largely used in the black arts.

Spirits. There are four spirits and seven bodies in alchemy. The spirits are quicksilver, orpiniment, sal-ammoniac, and brimstone. (See SEVEN BODIES.)

"The first spirit quicksilver called is Sal ammoniac, and the forth hremstoun." Chaucer: Pel, of the Chapman English Tale.

Spirits. There were formerly said to be three in animal bodies:

1. The animal spirits, seated in the brain; they perform through the nerves all the actions of sense and motion.
2. The vital spirits, seated in the heart, on which depend the motion of the blood and animal heat.
3. The natural spirits, seated in the liver, on which depend the temper and "spirit of mind."

Spirits (Elemental). There are four sorts of elemental spirits, which rule respectively over the four elements. The fire spirits are SALAMANDERS, the water spirits UNDINES (2 syl.); the air spirits SYLPHS; and the earth spirits GNOMES (1 syl.).

Spirited Away. Kidnapped: Allured. Kidnappers who beguiled orphans, apprentices, and others on board ship in order to sell them to planters in Barbadoes and Virginia, were called "spirits." Mr. Doyle (English in America, p. 512) finds the word used in this sense in official papers as early as 1657. (Notes and Queries, 17th December, 1892.)
Spiritual Mother. So Joanna Southcott is addressed by her disciples. (1750-1814.)

Spiritualism or Spiritism. A system which started up in America in 1818. It professes that certain living persons have the power of holding communion with the "spirits of the dead." Nineteenth century spiritualism probably owes its origin to Andrew Jackson Davis, "the seer of Poughkeepsie."

Spirit or Spurt. A sudden convulsive effort (Swedish, spruta; Danish, sprede; Icelandic, sprelta, to start; our spout, to throw up water in a jet).

Spitalfields (London). A spital is a charitable foundation for the care of the poor, and these were the fields of the almshouse founded in 1197 by Walter Brine and his wife Rosina.

Spite of His Teeth (Ju). In spite of opposition; though you snarl and show your teeth like an angry dog.

Spitfire. An inscrutable person, whose angry words are like fire spit from the mouth of a fire-enterer.

Spitting for Luck. Boys often spit on a piece of money given to them for luck. Boxers spit upon their hands for luck. Fishwomen not unfrequently spit upon their hensel (i.e., the first money they take) for luck. Spitting was a charm against witchcraft among the ancient Greeks and Romans. Pliny says it averted witchcraft, and availed in giving to an enemy a shrewdener blow.

"Thereon my breech I cast to unroll my sail.
From fascinating charmse," Threncham.

Spittle or Spital. An hospital.

A spittle or hospital for poor folk diseased:

A spittle, hospitall, or housefor lepers.

Bart. Altexis (1581).

Spittle Sermons. Sermons preached formerly at the Spittle in a pulpit erected expressly for the purpose. Subsequently they were preached at Christchurch, City, on Easter Monday and Tuesday. Ben Jonson alludes to them in his Underwoods, ap. Gifford, viii. 411.

Splay. A contraction of display (to unfold; Latin, des-plero). A splay window is one in a V-shape, the external opening being very wide, to admit as much light as possible, but the inner opening being very small. A splay-foot is a foot displayed or turned outward. A splay-mouth is a wide mouth, like that of a clown.

Spleen was once believed to be the seat of ill-humour and melancholy. The herb spleenwort was supposed to remove these spleenic disorders.

Splendid Shilling. A mock-heroic poem by John Philips. (1676-1708.)

splice. To marry. Very strangely, "splice" means to split or divide. The way it came to signify unite is this: Ropes' ends are first untwisted before the strands are interwoven. Joining two ropes together by interweaving their strands is "splicing" them. Splicing wood is joining two boards together, the term being borrowed from the sailor. (German, splicessen, to split.)

Splice the Main Brace. (See MAIN BRACE.)

To get spliced is to get married or tied together as one.

Spoke (verb). When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out "Spoke," they mean that the person who gets up to address the assembly has spoken already, and cannot speak again except in explanation of something imperfectly understood.

Spoke (noun). I have put my spoke into his helmet. I have shut him up. The allusion is to the pin or spoke used to lock wheels in machinery.

Don't put your spoke into my wheel. Don't interfere with my business; let my wheel turn, and don't you put a pin in to stop it or interrupt its movement. The Dutch have "een spak in Criet steken," to thwart a purpose.

When solid wheels were used, the driver was provided with a pin or spoke, which he thrust into one of the three holes made to receive it, to skid the cart when it went down-hill. The carts used by railway navvies, and tram-wagons used in collieries, still have a wheel "spoked" in order to skid it.

Sponge. Throw up the sponge. Give up; confess oneself beaten. The metaphor is from boxing matches.

"We must stand up to our fight now, or throw in the sponge. There's no two ways about the matter."—Holtwood. Robbery under Arms, chap. xxxii.

"We hear that the followers of the Arab chief have thrown up the sponge."—Newspaper paragraph, April 2nd, 1849.

Spontaneous Combustion. Taking fire without the intervention of applied heat. Greasy rags heaped together, hay stacked in a damp state, coal-dust in coal mines, cinders and ashes in dust bins, are said to be liable to spontaneous combustion.

Spoon. (See Apostle-Spoons.)

He hath need of a long spoon that eath with the devil. Shakespeare alludes to this proverb in the Comedy of Errors, iv. 3; and again in the Tempest, ii. 2, where Stephano says: “Mercy! mercy! this is a devil... I will leave him, I have no long spoon.”

“Therfore heabed him a ful long spoon
That scateth with a friend.”

Chaucer: The Squire’s Tale, 1390.

Spoon (n.). One who is spoozy, or sillily love-sick on a girl.

“He was awfully spoomy at the time.”—Truth (Queer Story), March 24th, 1890.

Spooning. In rowing, is dipping the oars so little into the water as merely to skim the surface. The resistance being very small, much water is thrown up and more disturbed.

Spoony. Lovingly soft. A seaphrase. When a ship under sail in a sea-storm cannot bear it, but is obliged to put right before the wind, she is said to “spoon,” so a young man under sail in the sea of courtship “spoons” when he cannot bear it, but is obliged to put right before the gale of his lady’s “eyebrow.”

Sporran (tachie). The heavy pouch worn in front of the philibeg of a Highlander’s kilt.

Sport a Door or Oak. To keep an outer door shut. In the Universities the College rooms have two doors, an outer and an inner one. The outer door is called the sporting door, and is opened with a key. When shut it is to give notice to visitors that the person who occupies the rooms is not at home, or is not to be disturbed. The word sport means to exhibit to the public, as, “to sport a new equipment,” “to sport a new file [hat],” etc.; whence to have a new thing, as “to sport an agrotat [silk-leave];” or merely to show to the public, as “sport a door or oak.” The word is a contraction of support. (French, supporter, to sustain, carry; Latin, supporto.)

Sporting Seasons in England.

These marked times are fixed by Act of Parliament.

- Black gun. August 30th to December 30th: but in Somerset, Devon, and New Forest, from September 1st to December 10th.
- Black-cock. August 30th to December 10th.
- Buck hunting, August 20th to September 15th.
- Bustard, September 1st to March 1st.
- Hare, Deer hunted, August 30th to September 30th.
- Hare, Deer hunted, September 1st to June 18th.
- Fallow Deer (Ireland), June 20th to Michaelmas.
- Fallow Deer (Ireland), June 20th to Michaelmas.
- Fox, hunting, August 1st to May 15th.
- Fox Cubs, August 1st to the first Monday in November.
- Game shooting, August 15th to December 15th.
- Hares, March 15th to August 15th.
- Hunt, hunting in October and again between April 18th and May 15th.

Spread-eagle (To). To fly away like a spread-eagle; to beat. (Sporting term.)

“You’ll spread-eagle all the [an]ther rattle in a brace of shakers.”—Quota: Under Two Fingers, chapter ix.

Spread-eagle Oratory. “A compound of exaggeration, effrontery, bombast, and extravagance, mixed with metaphors, platitudes, threats, and irreverent appeals flung at the Almighty.”
Spring Gardens

(Spring American Review, November, 1868.)

Spring Gardens (London). So called from a playfully contrived waterwork, which, on being unguardedly pressed by the foot, sprinkled the bystanders with water. (James I., etc.)

Spring Tide. The tide that springs or leaps or swells up. These full tides occur at the new and full moon, when the attraction of both sun and moon act in a direct line, as thus—

:o o * or * :o

Sprout-kele. The Saxon name for February. Kele is coldwort, the great pot-wort of the ancient Saxons; the broth made thereof was also called kele. This important pottage herb begins to sprout in February. (Fristegan.)

Spruce. Smart, dandified. Hall tells us it is a corruption of Prussian-like, a la Prusse, and gives the subjoined quotation:

"After them came Sir Edward Hayward, and with him Sir Thomas Parre, in doublets of crimson velvet, faced on the breast with chains of silver, and over that short clacks of crimson satin, and on their heads huts after dancer-fashion, with feathers in them. They were apparelled after the fashion of Prussia or spurre."--In confirmation of this it may be mentioned that "SPRUCE LEATHER" is certainly a corruption of Prussian leather; spurre-beer is beer made from the spurre of Prussian fit, and bonze, in Prussia, is famous for the beverage.

Spun (To be). Exhausted, undone, ruined.

I shall be spun. There's a dance within Which tells me plainly I am undone.
For though I look not, neither do I spin,
I shall be spun."--Robert Browning (1849)

Spun Out. As "the tale was spun out"—that is, prolonged to a disproportionate length. It is a Latin phrase, and the allusion is to the operation of spinning and weaving. Cicero says, "Tuae dedicata poenula filo"—that is, poems spun out to a fine thread.

Spunging House. A victualling house where persons arrested for debt are kept for twenty-four hours, before lodging them in prison. The houses so used are generally kept by a bailiff, and the person lodged is spunged of all his money before he leaves.

Spur Money. Money given to redeem a pair of spurs. Gifford says, in the time of Ben Jonson, in consequence of the interruptions to divine service occasioned by the ringing of the spurs worn, a small fine was imposed on those who entered church in spurs. The enforcement of this fine was committed to the beadle and chorister-boys.

Spurs. Ripon spurs. The best spurs were made at Ripon, in Yorkshire.

If my spurs be not right Ripon: "
Ben Jonson: Staple of York.

The Battle of Spurs. The battle of Guinnegate, fought in 1513, between Henry VIII. and the Duke of Longueville. So called because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in flight.

The Battle of the Spurs. The battle of Courtrai, in 1302. So called because the victorious Flemings gathered from the field more than 700 gilt spurs, worn by French nobles slain in the fight.

To dish up the spurs. In Scotland, during the times of the Border feuds, when any of the great families had come to the end of their provisions the lady of the house sent up a pair of spurs for the last course, to intimate that it was time to put spurs to the horses and make a raid upon England for more cattle.

"He dishes up the spurs in his helpless address, like one of the old Border churls with an empty hand."—The Daily Telegraph.

To win his spurs. To gain the rank of knighthood. When a man was knighted, the person who dubbed him presented him with a pair of gilt spurs.

Spy. Vidoeq, the spy in the French Revolution, was a short man, vivacious, vain, and talkative. He spoke of his feats with real enthusiasm and gusto.

Spy (of Vanity Fair). Leslie Ward, successor of "Ape" (Pellegrini, the caricaturist.)

Spy Wednesday. The Wednesday before Good Friday, when Judas bargained to become the spy of the Jewish Sanhedrim. (Matt. xxvi. 3-5, 14-16.)

Squab Pie. Pie made of squabs—i.e., young pigeons; also a pie made of mutton, apples, and onions.

'Coventry squab e. and Devon white-pot
And Levereteres e. _and bacon, fit for kings._
King: All of Coleson.'

Squad. The awkward squad consists of recruits not yet fitted to take their places in the regimental line. Squad is a mere contraction of squadron.

Squalls, Look out for squalls. Expect to meet with difficulties. A nautical term.

"If this is the case, let the ministry look out for squalls."—Newspaper paragraph, July 9th, 1884.
Square. To put oneself in the attitude of boxing, to quarrel. (Welsh, cewr — i.e. cewrly, cewrlym, to quarrel.)

("Are you such fools
To square for this?");

Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, ii. 1.

Square the Circle. To attempt an impossibility. The allusion is to the mathematical question whether a circle can be made which contains precisely the same area as a square. The difficulty is to find the precise ratio between the diameter and the circumference. Popularly it is 3:1415... the next decimals would be 25537, but the numbers would go on ad infinitum.

Squash. A sort of pumpkin, called by the American Indians ascuataquash.

Squib (A). A political joke, printed and circulated at election times against a candidate, with intent of bringing him into ridicule, and influencing votes.

("Parodies, lampoons, racy and sardonic..." — Burns: Hail: Rose-garden and Pulpit.

Squint-eyed [Gueves'e]. Gian Francesco Barbieri, the great painter. (1590-1666.)

Squintisegro. Squinting.

("The squintisegro maid
Of lowe saw teze... should with a swelling drops..."

Bowen: Vitit Satire of Judgement.

Squire of Dates. Any cavalier who is devoted to ladies. Spencer, in his Faerie Queene (bk. iii, chap. vii), introduces the "squire," and records his adventures.

Stabat Mater. The celebrated Latin hymn on the Crucifixion, which forms a part of the service during Passion week, in the Roman Catholic Church. It was composed by Jacopone, a Franciscan of the thirteenth century, and has been set to music by Pergolese, also by Rossini.

In the catalogue of the Library of Burgundy, No. 13,993, is the following:—

(St. Benedictus Pius X. compositum in crucem, etc., compersique omnibus confessori..."

Sixteenth century.)

Stable-door. Locking the stable-door after the horse (or steed) is stolen. Taking precautions after the mischief is done.

Stable Keys, as those of cow-houses, have frequently a perforated flint or horn appended to them. This is a charm to guard the creatures from nightmare. The flint is to propitiate the gnomes, and the horn to obtain the good graces of Pan, the protector of cattle.

Staff. I keep the staff in my own hand. I keep possession; I retain the right. The staff was the ancient sceptre, and therefore, figuratively, it means, power, authority, dignity, etc.

To part with the staff. To lose or give up office or possession. (See above.)

("Give up your staff, sir, and the king his office..."

Shakespeare: Henry VI, ii. 3.

To put down one's staff in a place. To take up one's residence. The allusion is to the tent-staff: where the staff is placed, there the tent is stretched, and the nomad resides.

To strike my staff. To lodge for the time being.

("Then mayst see me at the pleasure of..."

Cesar: Romeo, v."

Staff of Life (The). Bread which is the support of life. Shakespeare says, "The boy was the very staff of my age." The allusion is to a staff which supports the feeble in walking.

Stafford. He has had a treaty in Stafford Court. He has been thoroughly cudgelled. Of course the pun is on the word staff, a stick. The French have a similar phrase—"Il a eke un festin de Martin Bistro." (He has been to Jack Drum's entertainment.)

Stafford Law. Club law. A beating. The pun is on the word staff, a stick. (Italian, Branco licenza) "(Flora, p. 66.) (See above.)

Stag. The reason why a stag symbolises Christ is from the superstition that it draws serpents by its breath from their holes, and then tramples them to death. (See Flora, Nat. Hist., viii. 50.)

Stag in Christian art. The attribute of St. Julian Hospitalier, St. Felix of Valois, and St. Aiden. When it has a crucifix between its horns it alludes to the legendary tale of St. Hubert. When luminous it belongs to St. Eustachius.

Stags, in Stock Exchange phraseology, are persons who apply for the allotment of shares in a joint-stock company, not because they wish to hold the shares, but because they hope to sell the allotment at a premium. If they fail in this they forbear to pay the deposit and the allotment is forfeited. (See Bear, Bull.)

Stag'rte or Stag'rte (3 syl.). (Greek, σταγιρίτης.) Aristotle, who was Stand to his Guns (To). To persist in a statement; not to give way. A military phrase.

"The speaker said he hoped the gallant gentleman would try to modify his phrase; but Colonel Sanderson still stood to his guns."—Daily Graphic, 5th February, 1883.

Stand to Reason (To), or It stands to reason, is the Latin constare, constat.

Standing Dish (A). An article of food which usually appears at table. (Cubs, quotidianus.)

Standing Orders. Rules or instructions constantly in force.

Standing orders. Those bye-laws of the Houses of Parliament for the conduct of their proceedings which stand in force till they are either rescinded or suspended. Their suspension is generally caused by a desire to hurry through a Bill with unusual expedition.

Standing Stones. (See STONES.)

Standard. American standard of 1776. A snake with thirteen rattles, about to strike, with the motto "DON'T TREAD ON ME!"

Standards.
Standard of Augustus. A globe, to indicate his conquest of the whole world.

Standard of Mahomet. (See Sandschaki.)

Standard of the Anglo-Saxons. A white horse.

Royal Standard of Great Britain. A banner with the national arms covering the entire field.

The Celestial Standard. So the Turks call their great green banner, which they say was given to Mahomet by the angel Gabriel. (See Sandschaki.)

Constantia (Standard of), called Labarum. It consisted of a silver-plated spear with a cross-beam, from which hung a small silk banner, bearing the portrait of the reigning family and the famous monogram.

Danish Standard. A raven.

Egypt (ancient). An eagle stripped of its feathers, an emblem of the Nile; the head of an ox.

Flyanks (ancient). A tiger or wolf; but subsequently the Roman eagle.

Gauls (ancient). A lion, bull, or bear.

Greco-Egyptian Standard. A round-headed table-knife or a semicircular fan.

Greek (ancient). A purple coat on the top of a spear.
Standards

(1)
Athena, Minerva, an olive, an owl.
(2) Corinth, a pegasus or flying horse.
(3) Larvaderon, the initial letter L, in Greek (A).
(4) Messina, the initial letter M.
(5) Thebes, a sphinx.

Helopolis. On the top of a staff, the head of a white eagle, with the breast stripped of feathers and without wings. This was the symbol of Jupiter and of the Lagidiges.

Jews (ancient), (“degel”) belonged to the four tribes of Judah, Reuben, Ephraim, and Dan. The Rabbins say the standard of Judah bore a lion, that of Reuben a man, that of Ephraim a bull, and that of Dan the cherubim (Gen. xlix. 3-22). They were ornamented with white, purple, crimson, and blue, and were embossed.

Persia (ancient). The one adopted by Cyrus, and perpetuated, was a golden eagle with outstretched wings; the colour white.

Persian Standard. A blacksmith’s apron. Kaivah, sometimes called Gaio, a blacksmith, headed a rebellion against Biver, surnamed Inb-ak (ten vices), a merciless tyrant, and displayed his apron as a banner. The apron was adopted by the next king, and continued for centuries to be the national standard. (B.C. 800.)

Roman Standards. In the rude ages a wisp of straw. This was succeeded by bronze or silver devices attached to a staff. Pliny enumerates five—viz. the eagle, wolf, minotaur, horse, and boar. In later ages the image of the emperor, a hand outstretched, a dragon with a silver head and body of taffety. Marius confined all promiscuous devices to the cohorts, and reserved the eagle for the exclusive use of the legion. This eagle, made of gold and silver, was borne on the top of a spear, and was represented with its wings displayed, and bearing in one of its talons a thunderbolt.

Turkish Standards.

(1) Sanjak Chenif (Standard of the Prophet), green silk. This is preserved with great care in the Seraglio, and is never brought forth except in time of war.
(2) The Sanjak, red.
(3) The Tug, consisting of one, two, or three horse-tails, according to the rank of the person who bears it. Pachus with three tails are of the highest dignity, and are entitled beglerbeg (prince of princes). Beys have only one horse-tail. The tails are fastened to the end of a gilt lance, and carried before the pasha or bey.

(4) The Alem, a broad standard which, instead of a spear-head, has in the middle a silver plate of a crescent shape.

Standards of Individuals.

Augustus (of). A globe, to indicate his “empire of the world.”
Mahomet (of). See under Turkish Standards.

Standards (Size of) varied according to the rank of the person who bore them. The standard of an emperor was eleven yards in length; of a king, nine yards; of a prince, seven yards; of a marquis, six and a half yards; of an earl, six yards; of a viscount or baron, five yards; of a knight-bannet, four and a half yards; of a baronet, four yards. They generally contained the arms of the bearer, his cognisance and crest, his motto or war-cry, and were fringed with his livery.

The Battle of the Standard, between the English and the Scotch, at Ceton Moor, near Northallerton, in 1138. Here David L., fighting on behalf of Matilda, was defeated by King Stephen’s general Robert de Mowbray. It received its name from a ship’s mast erected on a waggon, and placed in the centre of the English army; the mast displayed the standards of St. Peter of York, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfred of Ripon. On the top of the mast was a little casket containing a consecrated host. (Hales: Annals of Scotland, i. p. 85.)

Stang. To ride the stang. To be under pettyuc government. At one time a man who ill-treats his wife was made to sit on a “stang” or pole hoisted on men’s shoulders. On this uneasy conveyance the “stanger” was carried in procession among the hootings and jeerings of his neighbours. (Saxon, steung, a pole.) (See STANDINGTON.)

Stanhope (A). A light open one-seated carriage, with two or four wheels. Invented by a Mr. Stanhope.

Stanhope Lens. A cylindrical lens with spherical ends of different radii. The covering of the tube into which the lens is fitted is called the “cup.”

Stank Hen (A). A Moor-hen. (Slagnum [Latin], a pool, pond, or stank [tank still common]; sto, to stand.)
Stannary Courts

Stannary Courts. Courts of record in Cornwall and Devon for the administration of justice among the tinners. (Latin, stannum, tin.)

Star (a), in theatrical language, means a popular actor.

Star (in Christian art). St. Bruno bears one on his breast; St. Dominic, St. Humbert, St. Peter of Alcan'tare, one over their head, or on their forehead, etc.

Star. The ensign of knightly rank. A star of some form constitutes part of the insignia of every order of knighthood.

His star is in the ascendant. He is in luck's way; said of a person to whom some good fortune has fallen and who is very prosperous. According to astrology, those leading stars which are above the horizon at a person's birth influence his life and fortune; when those stars are in the ascendant, he is strong, healthy, and lucky; but when they are depressed below the horizon, his stars do not shine on him, he is in the shade and subject to ill-fortune.

"The star of Richelieu was still in the ascendant." - St. Simon Star Chamber. A court of civil and criminal jurisdiction at Westminster, abolished in the reign of Charles I. So called because the ceiling or roof was decorated with gilt stars. Its jurisdiction was to punish such offences as the law had made no provision for.

The chamber where the "stars" or Jewish documents were kept was a separate room. The Star Chamber was the Camara Stellata, not Camara Stareta.

It is well known that, before the banishment of the Jews by Edward I., their contracts and obligations were denominated "stars, or stars. . . . The room in the exchequer where the chests. . . . were kept was . . . the star-chamber." - Blackstone: Commentaries, vol. ii. book iv. p. 396, a note.

Star-crossed. Not favoured by the stars; unfortunate.

Star of Bethlehem (The), botanically called ornithogalum. The French peasants call it "la dame d'once hues, because it opens at eleven o'clock. Called "star" because the flower is star-shaped; and "Bethlehem" because it is one of the most common wild flowers of Bethlehem and the Holy Land generally.

Star of the South. A splendid diamond found in Brazil in 1853.

Stars and Garters (My). An expulsive, or mild kind of oath. The stars and garters of knighthood. Shakespeare makes Richard III. swear "By my George, my garter, and my crown!" (Richard III., iv. 4.)

Stars and Stripes (The) or the Star-spangled Banner, the flag of the United States of North America.

The first flag of the United States, raised by Washington June 2, 1776, consisted of thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, with a blue canton emblazoned with the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew.

In 1777 Congress ordered that the canton should have thirteen white stripes in a blue field. In 1794 (after the admission of Vermont and Kentucky) the stripes and stars were increased to fifteen.

In 1818 R. R. Read suggested that the original thirteen stripes should be restored, and a star be added to signify the States in the union.

The flag preceding 1776 represented a coiled rattlesnake with thirteen rattles, and the motto Don't tread on me. This was an imitation of the Scotch thistle and the motto Nova scotia, supposed hence.

"Oh! say, does that star-spangled banner yet wave O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?"

Starboard and Larboard. Star-board is the Anglo-Saxon steor, rudder, bord, bord; meaning the right side of a ship (looking forwards). Larboard is now obsolete, and "port" is used instead. To port the helm is to put the helm to the larboard. Byron, in his shipwreck (Don Juan), says of the ship—

"She gave a lurch, i.e., turned on one side, and then a lurch to port, And wound down head foremost, sank, in short."

Starch. Mrs. Anne Turner, half-milliner, half-procureus, introduced into England the French custom of using yellow starch in getting up bands and cuffs. She trafficked in poison, and being concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, appeared on the scaffold with a huge ruff. This was done by Lord Coke's order, and was the means of putting an end to this absurd fashion.

"I shall never forget poor Mistress Turner, my honoured paupress, peace be with her!" She had the ill-luck to meddle in the matter of Somerset and Overbury, and so the great earl and his lady kept their heads out of the collar, and left her and some half-dozen others to suffer in their stead."—Sir Walter Scott. Fortunes of Nigel, viii.

Starry Sphere. The eighth heaven of the Peripatetic system; also called the "Firmament."

"The Crystal Heaven is this, whose rugged verge And binds the starry sphere."

Cowan. Lusard, bk. x.

Starvation Dundas. Henry Dundas, first Lord Melville, who was the first to introduce the word starvation into the language, on an American debate in 1775. (Anglo-Saxon, steelfan, to perish of hunger; German, sterben; Dutch, sterven.)
Starved with Cold. Half-dead with cold. (Anglo-Saxon, steaffan, to die.)

Stations. The fourteen stations of the Catholic Church. These are generally called "Stations of the Cross," and the whole series is known as the via Calvary or via Crucis. Each station represents some item in the passage of Jesus from the Judgment Hall to Calvary, and at each station the faithful are expected to kneel and offer up a prayer in memory of the event represented by the fresco, picture, or otherwise. They are as fol-

(1) Jesus is condemned to death
(2) Jesus is made to bear His cross.
(3) Jesus falls the first time under His cross.
(4) Jesus meets His afflicted mother
(5) Simon the Cyrenian helps Jesus to carry
His cross.
(6) Veronica wipes the face of Jesus.
(7) Jesus falls the second time
(8) Jesus speaks to the daughters of Jerusalem.
(9) Jesus falls the third time
(10) Jesus is stripped of His garments
(11) Jesus is nailed to the cross.
(12) Jesus dies on the cross.
(13) Jesus is taken down from the cross.
(14) Jesus is placed in the sepulchre.

Statira. A stock name of those historical romances which represented the fate of empires as turning on the effects produced on a crack-brained lover by some charming Manda'na or Statira. In La Calprenède's Cassandre, Statira is represented as the perfection of female beauty, and is ultimately married to Oroonda'tes.

Stator [the stopper or arrstator].
When the Romans fled from the Sabines, they stopped at a certain place and made terms with the victors. On this spot they afterwards built a temple to Jupiter, and called it the temple of Jupiter Stator or Jupiter who caused them to stop in their flight.

"Here, Stator Jove and Phoebus, god of war;
The native tablet I suspend."—Pind.

Statue. The largest ever made was the Colossus of Rhodes; the next largest is the statue of Bavaria, erected by Louis I., King of Bavaria. The Bartholdi statue of Liberty is also worthy of mention. (See Lighthouse.)

Statue. It was Pygmalion who fell in love with a statue he had himself made.

Statue. Of all the projects of Alex-sander, none was more hare-brained than his proposal to have Mount Athos hewed into a statue of himself. It is said he even arranged with a sculptor to undertake the job.

Statue Fairs. (See Mop.)

Steeplechase. A horse-race across fields, hedges, ditches, and obstacles of every sort that happen to lie in the way.
The term arose from a party of fox-hunters on their return from an unsuccessful chase, who agreed to race to the village church, the steeple of which was in sight; he who first touched the church with his whip was to be the

Steak. Beef-steak is a slice of beef-fried or broiled. In the north of Scotland a slice of salmon fried is called a "salmon-steak." Also cod and hake split and fried. (Icelandic, steik, steikja, roast.)

Steele. A handle. _Stealing_—putting handles on. (Yorkshire.) This is the Anglo-Saxon stela (a stalk or handle).

"Steal or handell of a staffe, manche, hantel."— Randle.

Steal a Horse. One man may steal a horse, but another must not look over the hedge. Some men are chartered libertines, whilst others are always eyed with suspicion. (Latin: "Intreniam corres, cecidit cenna praebus.")

Steal a March on One (76). To come on one unexpectedly, as when an army steals a march or appears unexpectedly before an enemy.

Steam-kettles. Contumacious name applied to vessels propelled by steam-power, whether steamers, men-of-war, or any other craft.

"These steam-kettles of ours can never be depended upon. I wish we could go back to the good old sailing ships. When we had them we knew what we were about... Now we trust to machinery, and it fails us in time of need."— Robinson: The Three Admirals, chap. xvi.

Steel Yard (London, adjoining Dow-gate); so called from being the place where the king's steel-yard or beam was set up, for weighing goods imported into London.

Steenie (2 syl.). A nickname given by James I. to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham. The half-profane allusion is to Acts vi. 15, where those who looked on Stephen the martyr "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel."

Steepole-engine. A form of marine engine common on American river-boats.

Steepole-Jack. A man who ascends a church spire to repair it. This is done by a series of short ladders, tied to another as the man ascends, the topmost one being securely tied to the point of the spire. Not many men have nerves enough for the dangerous work of a steepole-Jack.

Steeplechase. A horse-race across fields, hedges, ditches, and obstacles of every sort that happen to lie in the way.
The term arose from a party of fox-
hunters on their return from an unsuccessful chase, who agreed to race to the village church, the steeple of which was in sight; he who first touched the church with his whip was to be the winner. The entire distance was two miles.
* The Grand National Steeplechase is run on the Aintree course, Liverpool.

Stelvio. The pass of the Stelvio. The highest carriage-road in Europe (9,176 feet above the sea-level). It leads from Bormio toGnurns.

Stentor. The voice of a Stentor. A very loud voice. Stentor was a Greek hero in the Trojan war. According to Homer, his voice was as loud as that of fifty men combined.

Stenton’s Lungs. Lungs like those of Stentor.

Stentorophone Voice. A voice proceeding from a speaking-trumpet or stentorophonic tube, such as Sir Samuel Moreland invented to be used at sea.

“I heard a formidable noise
Loud as the stentorophone voice,
That roared far off, “Dispatch! and strip!”
Bulwer: Hudson, III. 1.

Stepfather and Father-in-law.
The stepfather is the father of one bereaved of his natural father by death.
A stepmother is the mother of one bereaved of his mother by death. A stepfather must be married to a widow, and thus become the stepfather of her children by a previous husband; and a stepmother must be married to a widower, and thus become the stepmother of his children by a former wife.
Similarly, stepson and stepdaughter must be the son and daughter by the father or mother deceased, the relief marrying again. Father-in-law and Mother-in-law are the father and mother of the wife to her husband, and of the husband to the wife. Similarly, sons-in-law and daughters-in-law are the sons and daughters of the parents of the wife to the husband and of the husband to the wife. (Anglo-Saxon, steppa, bereaved.)

Stephen. Crown of St. Stephen. The crown of Hungary.

“...if Hungarian independence should be secured through the help of Prince Napoleon, the Prince himself should de-crown the crown of St. Stephen.”

Stephen’s Bread (St.). Stones. Fed with St. Stephen’s bread. Stoned. In French, “Migne de St. Etienne.” In Italian, “Pan di St. Stefano.” Of course the allusion is to the stoning of Stephen.

Stephens (Joanna) professed to have made a very wonderful discovery, and Drummond, the banker, set on foot a subscription to purchase her secret. The sum she asked was £5,000. When £1,500 had been raised by private subscription, government voted £3,500. The secret was a decoction of soap, swine’s cresses, honey, egg-shells, and snails, made into balls, and a powder to match.
Joanna Stephens got the money and forthwith disappeared.

Stepney Papers. A voluminous collection of political letters between Mr. Stepney, the British minister, and our ambassadors at various European courts, the Duke of Marlborough, and other public characters of the time. Part of the correspondence is in the British Museum, and part in the Public Record Office. It is very valuable, as this was the period called the Seven Years’ War.
The original letters are preserved in bound volumes, but the whole correspondence is in print also. (Between 1692 and 1706.)

Sterling Money. Spelman derives the word from seldings, merchants of the Hanse towns, who came over and reformed our coin in the reign of John.
Others say it is started (little star), in allusion to a star impressed on the coin.
Others refer it to Stirling Castle in Scotland, where money was coined in the reign of Edward I. (Sir Matthew Hale.)

“In the time of King Richard I., money coined in the east parts of Germany began to be of especial request in England for the public thereof, and was called Sëllinga monesa, as all the minishums of those parts were called sëllings;
and shortly after some of that country, skillfull in mint matters and allies, were sent for into this realm to bring the coin to perfection, which since that time was called of them
sterling for sëllinga.” — Camden.

Stern. To sit at the stern; At the stern of public affaires. Having the management of public affairs. The stern is the steer-cri—i.e., steer-place; and to sit at the stern is “to sit at the helm.”

“Sit at chiefest stern of public weal,” —Shakespeare: Henry VI., I. 1.

Sternhold (Thomas) versified fifty-one of the Psalms. The remainder were the productions of Hopkins and some others. Sternhold and Hopkins’ Psalms used to be attached to the Common Prayer Book.

“Mistaken chords refuse the solemn strain
Of ancient Sternhold.” — Crabbe: Borough.

Sterry (in Hadibros). A fanatical preacher, admired by Hugh Peters.

Stewing in their own Gravy. Especilly applied to a besieged city.
The besiegers may leave the hostile city to suffer from want of food, loss of commerce, confinement, and so on. The phrase is very old, borrowed perhaps from the Bible, "Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother’s milk." Chaucer says—

"In his own stress I made him free.
For anger and for very inhumanity.
Prologue to the Wife of Bath's Tale."

"We are told that the Russian ambassador, when Louis Philippe founded Paris, remarked, it ever again Paris is in insurrection, it can be made to swell in its own sway. (p.15)" and Bimaark, as the siege of Buda. In L. said, the germans intend to leave the city to seethe in its own milk."—See Nell: Chronicles of Teyford, p. 260.

"He relieved us of our purgatory... after we had been stewing in our own sway."—The London Spy, 1716.

Stick. A composing stick is a hand instrument into which a compositor places the letters to be set up. Each row or line of letters is pushed home and held in place by a movable "setting rule," against which the thumb presses. When a stick is full, the matter set up is transferred to a "galley" (q.c.), and from the galley it is transferred to the "chase" (q.r.). Called a stick because the compositor sticks the letters into it.

Stickler. One who obstinately maintains some custom or opinion; as a stickler for Church government. (See below.)

A stickler about trifles. One particular about things of no moment. Sticklers were the seconds in ancient single combats, very punctilious about the minutest points of etiquette. They were so called from the white stick which they carried in emblem of their office.

"I am willing... to give thee precedence, and now myself with the humble office of stickler."—Sir Walter Scott: Fair Maid of the West, chap. xvi.

Stiff. An I.O.U.; a bill of acceptance. "Hard," means hard cash. "Did you get it stiff or hard?" means by an I.O.U. or in cash. Of course "stiff" refers to the stiff interest exacted by money lenders.

"His "stiff" was floating about in too many directions; at too many high figures."—Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap. vii.

Stigmata. Impressions on certain persons of marks corresponding to some or all of the wounds received by our Saviour in His trial and crucifixion. The following claim to have been so stigmatised:

1. Men. Angelo del Paz (all the marks); Benedict of Reggio (the crown of thorns), 1602; Carlo di Satta (the lance-wound); Dodo, a Premonsutrensiain monk (all the marks); Francis of Assisi (all the marks), which were impressed on him by a seraph with six wings, September 15th, 1224; Nicholas of Ravenna, etc.

2. Women. Bianca de Gazeran; St. Catharine of Sienna; Catharine di Rasonse (the crown of thorns), 1580; Cecilia di Nobili of Nocera, 1555; Clara di Pugny (mark of the spear), 1514; "Estatic" of Caldaro (all the marks), 1842; Gabriella da Pescoio of Aquila (the spear-mark), 1472; Hieronyma Caragio (the spear-mark, which bled every Friday); Joanna Maria of the Cross; Maria Razzi of Chi (marks of the thorny crown); Maria Villani (ditto); Mary Magdalen of Pazzi; Mechthilda von Stainz: Ursula of Valencia; Veronica Guliani (all the marks), 1694; Vincenza Ferreri of Valencia, etc.

Stigmatics. To puncture, to brand (Greek, stigma, a puncture). Slaves used to be branded, sometimes for the sake of recognising them, and sometimes by way of punishment. The branding was effected by applying a red-hot iron marked with certain letters to their forehead, and then rubbing some colouring matter into the wound. A slave that had been branded was by the Romans called a stigmatic, and the brand was called the stigma.

Stigmities, or St. Stephen's Stones, are chalcoidines with brown and red spots.

Stiletto of the Storm (The). Lighting.

Still. Cornelius Tacitus is called Cornelius The Still in the Pardle of Faron, "still" being a translation of the Latin word tacitus.

"Cornelius the Stilte in his first book of his weryly ¥pholot called in Latine Anwicles..."

Still Sow. A man cunning and selfish; one wise in his own interest; one who avoids talking at meals that he may enjoy his food the better. So called from the old proverb, "The still sow eats the wash" or "draft."

"We do not act that often jest and laugh; The old but true. "Still swine eat all the draught."

Shakespeare: Merry Wife of Windsor, iv. 2.

Still Waters Run Deep. Silent and quiet conspirators or traitors are most dangerous; barking dogs never bite; the fox barks not when he would steal the lamb.

"Smooth runs the water where the brook is deep... And in his simple show he Harbour's treason."

The fox barks not when he would steal the lamb.

No, no, my sovereign, Gloucester is a man Unsounded yet and full of dangerous deside.

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, ill. 1.
Stilling (John Henry), surnamed Jingo, the mystic or pietist; called by Carlyle the German Domine Sampson; "awkward, honest, irascible, in old-fashioned clothes and bag-wig." A real character. (1740-1817.)

Stilo No Vo. New-fangled notions. When the calendar was reformed by Pope Gregory XIII. (1582), letters used to be dated statu nunc, which grew in time to be a cant phrase for any innovation.

"And so I leave you to your stiln now," (Bamford and Fletcher).

Stimulants of Great Men.
Bonaparte took suff when he wished to stimulate his intellect, or when he was greatly annoyed.
Braham (the Scottish) drank bottled porter.
The Hux, William Bull, the Non-conformist, was an invertebrate smoker.
Lord Byron took gin and water.
G. F. Cooke took all sorts of stimulants.
Lord Erskine took large doses of opium.
Grecian's Restorative is an egg beaten in sherry.
Hoban drank cold water.
Ed. Keats drank raw honey.
J. Kemble was an opium eater.
Newman smoked pipe.
Wood engraved (the first Lord Ashburton) placed a blister on his ears when he was about to make a great speech. (Inc. Shoes, Pharmacology.)

Stink'omales. So Theodore Hook called University College, London. The fun of the sobriquet is this: the buildings stand on the site of a large rubbish store or sort of refuse field, into which were cast potsherds and all sorts of sweepings. About the same time the question respecting Trincomalee in Ceylon was in agitation, so the wit spun the two ideas together, and produced the word in question, which was the more readily accepted as the non-religious education of the new college, and its rivalry with Oxford and Cambridge, gave a time very great offence to the High Church and State party.

Stip'ulate (3 syl). The word is generally given from the Latin stipula (a straw), and it is said that a straw was given to the purchaser in sign of a real delivery. Tsidoro (v. 24) asserts that the two contracting parties broke a straw between them, each taking a moiety, that, by rejoining the parts, they might prove their right to the bargain. With all deference to the Bishop of Seville, his "fact" seems to belong to limbo-lore. All bargains among the Romans were made by asking a question and replying to it. One said, An stipem vis? the other replied, Stipem velo ("Do you require money?" "I do"); the next question and answer were, An dabis? Dabo ("Will you give it?" "I will"); the third question was to the surety, An spondeis? to which he replied, Spondeo ("Will you be security?" "I will"), and the bargain was made. So that stipulate is compounded of stipul-vo (stipulo), and the tale about breaking the straws seems to be concocted to bolster up a wrong etymology.

"Stir Up" Sunday. The last Sunday in Trinity. So called from the first two words of the collect. It announces to schoolboys the near approach of the Christmas holidays.

Stirrup (I). A rope to climb by. (Anglo-N. stey-rap, a climbing rope. The verb stey-on is to climb, to mount.)

Stirrup Cup. A "parting cup," given in the Highlands to guests on leaving when their feet are in the stirrups. In the north of the Highlands called "cup at the door." (See Coffee.)

"Lord Marnam's hounds blew to horse; Then came the stirrup-up in course; Between the baron and his host, No point of courtesy was lost." See Walter Scott: Marmion, 1. 21.

Stirrup Oil. A beating; a variety of "strap oil" (q.v.). The French De l'huile de coirol (faggot or stick oil).

Stiver. Not a stirrer. Not a penny. The stiver was a Dutch coin, equal to about a penny. (Dutch, stiwer.)

Stock. From the verb to stick (to fasten, make firm, fix).
Stock. The fixed capital of a farm.
Stock in trade. The fixed capital.
The village stocks, in which the feet are stuck or fastened.
A gun stock: in which the gun is stuck or made fast.
It is on the stocks. It is in hand, but not yet finished. The stocks is the frame in which a ship is placed while building, and so long as it is in hand it is said to be or to lie on the stocks.

"Everything is to be sold off—stock, lock, and barrel."

Stockdove. The wild pigeon; so called because it breeds in the stocks of hollow trees, or rabbit burrows.

Stockfish. I will beat thee like a stockfish. Moffet and Bennett, in their Health's Improvement (p. 262), inform us that dried cod, till it is beaten, is called buckhorn, because it is so tough; but after it has been beaten on the stock, it is termed stockfish. (In French, etrier quelqu'un, a double carillon, "to a pretty tune").

Peace! thou wilt be beaten like a stockfish else."—Jonson: Every Man in his Humour, iii. 2.

Stocking. (See Blue Stocking.)

Stockwell Ghost. A supposed ghost that haunted the village of Stockwell, near London, in 1772. The real author of the strange noises was Anne Robinson, a servant. (See Cock Lane Ghost.)

Stoics. Founder of the Stone school. Zeno of Athens. These philosophers were so called because Zeno used to give his lectures in the Stone Pavilions of Athens. (Greek, stoai, a porch.)

Epictetus was the founder of the New Stoic school.

"The ancient stones in their porch With fierce dispute maintained their church, Beat out their brains in fight and study To prove that virtue is a body, That bonum is an animal, Made good with stout and solemn bawl." —Butler: Hudibras, ii. 2.

Stole (Latin, stola). An ecclesiastical vestment, also called the Orarum. "Deinde circumdant columbinum stolam, quæ et Orarium ducunt." It indicates "Obediens in filia Dei et iugum servitutæ, quod pro salute hominum portavit. Deacons wear the stole over the left shoulder, and loop the two parts together, that they may both hang on the right side. Priests wear it over both shoulders. (See Durang: Stola,) Stolen Things are Sweet. A sop filched from the dripping-pan, fruit procured by stealth, and game illicitly taken, have the charm of dexterity to make them more palatable. Solomon says, "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret [i.e. by stealth] is pleasant."

"From huge cooks we love to steal a bit Behind their backs, and that in corners eat: Nor need we here the reason why we treat All know the proof, "Stolen bread is sweet."" —History of Joseph, n. 4.

Stomach. Appetite: "He who hath no stomach for this fight." (Shakespeare: Henry V, iv. 3.)

Appetite for honours, etc., or ambition: "Wolsey was a man of an unbounded stomach." (Henry VIII., iv. 2.)

Appetite or inclination: "Let me praise you while I have the stomach." (Merchant of Venice, iii. 3.)

Stomach. To swallow, to accept with appetite, to digest.

To stomach an insult. To swallow it and not resent it.

"If you must believe, stomach not all."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 4.

Stomach, meaning "wrath," and the verb "to be angry," is the Latin stomachum, stomachus.

"The stomach [wrath] of relentless Achilles—
Stomachus habebat in quaquis adversus durum—
Verse. (It is a stomach too if I spoke sharper than usual.)"

The fourth stomach of ruminating animals is called the abomasum or aboma*scum* (from ab- omus).

Stone (1 syl.). The sacred stone of the Cna'a (q.v.) is, according to Arab tradition, the guardian angel of Paradise turned into stone. When first built by Abraham into the wall of the shrine it was clear as crystal, but it has become black from being kissed by sinful man.

A log-stone. A flint with a natural perforation through it. Sometimes hung on the key of an outside door to ward off the hags. Sometimes such a stone used to be hung round the neck "for luck"; sometimes on the bedstead to prevent nightmare; and sometimes on a horse-collar to ward off disease.

Leave no stone unturned. Omit no minutiae if you would succeed. After the defeat of Mardonius at Platae (B.C. 477), a report was current that the Persian General had left great treasures in his tent. Polycrates (1 syl.) the Thebrae sought long but found them not. The Oracle of Delphi, being consulted, told him "to leave no stone unturned," and the treasures were discovered.

Stone Age (The). The period when stone implements were used. It preceded the bronze age.

Stone Cold. Cold as a stone.

Stone Dead. Dead as a stone.

Stone Jug. Either a stone jar or a prison. The Greek word kreōmos (kerä- mos) means either an earthen jar or a prison, as in χωρίς εν κρασί (chuliko en keramid), in a brazen prison. When Venus complained to the immortals that Diomed had wounded her, Dionē bude her cheer up, for other immortals had suffered also, but had borne up under their affliction: as Mars, for example, when Otos and Ephialtēs bound him . . . and kept him for thirteen months χαλκόω εν κεράμῳ (in a brazen prison, or brazen jug). (Homēr: Iliad, v. 381, etc.; see also ix. 469.) Ewing says κεραμός, potter's earth or pottery, was also a prison, because prisoners were made to work up potters' earth into jugs and other vessels. Thus we say, “He was sent to the treadmill, meaning, to prison to work in the treadmill.

Stone Soup or St. Bernard's Soup.
A beggar asked alms at a lordly mansion, but was told by the servants they had nothing to give him. “Sorry for it,” said the man, “but will you let me boil a little water to make some soup of this stone?” This was so novel a proceeding, that the curiosity of the servants was aroused, and the man was readily furnished with saucepan, water, and a spoon. In he popped the stone, and begged for a little salt and pepper for flavouring. Stirring the water and tasting it, he said it would be the better for any fragments of meat and vegetables they might have to have. These were supplied, and ultimately he asked for a little catsup or other sauce. When fully boiled and fit, each of the servants tasted it, and declared that stone soup was excellent. (La soupe au culot.)

Stone Still. Perfectly still; with no more motion than a stone.

“I will not struggle, I will stand stone-still.”
Shakespeare: King John, v. 1

Stone of the Broken Treaty.
Limerick. About a century and a half ago England made a solemn compact with Ireland. Ireland promised fealty, and England promised to guarantee to the Irish people civil and religious equality. When the crisis was over England handed Ireland over to a faction that has ever since bred strife and disunion. (Address of the Corporation of Limerick to Mr. Bright, 1868.)

“The stone of the broken treaty is there, and from early in the morning till late at night, groups gather round it, and forget the tradition of their national wrings.” - The Times.

Stone of Stumbling. This was much more significant among the Jews than it is with ourselves. One of the Pharisaic sects, called Nικη or "Dashers," used to walk abroad without lifting their feet from the ground. They were for ever "dashing their feet against the stones," and "stumbling" on their way.

Stone of Tongues. This was a stone given to Otnit, King of Lombardy, by his father dwarf Elberich, and had the virtue, when put into a person's mouth, of enabling him to speak perfectly any foreign language. (The Heldenbuch.)

Stones.
Aurālēs, or stones which have fallen from heaven. J. Norman Lockyer says the number of meteors which fall daily to the earth "exceeds 21 millions." (Nineteenth Century, Nov., 1840, p. 787.) The largest aerolith on record is one that fell in Brazil. It is estimated to weigh 14,000 lbs. In 1806 a shower of stones fell near L'Aigle, and M. Biot was deputed by the French Government to report on the phenomenon. He found between two and three thousand stones, the largest being about 17 lbs. in weight.

Eagle stones. (See Eagle-stones.)

Health stones. Purifies (2 syl.) found in Geneva and Savoy. So called from the notion that it loses its steel-blue colour if the person in possession of one is in ill health.

Square stones. The most ancient idols were square stones. The head and limbs were subsequent additions.

Touchstones. (q.e.)

Stones. After the Moslem pilgrim has made his seven processions round the Caaba, he repairs to Mount Arafat, and before sunrise enters the valley of Mecne, where he throws seven stones at each of three pillars, in imitation of Abraham and Adam, who thus drove away the devil when he disturbed their devotions.

Standing stones. The most celebrated groups are those of Stonehenge, Avebury, in Wiltshire, Stenness in the Orkneys, and Carnac in Brittany.

The Standing Stones of Stenness, in the Orkneys, resemble Stonehenge, and, says Sir W. Scott, furnish an irresistible refutation of the opinion that these circles are Druidical. There is every reason to believe that the custom was prevalent in Scandinavia as well as in Gaul and Britain, and as common to the mythology of Odin as to Druidism. They were places of public assembly, and in the Eyrbigga Saga is described the manner of setting apart the Helga Feli (Holy Rocks) by the pontiff Thorolf for solemn meetings.

Stones fallen down from Jupiter. Anaxagōros mentions a stone that fell from Jupiter in Thrace, a description of which is given by Pliny. The Ephesians asserted that their image of Diana came from Jupiter. The stone at Emessa, in Syria, worshipped as a symbol of the sun, was a similar meteorite. At Abydos and Potidæ a similar stones were preserved. At Corinth was one venerated as Zeus. At Cyprus was one dedicated to Venus, a description of which is given by Tacitus and Maximus Tytius. Herodotus describes a similar stone in Syria. The famous Caaba stone at Mecca is a similar meteor. Livy recounts three falls of stones. On November 27th, 1492, just as Maximilian was on the point of engaging the French army near Ensheim, a mass weighing 270 lbs. fell between the combatants; part of this mass is now in the British Museum. In June, 1866, at Knyshnya, a village of Hungary, a shower of stones fell, the largest of which weighs above 5 cwt.; it was broken in the fall into two pieces, both of which are now in the Imperial Collection at Vienna. On December 13th, 1795, in the village of Thwing, Yorkshire, an aerolite fell weighing 50 lbs., now in the British Museum. On September 10th, 1813, at Adare, in Limerick, fell a similar stone, weighing 17 lbs., now in the Oxford Museum. On May 1st, 1860, in Guernsey county, Ohio, more than thirty stones were picked up within a space of ten miles by three; the largest weighed 103 lbs. (Kesselmayer and Dr. Otto Buchner: The Times, November 14th, 1866.)

"Stonebraah. A name given in Wiltshire to the subsoil of the north-western border, consisting of a reddish calcareous loam, mingled with flat stones; a soil made of small stones or broken rock.

"Stonehenge, says Geoffrey of Monmouth, was erected by Merlin (the magician) to perpetuate the treachery of Hengist, who desired a friendly meeting with Vortigern, but fell upon him and his 400 attendants, putting them all to the sword. Aurelius Ambrosius asked Merlin to recommend a sensible memento of this event, and Merlin told the king to transplant the "Giants' Dance" from the mountain of Killarans, in Ireland. These stones had been brought by the giants from Africa as baths, and all possessed medicinal qualities. Merlin transplanted them by magic. This tale owes its birth to the word "stan-hengist," which means uplifted stones, but "hengist" suggested the name of the traditional hero.

"Stonewall Jackson. Thomas J. Jackson, one of the Confederate generals in the American war. The name arose thus: General Bee, of South Carolina, observing his men waver, exclaimed, "Look at Jackson's men; they stand like a stone wall!" (1826-1863.)

"Stonewall (To). To adopt purely defensive measures; to play against time (used of the batsman, who, for this reason, is often called a stonecutter.)

"Stony Arabia. A mistranslation of Arabia Petraea, where Petra is supposed to be an adjective formed from the Greek petros (a stone), and not, as it really is, from the city of Petra, the capital of the Nabataeans. This city was called Thamud (rock-built). (See Yemen.)

"Stool of Repentance. A low stool placed in front of the pulpit in Scotland, on which persons who had incurred an ecclesiastical censure were placed during divine service. When the service was over the "penitent" had to stand on the stool and receive the minister's rebuke. Even in the present century this method of rebuke has been repeated.

""Colonel Knox... tried to take advantage of a merely formal proceeding to set Mr. Gladstone on the stool of repentance."—The Times"

"Stops. Organs have no fixed number of stops; some have sixty or more, and others much fewer. A stop is a collection of pipes similar in tone and quality, running through the whole or part of an organ. They may be divided into mouth-pipes and reed-pipes, according to structure, or into (1) metallic, (2) reed, (3) wood, (4) mixture or compound stops, according to material. The following are the chief:—

(1) Metallic. Principal (so called because it is the first stop tuned, and is the standard by which the whole organ is regulated), the open diapason, dulciana, the 12th, 15th, tierce or 17th, lari-got or 19th, 22nd, 26th, 29th, 33rd, etc. (being respectively 12, 15, 17, etc., notes above the open diapason).

(2) Reed (metal reed pipes). Bassoon, cremona, hautboy or oboe, trumpet, voxhumana (all in unison with the open dispanon), clarion (an octave above the dispanon and in unison with principal).
(3) Wood. Stopt diapason, double dispanon, and most of the flutes.
(4) Compound or mixture. Flute (in unison with the principal), cornet, mixture or Furniture, sesquialtera, symbol, and cornet.
* Grand organs have, in addition to the above, from two to two and a half octaves of pedals.
Steps, strictly speaking, are three-fold, called the foundation stop, the mutation stop, and the mixture stop.
The foundation stop is one whose tone agrees with the normal pitch of the diapason, or some octave of it.
The mutation stops produce a tone that is neither the normal pitch nor yet an octave of the diapason.
The mixture stop needs no explanation.
Among varieties of organ stops may be mentioned the complete stop, which has one pipe or register to a note. The compound stop, which has more than one pipe or register to a note. The five-stop, composed of five pipes. The incomplete stop, which has less than the full number of pipes. The manual stop, corresponding to the manual keyboard. The open stop, which has the pipes open at the upper end. The pedal stop, as distinguished from the manual stop. The solo stop, the string stop, etc.

Store (1 syl.). Stor is no sor.
Things stored up for future use are no care. Sore means grief as well as wound, our sorrow.

Stork, a sacred bird, according to the Swedish legend received its name from flying round the cross of the crucified Redeemer, crying "Styrka! Styrka!" (Strengthen! Strengthen!). (See Christ, in Christian Traditions.)

Storks are the sworn foes of snakes.
Hence the veneration in which they are held. They are also excellent scavengers.

Storks’ Law or Lex Cremona. A Roman law which obliged children to maintain their necessitous parents in old age, "in imitation of the stork." Also called "Antipatharia."

Storm in a Teapot. A mighty to-do about a trifle. "A storm in a puddle."

Storms. The inhabitants of Com-acchio, a town in Central Italy, between the two branches of the Po, rejoice in storms because then the fish are driven into their marines.

Whose townmen louthe the lazy calm’s repose,
And pray that stormy waves may lack the beach." — Pope’s Orlando Furioso, I, 41.

Cape of Storms. So Bartholomew Diaz named the south cape of Africa in 1486, but King John II. changed it into the Cape of Good Hope.

Stormy Petrel (A). An ill omen; a bad augury.

Dr. von Escherich is regarded at court as a stormy petrel, and every effort was made to convince him not to go to the German emperor."—The World, 5th April, 1922, p. 15.

Sornello Verses are those in which common among the Tuscan peasants. The word is from borne (to return).
I’ll tell him the white, and the green, and the red.
May our country has hung the vile joke from her head.
I’ll tell him the green, and the red and the white Would look well by his side as a sword-knot to brighten.
I’ll tell him the red, and the white, and the green is the prize that we play for, a prize we will win.
Notes and Queries

Storting (pron. stor-ding). The Norwegian Parliament, elected every three years (Norse, stor, great; thing, conf.)

Stovepipe Hat (A). A chimney-pot hat (q.v.).

High collars, tight coats, and tight sleeves are worn at home and abroad, and, as thought that were not enough, a stovepipe hat was worn:"
—Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News, September, 1897.

Stowe (1 syl.). The fair majestic paradise of Stowe (Thomson: Autumn).
The principal seat of the Duke of Buckingham.

Stowe Nine Churches. A hamlet of Stowe, Northamptonshire. The tradition is that the people of this hamlet wished to build a church, and made nine ineffectual efforts to do so, for every time the church was finished the devil came by night and knocked it down again.

Strabo (Wulafritus). A German monk. (807-849.)

Stradivarius (Antonio). A famous violin-maker, born at Crema’na. Some of his instruments have fetched £400.
(1670-1728.) (See Cremonas.)

Straight as an Arrow. (See Similes.)

Strain (1 syl.). To strain courte-
y. To stand upon ceremony. Here, strain is to stretch, as parchment is strained on a drum-head. When strain means to filter, the idea is pressing or squeezing through a canvas or woollen bag.

Strain at a gnat and swallow a camel.
To make much fuss about little peccadillos, but commit offences of real magnitude. "Strain at" is strain out or off (Greek, di-nize). The allusion is to the practice of filtering wine for fear of swallowing an insect, which was "unclean." Tyndale has "strain out" in his version. Our expression "strain at" is a corruption of strain-at, "at" being the Saxon form of out, retained in the words ut-most, uter, uttermost, etc.

The quality of mercy is not strained (Merchant of Venice, iv. 1)—constrained or forced, but cometh down freely as the rain, which is God's gift.

Stralenheim (Count of). A feudal baron who hunted Werner like a partridge in order to obtain his inheritance. Ulric, Werner's son, saved him from the Oder, but subsequently murdered him. (Byron: Werner.)

Strand (London). The bank of the Thames (Saxon for a beach or shore); whence stranded, run ashore or grounded.

Strange (1 syl.). Latin, extra (without); whence estranged, one without; old French, estrange; Italian, strano, etc. Stranger, therefore, is estranged, one without.

Stranger of the Gate (The). (See under PROSELYTE.)

Strangers Sacrificed. It is said that Busiris, King of Egypt, sacrificed to his gods all strangers that set foot on his territories. Diomed, King of Thrace, gave strangers to his horses for food. (See DIOMEDES.)

"Oh fly, or here with straiten's blood infused Busiris slay thou shalt and none undone. Amidst his slaughter'd guests his arms stood One scene with gore, and tacked with human blood." (Demosth.: Laced. book ii.)

Strap Oil. A corruption of strap 'oil, i.e. German theil (a dole). The play is palpable. The "April fool" asks for a pennyworth of strap 'oil, that is dole of the strap, in French Paille de crotet. (Latin, strappus.)

Strappa'do. A military punishment formerly practised; it consisted of pulling an offender to a beam and then letting him down suddenly; by this means a limb was not unfrequently dislocated. (Italian, strappare, to pull.)

"Were I at the strapado or the rack, I'd give no man a reason on compulsion."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV. ii. 4

Strasburg Goose (A). A goose fattened, crammed, and confined in order to enlarge its liver. Metaphorically, one crammed with instruction and kept from healthy exercise in order to pass examinations.

"The aemnic, myopic, worn-out creature who comes to [the army]—a new kind of Strasburg goose."—Nineteenth Century, January, 1883, p. 25.

Stratagem means generalship. (Greek, strategos, a general; stratos-agos, to lead an army.)

Straw. Servants wishing to be hired used to go into the market-place of Carlisle (Carew) with a straw in their mouth. (See Mor.)

"At Carew I stand wi' a straw i' my mouth, The weavers com round me in clusters; What wenge did he, vain, base, fust?"—Androuer: Cumberiand Yalands

Straw. Chopped or otherwise, at a wedding, signifies that the bride is no virgin. Flowers indicate purity or virginity, but straw is only the refuse from which corn has been already taken.

A little straw shows which way the wind blows. Mere trifles often indicate the coming on of momentous events. They are shadows cast before coming events.

A man of straw. A man without means; a Mrs. Harris; a sham. In French, "En homme de priolle," like a mulkin. (See MAN OF STRAW.)

I have a straw to break with you. I am displeased with you; I have a reproof to give you. In feudal times possession of a fief was conveyed by giving a straw to the new tenant. If the tenant misconducted himself, the lord dispossessed him by going to the threshold of his door and breaking a straw, saying as he did so, "As I break this straw, so break I the contract made between us." In allusion to this custom, it is said in Reynard the Fox—"The kinge take up a straw fro' the ground, and pardon and forgue the Foxe," on condition that the Fox showed King Lion where the treasures were hid (ch. v.).

In the straw. "Etre en couche" (in bed). The phrase is applied to women in childbirth. The allusion is to the straw with which beds were at one time usually stuffed, and not to the litter laid before a house to break the noise of wheels passing by. The Dutch of Haarlem and Enckhuysen, when a woman is confined, expose a pin-cushion at the street-door. If the babe is a boy, the pin-cushion has a red fringe, if a girl a white one.

Not to care a straw for one. In Latin, "[Aliquem] nihil, flores, naviculi, pilus, terraeus factim." To hold one in no esteem; to defy one as not worth your steel.

Not worth a straw. Worthless. In French, "Je n'en donnerais pas un feint (or un zeste)." Not worth a rap; not worth a pin's point; not worth a fig (q.v.); not worth a twopenny dam, etc.
Strawberry

- She wears a straw in her ear. She is looking out for another husband. This is a French expression, and refers to the ancient custom of placing a straw between the ears of horses for sale.

- The last straw. The only hope left; the last penny.

'Tis the last straw that breaks the horse's (or camel's) back. In weighing articles, as salt, tea, sugar, etc., it is the last pinch which turns the scale; and there is an ultimate point of endurance beyond which calamity breaks a man down.

To carry off the straw ("Enlever la paille"). To bear off the bole. The pun is between "pal," a slang word for a favourite, and "paille," straw. The French pailot means a "pal." Thus Gervais says:

"Mais, encore un coup, mon pailot."

Le Coup d'État Français, p. 61.

To catch at a straw. To hope for a forlorn hope. A drowning man will catch at a straw.

To make bricks without straw. To attempt to do something without the proper and necessary materials. The allusion is to the exaction of the Egyptian taskmasters mentioned in Exodus v. 6-14. Even to the present, "bricks" in India, etc., are made of mud and straw dried in the sun. To make plum-puddings without plums.

To stumble at a straw. "Notus in scriipo quaeve." To look for knots in a bulrush (which has none). To stumble in a plain way.

To throw straws against the wind. To contend uselessly and feebly against what is irresistible; to sweep back the Atlantic with a besom.

Strawberry means the straying plant that bears berries (Anglo-Saxon, streow berie). So called from its runners, which stray from the parent plant in all directions.

Strawberry Preachers. So Latimer called the non-resident country clergy, because they strayed from their parishes, to which they returned only once a year. (Anglo-Saxon, streowran, to stray.)

Street and Walker (Messrs.). "In the employ of Messrs. Street and Walker," Said of a person out of employment. A gentleman without means, whose employment is walking about the streets.

Stretch'er. An exaggeration; a statement stretched out beyond the strict truth. Also a frame on which the sick or wounded are carried; a frame on which painters' canvas is stretched; etc.

Strike (A). A federation of workmen to quit work unless the masters will submit to certain stated conditions. To strike is to leave off work, as stated above. (Anglo-Saxon, strike-an, to go.)

"Co-operation . . . prevents strikes by . . . identifying the interests of labour and capital."—R. T. Ely: Political Economy, part iv. chap. iv. 293.

Strike (I syl). Strike, but hear me!

So said Themistocles with wonderful self-possession to Eurybiades, the Spartan general. The tale told by Plutarch is this: Themistocles strongly opposed the proposal of Eurybiades to quit the bay of Salamis. The hot-headed Spartan insultingly remarked that "those who in the public games rise up before the proper signal are scourged." "Ti re," said Themistocles, "but those who lag behind win no laurels." On this, Eurybiades lifted up his staff to strike him, when Themistocles earnestly but proudly exclaimed, "Strike, but hear me!"

To strike hands upon a bargain or strike a bargain. To confirm it by shaking or striking hands.

Strike Amain. Yield or suffer the consequences. The defiance of a man-of-war to a hostile ship. To strike amain is to lower the topsail in token of submission. To wave a naked sword amain is a symbolic command to a hostile ship to lower her topsail.

Strike a Bargain (To). In Latin, fudus ferric; in Greek, hormia temen. The allusion is to the Greek and Roman custom of making sacrifice in concluding an agreement or bargain. After calling the gods to witness, they struck—i.e., slew—the victim which was offered in sacrifice. The modern English custom is simply to strike or shake hands.

Strike Sail. To acknowledge oneself beaten; to eat humble pie. A maritime expression. When a ship in fight or on meeting another ship, lets down her topsails at least half-mast high, she is said to strike, meaning that she submits or pays respect to the other.

Now Maragret Must strike her sail, and learn awhile to serve When kings command.

Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., lit. 3.
Strike while the Iron is Hot. In French, "Il faut battre le fer pendant qu'il est chaud." Either act while the impulse is still fervent, or do what you do at the right time. The metaphor is taken from a blacksmith working a piece of iron, say a horse-shoe, into shape. It must be struck while the iron is red-hot or it cannot be moulded into shape. Similar proverbs are: "Make hay while the sun shines," "Take time by the forelock."

String. Always harping on one string. Always talking on one subject; always repeating the same thing. The allusion is to the ancient harpers: some, like Faganini, played on one string to show their skill, but more would have endorsed the Apothecary's Apology..."My poverty, and not my will, consents."

Stripes. A tiger. In India a tiger is called Master Stripes.

"Catch old Stripes come near my bucklock, if he thought a 'shooting-iron' was any where about. Even if there were another Stripes, he would not show himself that night." — Cornhill Magazine (My Tour Watch), July, 1883.

Strode. The babies of Strode are born with tails.

"As Becket, that good saint, sublimely rode, Thoughtfully of Incault, through the town of Strode, What did the ma? attacked his horse's rump And cut the tail, so flowing, to the stump. What does the saint? quoit he, 'For this the trick The town of Strode shall heartily be sick.' And lo! by power divine, a curse prevails— The babies of Strode are born with horse's tails. — Peter Pan, Eps. 12, to the Pope.

Strode. The carsman who sits on the bench next the coxswain, and sets the stroke of the oars.

Stromkarl. A Norwegian musical spirit. Arndt informs us that the Stromkarl has eleven different musical measures, to ten of which people may dance, but the eleventh belongs to the night-spirit, his host. If anyone plays it, tables and benches, cups and cans, old men and women, blind and lame, babies in their cradles, and the sick in their beds, begin to dance. (See Fairy.)

Strong—as iron, as a horse, as brandy. (See Similes.)

Strong-back. One of Fortunio's servants. He was so strong he could carry any weight upon his back without difficulty. (Orrin's Goblins; Fortunio.)

Strong-bow. Richard de Clare, Earl of Striguil. — Justice of Ireland. (*1176.)

Strom'tian. This mineral receives its name from Strom'tian, in Argyleshire, where it was discovered by Dr. Hope, in 1792.

Struldrugs. Wretched inhabitants of Luggnagg, an imaginary island a hundred leagues south-east of Japan. These human beings have the privilege of eternal life without those of immortal vigour, strength, and intellect. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels.)

"Many persons think that the picture of the Struldrugs (see) was intended to wean us from a love of life...but I am certain that the dean never had any such thing in view." — Paley's Natural Theology (Lord Brougham's note, bk. 1. p. 140.)

Stubble Geese, called in Devonshire Arish Geese. The geese turned into the stubble-fields or arrishers, to pick up the corn left after harvest. (See Earings.)

Stuck Pig. To stare like a stuck pig. A simile founded on actual observation. Of course, the stuck pig is the pig in the act of being killed. (See Similes.)

Stuck Up. An Australian phrase for robbed on the highway. (See Gone Up.)

Stuck-up People. Pretentious people; parvenus; nobodies who assume to be somebody's. The allusion is to birds, as the peacock, which sticks up its train to add to its "importance" and "awe down" antagonists.

Stuck his Spoon in the Wall. Took up his residence. Sometimes it means took up his long home, or died. In primitive times a leather strap was very often nailed to the wall, somewhere near the fireplace, and in this strap were stuck such things as scissors, spoons for daily use, pen-case, and so on. In Barclay's Ship of Fools is a picture of a man stirring a pot on the fire, and on the wall is a strap with two spoons stuck into it.

Stuff Gown. An outer barrister, or one without the bar. (See Barrister.)

Stumers, in the language of the turf, are fictitious bets recorded in the books of bookmakers, and published in the papers, to deceive the public by running up the odds on a horse which is not meant to win.

Stump. To take to the stump. To roam about the country specchifying.

To stump the country. To go from town to town making (political) speeches.

"The Irish members have already taken to the stump." — A Daily Journal.

Stump Orator (in America). A person who haranges the people from the stump of a tree or other chance elevation; a mob orator.

Stump Up. Pay your reckoning; pay what is due. Ready money is called stumpy or stumps. 'An Americanism, meaning money paid down on the spot—i.e. on the stump of a tree.' (See NAIL.)

Stumps. To stover one's stumps. To get on faster; to set upon something expeditiously. The stumps properly are wooden legs fastened to stumps or mutilated limbs. (Cockfighting, stump.)

'This makes him startle his stumps.'

The Two Lancashire Lovers (1680).

Stumped Out. Outwitted; put down. A term borrowed from the game of cricket.

Stupid Boy. St. Thomas Aquinas, nicknamed the Dumb Ox by his school-fellows. (1221-1274.)

Sty or Stye. Christ stined up to heaven. Halliwell gives sty—a ladder, and the verb would be to go to heaven, as it were, by Jacob's ladder. The Anglo-Saxon verb stigan means to ascend.

'The butt... thought with his wings to sty above the ground.'

Spenser: Faerie Queen, bk 1, canto xi, 25.

Styg'lan (3 syl.). Infernal; pertaining to Styx, the fabled river of hell.

'At that so sudden blaze the Stygian thrown Bent their aspect.'

Milton: Paradise Lost, v. 423.

Style (1 syl.) is from the Latin stylus (an iron pen for writing on waxen tablets, etc.). The characteristic of a person's writing is called his style. Metaphorically it is applied to composition and speech. Good writing is stylized, and, metaphorically, smartness of dress and deportment is so called.

'Styles is the dress of thought, and a well-dressed thought, like a well-dressed man, appears to great advantage.'—Cotterill: Letters, v. 361.

Styles. Tom Styles or John a Styles, connected with John o'North in actions of ejectment. These mythical gentlemen, like John Doe and Richard Roe, are no longer employed.

'And, like blind Fortune, with a sleight Convert much interest and pain.'

From *Stiles's pocket into Yankee's.'

Styl'itos or Pillar Saints. By far the most celebrated are Simeon the Stylite of Syria, and Daniel the Stylite of Constantinople. Simeon spent thirty-seven years on different pillars, each loftier and narrower than the preceding. The last was sixty-six feet high. He died in 460, aged seventy-two. Daniel lived thirty-three years on a pillar, and was not unfrequently nearly blown from it by the storms from Thrace. He died in 494. Tennyson has a poem on Simeon Stylites.

'The Stylite of the Pillow by surname,
Staiths among men—L. Simeon
The watch on the column till the end.'

Tennyson.

Styx. The river of Hate, called by Milton "abhorred Styx, the flood of burning hate" (Paradise Lost, ii. 577). It was said to flow nine times round the infernal regions. (Greek, styx—to hate.)

'* The Styx is a river of Egypt,* and the tale is that Isis collected the various parts of Osiris (murdered by Typhon) and buried them in secrecy on the banks of the Styx. The classic fables about the Styx are obviously of Egyptian origin. Charon, as Dioscorus informs us, is an Egyptian word for a "ferryman," and styx means "hate."

"The Thames reminded him of Styx."—M. Taine.

Styx, the dread oath of gods.

'Or by the black infernal styx I swear (That dreadful oath which binds the Thunderer)'

'Tis fixed.'

Pope: Thebes of Orestes, i.

Suav'iter in Modo (Latin). An inoffensive manner of doing what is to be done. Suaviter in modo, fortiter in re, doing what is to be done with unflinching firmness, but in the most inoffensive manner possible.

Sub Cultro Liquit. He left me in the lurch, like a toad under the harrow, or an ox under the knife.

Sub Hasta. By auction. When an auction took place among the Romans, it was customary to stick a spear in the ground to give notice of it to the public. In London we hang from the first-floor window a strip of bed-room carpet.

Sub Jo've (Latin). Under Jove: in the open air. Jupiter is the deified personification of the upper regions of the air, Juno of the lower regions, Neptune of the waters of the sea, Vesta of the earth, Ceres of the surface soil, Hades of the invisible or under-world.

Sub-Laps'arian, Supra-Laps'arian. The sub-laplarian maintains that God devised His scheme of redemption after the "lapse" or fall of Adam, when He elected some to salvation and left others to run their course. The supra-laplarian maintains that all this was ordained by God from the foundation of the world, and therefore before the "lapse" or fall of Adam.
Sub Rosa. (See Rose.)

Sublime Port. Wine merchants say the port of 1820 is the true “Sublime Port.” Of course, the play is on the Porta Sublima or Ottoman empire.

Sublime Porte (The). The Ottoman empire. It is the French for Porta Sublima, the “lofty gate.” Constantinople has twelve gates, and near one of these gates is a building with a lofty gateway called “Bab-i-humayun.” In this building resides the vizier, in the same are the offices of all the chief ministers of state, and hence all the imperial edicts are issued. The French phrase has been adopted, because at one time French was the language of European diplomacy.

Submerged (The) or The Submerged Tenth. The proletarian, sunk or submerged in poverty: the gutter-class; the waifs and strays of society.

“All but the ‘submerged’ were bent upon merrymaking” — Society, November 12th, 1865, p. 1277.

“Mr. Booth has not inaugurated remedial work among the submerged tenth, he has certainly set the fashion of writing and talking about them.” — Newspaper paragraph, October 13th, 1911.

Submit means simply “to lower,” and the idea usually associated with the word is derived from a custom in gladiatorial sports: When a gladiator acknowledged himself vanquished he lowered (submitted) his arms as a sign that he gave in; it then rested with the spectators to let him go or put him to death. If they wished him to live they held their thumbs down, if to be put to death they held their thumbs upwards.

Subpoeuna is a writ given to a man commanding him to appear in court, to bear witness or give evidence on a certain trial named in the writ. It is so called because the party summoned is bound to appear sub poena centum librorum (under a penalty of £100). We have the verb to subpoeuna.

Subsidy means literally a sediment; that which is on the ground. It is a military term. In battle the Romans drew up their army in three divisions: first, the light-armed troops made the attack, and if repulsed, the pikemen came up to their aid; if these two were beaten back, the swordsmen (principes) advanced; and if they too were defeated, the reserve went forward. These last were called subsidies because they remained resting on their left knee till their time of action. Metaphorically, money aid is called a subsidy. (Latin, subsideo, to subside.)

Substitution of Service (The), in Ireland. Instead of serving a process personally, the name of the defaulter was posted on the walls of a Catholic chapel in the parish or barony, or in some other public place.

Subtle Doctor. John Duns Scotus, one of the schoolmen. (1265-1308.)

Subvolvans or Subvolvaari. The antagonists of the Privovlans in Samuel Butler’s satirical poem called The Elephant in the Moon.

“...The gallant Subvolvans rally, / And from their trenches make a sally.”

Verse 35, etc.

Succession Powder. The poison used by the Marquise de Brinvilliers in her poisonings, for the benefit of successors. (See Poisoners.)

Succinct means undergirded; hence concise, terse. (Latin, sub cinctus.)

Succoth. The Jewish feast of tabernacles or tents, which began on the 15th Tisri (September), and lasted eight days. It was kept in remembrance of the sojourn in the wilderness, and was a time of grand rejoicing. Those who kept it held in their hands sprigs of myrtle, palm-branches, and willow-twigs. The Pentateuch was read on the last eight days.

Suck the Monkey. (See Monkey.)

Sucking Young Patricians. The younger sons of the aristocracy, who sponge on those in power to get places of profit and employment.

Suckle. To suckle fools and chronicle small beer. Iago says women are of no use but to nurse children and keep the accounts of the household. (Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1.)

Sucre. Mangeur de sucre. Applause given by claqueurs to actors is called sucre (sugar). French actors and actresses make a regular agreement with the manager for these hired applauders. While inferior artists are obliged to accept a mere murmur of approval, others receive a “salvo of bravos,” while those of the highest rôle demand a “furure” or éclat de rire, according to their line of acting, whether tragedy or comedy. Sometimes the manager is bound to give actors “sugar to eat” in the public journals, and the agreement is that the announcement of their name shall be preceded with the words “celebrated,” Suds (Mfz.). A facetious name for a washwoman or laundress. Of course, the allusion is to soap-suds.

To be in the suds—in ill-temper. According to the song, "Ne'er a bit of comfort is upon a washing day," all are put out of gear, and therefore out of temper.

Suffolk. The folk south of Norfolk.

Suffrage means primarily the hough or pastrami of a horse; so called because it hangs under, and not over, like the knee-joint. When a horse is lying down and wants to rise on his legs, it is this joint which is brought into action; and when the horse stands on his legs it is these "ankle-joints" which support him. Metaphorically, voters are the pastrum joints of a candidate, whereby he is supported.

A suffragan is a titular bishop who is appointed to assist a prelate; and in relation to an archbishop all bishops are suffragans. The archbishop is the horse, and the bishops are his pastrums.

Sugar-candy. Rhyming slang for "brandy."

Sugar-lip. Hâfiz, the great Persian lyricist. (*1389.)

Sugar and Honey. Rhyming slang for "money." (See Chivy.)

Sugared Words. Sweet, flattering words. When sugar was first imported into Europe it was a very great dainty. The coarse, vulgar idea now associated with it is from its being cheap and common.

Sui Generis (Latin). Having a distinct character of its own; unlike anything else.

Sui Juris. Of one's own right; the state of being able to exercise one's legal rights—i.e. freedom from legal disability.

Suicides were formerly buried ignominiously on the high-road, with a stake thrust through their body, and without Christian rites. (Chambers: Encyclopædia, ix. p. 184, col. 1.)

"They buried Bon at four cross roads, With a stake in his insane."—Hood. (Faithless Nelly Gray.)

Suisse. Tu fais suisse. You live alone; you are a misanthrope. Suisse means porter or door-keeper, hence "Porter au Suisse" ("Ask the porter," or "Enquire at the porter's lodge"). The door-keeper lives in a lodge near the main entrance, and the solitariness of his position, cut off from the house and servants, gave rise to the phrase. At one time these porters were for the most part Swiss.

Suit (1 syl.). To follow suit. To follow the leader; to do as those do who are taken as your exemplars. The term is from games of cards.

Suit of Dittoes (A). A suit of clothes in which coat, waistcoat, and trousers are all of one cloth.

Sult [surrection]. The knife which the goddess Hel (g.r.) is accustomed to use when she sits down to eat from her dish Hunger.

Sultan of Persia. Mahmud Gazau, founder of the Ghaznvide dynasty, was the first to assume in Persia the title of Sultan (A.D. 999).

Sultan's Horse, Deadly (The). "I saw a beast like a lion clothed in the clouds, having green eyes, and nostrils, and ears, and mouth full of teeth; and its breath was like a mass of smoke. Out of its mouth came fire, and an object that glowed like a mountain of brass. Its feet were like the hoofs of a bear. Out of the mouth of the beast came forth fire, and smoke, and venom. The venom was so deadly that it would kill one who breathed upon its Tail. The beast was fierce and powerful, and its strength was great; it could leap over mountains and cross rivers."

Sultana. A beautiful bird, allied to the monarch, with blue feathers, showing beautiful metallic gloss, generally with red beak and legs.

"Some purple-winged sultana."—Moore: Paradise and the Peri.

Summa Diligentia. On the top of a diligence. "Cesar crossed the Alps 'summa diligentia.'" This is a famous schoolboy joke, and one of the best of the kind.

Summer. The second or autumnal summer, said to last thirty days, begins about the time that the sun enters Scorpio (October 23rd). It is variously called—

(1) St. Martin's summer (L'été de St. Martin). St. Martin’s Day is the 11th November.

"Expect St. Martin's summer, leaves on days."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., 1. 2.

(2) All Saints' summer (All Saints' is the 1st November), or All Halloween summer.

"Then followed that beautiful season Called by the puiss Arcadian peasants the summer of All Saints."—Longfellow: Evangeline.

"Farewell, All Halloween summer."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., 1. 2.
Summer King (The). Amadeus of Spain.

Summons. Peter and John de Cavajal, being condemned to death on circumstantial evidence, appealed without success to Ferdinand IV. of Spain. On their way to execution they declared their innocence, and summoned the king to appear before God within thirty days. Ferdinand was quite well on the thirtieth day, but was found dead in his bed next morning. (See Wishart.)

Summum Bonum. The chief excellence: the highest attainable good.

Socrates said knowledge is virtue, and ignorance is vice.

Aristotle said that happiness is the greatest good.

Bernard de Mandeville and Helvetius contended that self-interest is the perfection of the ethical end.

Bentham and Mill were for the greatest happiness of the greatest number.

Herbert Spenser places it in those actions which best tend to the survival of the individual and the race.

Letourneau places it in utilitarianism.

Sumpter Horse or Mule. One that carries baggage. (Italian, somma, a burden.) (See Somagra.)

Sumptuary Laws. Laws to limit the expenses of food and dress, or any luxury. The Romans had their sumptuary laws (leges sumptuariae). Such laws have been enacted in many states at various times. Those of England were all repealed by 1 James I., c. 25.

Sun. Hebrew, Elohim (God); Greek, helios (the sun); Breton, hiel; Latin, sol; German, sunne; Anglo-Saxon, sunne. As a deity, called Adonis by the Phoenicians, and Apollo by the Greeks and Romans.

Sun, Harris, in his Hermes, asserts that all nations ascribe to the sun a masculine and the moon a feminine gender. For conflation see Moon.

City of the Sun. Rhodes was so called because the sun was its tutelar deity. The Colossus of Rhodes was consecrated to the sun. On or Hellipolis, Egypt.

Sun (The), called in Celtic mythology Sunna (Goddess), lives in constant dread of being devoured by the wolf Fenris. It is this contest with the wolf to which eclipses are due. According to this mythology, the sun has a beautiful daughter who will one day reign in place of her mother, and the world will be wholly renovated.

Horses of the Sun.

Arvā'kur, Aslo, and Alsvidur. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bronté (thunder), Eo'os (day-break), Ethiopa (flushing), Ethnos (fiery), Erytheo'os (red-producer), Philo'ea (earth-loving), Tyr'os (fiery). All of them "breathe fire from their nostrils." (Greek and Latin mythology.)

The horses of Aurora are Abrax and Pha'eton. (See Horse.)

More worship the rising than the setting sun, said Pompey; meaning that more persons pay honour to ascendant than to fallen greatness. The allusion is, of course, to the Persian fire-worshippers.

Heaven cannot support two suns, nor earth two masters. So said Alexander the Great when Darius (before the battle of Arbela) sent to offer terms of peace. Beautifully imitated by Shakespeare:—

"Two stars keep not their motion in one sphere; Nor can one England break a double yoke.
Of Harry Percy and the Prince of Wales."—

Dion IV., v. 1

Here lies she-sun, and a before there (Donne). Epithalamium on the marriage of Lady Elizabeth, daughter of James I., with Frederick, elector palatine. It was through this unfortunate princess, called "Queen of Bohemia" and "Queen of Hearts," that the family of Brunswick succeeded to the British throne. Some say that Lord Craven married (secretly) the "fair widow."

Sun-burst. The fanciful name given by the ancient Irish to their national banner.

At once, like a sun-burst, her banner unfurled. —Thomson: Moore; Irish Melodies, No. 6

Sun Inn. In compliment to the illomened House of York. The Sun Inn, Westminster, is the badge of Richard II.

Sun and Moon Falling. By the old heralds the arms of royal houses were not emblazoned by colours, but by sun, moon, and stars. Thus, instead of or (gold), a royal coat has the sun; instead of argent (silver), the moon; instead of the other five heraldic colours, one of the other five ancient planets. In connection with this idea, read Matt. xxiv. 29:—

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken." (See Planets.)
Sun in one's Eyes (To have the). To be tipsy.

Sun of Righteousness. Jesus Christ. (Mal. iv. 3.)

Sunday Saint. One who observes the ordinances of religion, and goes to church on a Sunday, but is worldly, grasping, indifferently honest, and not "too moral" the following six days.

Sundays. When three Sundays come together. (See Never.)

Sundew, the Insectivora, which is from the Greek dran, dew. So called from the dew-like drops which rest on the hairy fringes of the leaves.

"Be the lone fountain's secret bed,
When her own footsteps catch the bread;
And the wild myrtle or silent thyme,
Th'sundew blooms unseen to men.
And at the stones - in curve -
Drinks the pure water of the sky.

The Wild garden!"

Sunflower (Thy). Clytie, a water-nymph, was in love with Apollo, but meeting no return, she died and was changed into a sunflower, which still turns to the sun through its daily course.

"The sunflower turns on theœd, when she gets
The same look which she turned when he rose.
T. Moira. (This is one of all those containing running clauses.)

"I will not have the mad Clytie, Whose head is turned by the sun."

What we call a sunflower is the Helianthus, so called, not because it follows the sun, but because it resembles a picture sun. A bed of these flowers will turn in every direction, regardless of the sun. The Turnsole is the Heliotropium, quite another order of plants.

Sonna or Sonna. The Oral Law, or the precepts of Mahomet not contained in the Koran, collected into a volume. Similar to the Jewish Mishna, which is the supplement of the Pentateuch. (Arabic, senna, custom, rule of conduct.)

Sunnite (2 syl). Orthodox Mahometans, who consider the Sunna or Oral Law as binding as the Koran. They wear white turbans. The heterodox Moslems are called Shiites or Shiahls (q.v.).

Suo Jure (Latin). In one's own right.

Suo Marte (Latin). By one's own strength or personal exertions.

Super. Supers. In theatrical parlance, "super" means supernumeraries, or persons employed to make up crowds, processions, dancing or singing choirs, messengers, etc., where little or no speaking is needed.

Supercilious (5 syl). Having an elevated eyebrow; hence contemptuous, haughty. (Latin, supercilium.)

Supernauum. The very best wine. The word is Low Latin for "upon the nail," meaning that the wine is so good the drinker leaves only enough in his glass to make a bead on his nail. The French say of first-class wine, "It is fit to make a ruby on the nail" (faire rubis sur poudre), referring to the residue left which is only sufficient to make a single drop on the nail. Tom Nash says, "After a man has drunk his glass, it is usual, in the North, to turn the bottom of the cup upside down, and let a drop fall upon the thumb-nail. If the drop rolls off, the drinker is obliged to fill and drink again." Bishop Hall alludes to the same custom "The Duke Tenter-belly . . . exclaims . . . 'Let never this goodly-formed goblet of wine go joyfully through me: ' and then he set it to his mouth, stole it off every drop, save a little remainder, which he was by custom to set upon his thumb-nail and lick off.'" iversary. Entirely. To drink supernauum is to leave no heel-taps; to drink so as to leave just enough not to roll off one's thumb-nail if poured upon it, but only to remain there as a wine-bead.

"This is after the fashion of Switzerland. Clear off next, supernauum. - Robbiana: Sangaruis and Pantagruel, bk. 1, 5.

"Their pots were supernauum. I snatched the rubies from each thumb, And in this cask I gave them here. Perhaps you'll like it more than beer."

Superstitio. That which survives when its companions are dead. (Latin, superstis.) Those who escaped in battle were called superstitios. Superstition is religious credulity, or that religion which remains when real religion is dead.

Paul said to the Athenians that he perceived they were "too superstitious."—Acts xx. 22.
Sipped all his Porridge (He has). Eaten his last meal; he is dead.

Supper of Trimalchio (4). — A supper for gourmands of the upper classes in the reign of Nero. It forms a section of Petronii Arbitri Satyriicon.

Supplication. This word has greatly changed its original meaning. The Romans used it for a thanksgiving after a signal victory (Lucy, iii. 63). ("His rebus gestis, supplicatio a saniis devota est" [Caesar : Bell. Gall., ii.].) The word means the act of folding the knees (sub-plico). We now use the word for begging or entreating something.

Sure as Demoivre. Abraham Demoivre, author of The Doctrine of Chances, or Method of Calculating the Probabilities of Events at Play, was proverbially accurate in his calculations. It was Pope who said, "Sure as Demoivre, without rule or line."

Sure as a gum, as fate, as death and taxes, etc. (See SIMILES.)

"Surest Way to Peace is a constant Preparation for War." Fox, afterwards Bishop of Hereford, to Henry VIII. (In Latin, "Si tec pacem, para bellum.")

Surety. One who takes the place of another, a substitute, a hostage.

Surfeit Water. Cordial water to cure surfeits.

"Water that cures surfeits. A little cold distilled poppy water is the true surfeit water." - Locke.

Surgeon is the Greek form of the Latin word manufacturer. The former is chir-surgeon (to work with the hand), and the latter mano-surgeon (to do or make with the hand).

Surloin of Beef. (See SIRLOIN.)

Surlyboy. Yellow hair. (Irish, surley bue.)

Surname (2 syl.). The over-name; either the name written over the Christian name, or given over and above it; an additional name. For a long time persons had no family name, but only one, and that a personal name. Surnames are not traced farther back than the latter part of the tenth century.

Surnames of places.

In ford, in ham, and ley, and ton,
The most of English surnames run.

Surplice (2 syl.). Over the fur robe. (Latin, super-pelllicium.) The clerical robe worn over the bachelor's ordinary dress, which was anciently made of sheepskin. The ancient Celts and Germans also wore a garment occasionally over their fur skins.

Durandius says: "The garments of the Jewish priesthood were gilt tights about them, to signify the bondage of the law; but the surplice of the Christian priest is loose, to signify the freedom of the gospel."

Surrey. Anglo-Saxon, Suth-re (south of the river — i.e. the Thames), or Suth-rwe (south kingdom).

Saddle White Surrey for the field tomorrow (Shakespeare: Richard III.). Surrey is the Syrian horse, as Roan Barbery in Richard II. is the Barbary horse or barb. (See Horse.)

Surt or Surtur. The guardian of Muspelheim, who keeps watch day and night with a flaming sword. At the end of the world he will hurl fire from his hand and burn up both heaven and earth. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Susan (St.). The patron saint who saves from infancy and reproach. This is from her fiery trial recorded in the tale of Susannah and the Elders.

* * * This wife of Joaichim, being accused of adultery, was condemned to death by the Jewish elders; but Daniel proved her innocence, and turned the tables on her accusers, who were put to death instead. (The Apocrypha.)

Sussex. The territory of the South Saxons (Suth-Saxse).

Sutor. Ne sutor, etc. (See COBBLER.)

Stick to the cow. Boswell, one night sitting in the pit of Covent Garden theatre with his friend Dr. Blair, gave an extempore imitation of a cow, which the house applauded. He then ventriloquised another imitation, but failed, whereupon the doctor advised him in future to "stick to the cow."

Suttee (Indian). A pure and model wife (Sanscrit, sati, chaste, pure); a widow who immolates herself on the funeral pile of her deceased husband. Abolished by law in British India.

Svalin. The dashboard placed by the gods before the sun-car to prevent the earth from being burnt up. The word means "cooling." (Scandinavian mythology.)

Swaddler. A contemptuous synonym for Protestant used by the Roman Catholics. Cardinal Cullen, in 1669, gave notice that he would deprive of the sacrament all parents who sent their children to be taught in mixed Model Swag. Luggage, knapsack, a bundle; also food carried about one. Swag-shop, a store of minor, or cheap-priced goods. (Scotch, scow.)

Swag. Plenty. Rhyming slang: A bag-full means plenty, and by omitting full. "bag" remains to rhyme with swag. (See CHITY.)

Swagger. Bluster; noisy boasting. (See SWAINMOTEx.)

Swallow. According to Scandinavian tradition, this bird hovered over the cross of our Lord, crying "Scula! scula!" (Console! console!) whence it was called swallor (the bird of consolation). (See CHRISTIAN TRADITIONS.)

The swallow is said to bring home from the sea-shore a stone which gives sight to her fledglings.

"Seeking with eager eyes that wondrous stone which the swallow Brings from the shore of the sea to restore the sight of its fledglings."

Longfellow: Evangeline, part 1.

It is lucky for a swallow to build about one's house. This is a Roman superstition. Ælian says that the swallow was sacred to the Pennétes or household gods, and therefore to injure one would be to bring wrath upon your own house.

It is unlucky to kill a swallow.

"Perhaps you failed in your foreseeing skill, For swallows are unlucky birds to kill."

Dryden: Hud and Panther, part iii.

One swallow does not make spring. You are not to suppose winter is past because you have seen a swallow; nor that the troubles of life are over because you have surmounted one difficulty.

Swan. Fionnuala, daughter of Lir, was transformed into a swan, and condemned to wander for many hundred years over the lakes and rivers of Ireland till the introduction of Christianity into that island. T. Moore has a poem entitled The Song of Fionnuala. (Irish Melodies, No. 11.)

The male swan is called a cob, the female a pen; a young swan is called a cygnet.

Swan. Erman says of the Cygnus olor, "This bird, when wounded, pours forth its last breath in notes most beautifully clear and loud." (Travels in Siberia, translated by Coolev, vol. ii.)

Emilia says, "I will play the swan, and die in music." (Othello, v. 2.)

"What is that, mother?" "The swan, my love, He is flitting down to his native shore." Death darkens his eyes and anemones his wings. Yet the sweetest song is the last he sings. Live so, my son, that when death shall come, Swan-like and sweet, it may wait thee home."

Mr. Nicol says of the Cygnus olor's note that it resembles the tones of violin, though somewhat higher. Each note occurs after a long interval. The music presages a thaw in Iceland, and hence one of its great charms. (See LUCUS A NON LUCENDO.)

Ethinium vocans cygnum. (Journal, viii. 32.)

A black swan. A curiosity, a varus avis. The expression is borrowed from the well known verse—"Varus avis in terris, nigrae summissa cygne."

"What is it my varus varus my black swan?" - Sir Walter Scott. The Antiquary.

Swan. Swan, a public-house sign, like the peacock and pheasant, was an emblem of the parable of chivalry. Every knight chose one of these birds, which was associated in his oath with God, the Virgin, or his lady-love. Hence their use as public-house signs.

The White Swan, a public-house sign, is in compliment to Anne of Cleves, descended from the Knight of the Swan. Swan with Two Necks. A corruption of "Swan with Two Nickes." The Vintners' Company mark their swans with two nickes in the beak.

N.B. Royal swans are marked with five nickes—two leughtwise, and three across the bill.

Swan-hopping. A corruption of Swan Upping—that is, taking the swans up the River Thames for the purpose of marking them. (See above.)

Swan of Avon (The), or Sweet Swan of Avon. Shakespeare is sq
Sware by my Sword (Hamlet, i. 5)—that is, "by the cross on the hilt of my sword." Again in Winter's Tale, "Sware by this sword thou wilt perform my bidding." (ii. 3). Holinshed says, "Warwick kisses the cross of King Edward's sword, as it were a vow to his promise;" and Dekker says, "He has sworn to me on the cross of his pure Toledo." (Old Fortunatus).

Sweat. To sweat a client. To make him bleed; to fleece him.

To sweat coin. To subtract part of the silver or gold by friction, but not to such an amount as to render the coin useless as a legal tender. The French use suer in the same sense, as "Suer son argent," to sweat his money by usury.

"Tous fuites suer le bouhominet—lia est notre dire quand vous le pillez." (Harangue du Capitaine la Caravonade.) (1615.)

Sweating Sickness appeared in England about a century and a half after the Black Death, (1483.) It broke out amongst the soldiers of Richmond's army, after the battle of Bosworth Field, and lasted five weeks. It was a violent inflammatory fever, without boils or ulcers. Between 1483 and 1529 there were five outbreaks of this pest in England, the first four being confined to England and France, but the fifth spread over Germany, Turkey, and Austria.

Swedenborgians, called by themselves "the New Jerusalem Church" (Kev. xxi. 2). Believers in the doctrines taught by Emanuel Swedenborg (1688-1772). Their views of salvation, inspiration of Scripture, and a future state, differ widely from those of other Christians; and as to the Trinity, they believe it to be centred in the person of Jesus Christ (Col. ii. 9). (Supplied by the Auxiliary New Church Missionary Society.)

Swedish Nightingale. Jenny Lind (Madame Goldschmidt), a native of Stockholm, and previous to her marriage a public singer. (1821-1886.)

Sweep. To sweep the threshold. To announce to all the world that the woman of the house is paramount. When the procession called "Skimmington" passed any house where the woman was dominant, each one gave the threshold a sweep with a broom or bunch of twigs. (See Skimmington.)

Sweepstakes (A). A race in which stakes are made by the owners of horses
Sweet

engaged, to be awarded to the winner or other horse in the race. In all sweepstakes entrance money has to be paid to the race fund. (See PLATE, SELLING-RACE, HANDICAP, WEIGHT-FOR-AGE RACES.)

If the horse runs, the full stake must be paid but if it is withdrawn, a forfeit only is imposed.

Also a gambling arrangement by which the successful bettor sweeps up or carries off all the other stakes. It is sometimes applied to a game of cards in which one of the players may win all the tricks or all the stakes.

Sweet as sugar. (See SMILES.)

Sweet Singer of Israel. King David (c. 1074-1001).

Sweet Singers. A puritanical sect in the reign of Charles II, etc., common in Edinburgh. They burnt all story-books, ballads, romances, etc., denounced all unchaste words and actions, and even the printed Bible.

Sweet Voices. Backers, votes. Coriolanus speaks with contempt of the sweet voices of the Roman mob voters.

Sweetheart. A lover, male or female.

Swell Mob. The better-dressed thieves and pickpockets. A "swell" is a person shrewdly dressed; one who puffs himself beyond his proper dimensions, like the frog in the fable.

Swili Dynasty. The twelfth imperial dynasty of China, founded by Yang-kien, Prince of Swi, a.d. 587. He assumed the name of Wen-foo (King Wen).

Swift as lightning, as the wind, as an arrow, etc. (See SMILES.)

Swim (In the). In society. The upper crust of society. An angel’s phrase. A lot of fish gathered together is called a swim, and when an angel can pitch his hook in such a place he is said to be "in a good swim." To know persons in the swim is to know society folk, who always congregate together.

Cotton tree, who knows nearly everybody in the swim of European society... informs him that Lucy Annerley is the daughter of Sir John Stevens."—A. C. Gilmour, Mr Potter of Texas book in chap. xiv.

Swindle. To cheat; from the German schwändeln, to totter. It originally meant those artifices employed by a tradesman to prop up his credit when it began to totter, in order to prevent or defer bankruptcy.

Swine. Boar or brauny, the sire; sows, the dam; sucklings, the new-born pigs. A castrated boar-pig is called a hog or shot. Young pigs for the butcher are called porkers.

A sow-pig after her first litter becomes a brind-sow, and her whole stock of pigs cast at a birth is called a litter or farrow of pigs.

Swing (Captain). The name assumed by certain persons who sent threatening letters to those who used threshing machines. (1830-1833.) The tenor of these letters was as follows:—"Sir, if you do not lay by your threshing machine, you will hear from Swing." "Excesses of the Luddites and Swing."—The Times.

Swinge-buckler. A roisterer, a rake. The continuation of Stow’s Annals tells us that the "blades" of London used to assemble in West Smithfield with sword and buckler, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, on high days and holidays, for mock fights called "braggins." They swashed and swanged their bucklers with much show of fury, "but seldom was any man hurt." (See SWASHBUCKLER.)

"There was I and little John Dot of Staffordshire, and black George Barnes, and Francis Pickbeale, and Will Sando a Cotswold man; you had not four such swinge-bucklers in all the land-of-county, and I may say to you, we knew where the boys-roads were.—Shakespeare, 2 Henry IV, ii. 7

Swiss. The nickname of a Swiss is "Colin Tampon" (g. r.).

No money, no Swiss, i.e., no servant. The Swiss have ever been the mercenaries of Europe willing to serve anyone for pay. The same was said of the ancient Caesars. In the hotels of Paris this notice is common. "Demandez [or Parlez] an Suisse" (Speak to the porter).

Swiss Boy (The). Music by Moscheles.

Swiss Family Robinson. An abridged translation of a German tale by Joachim Heinrich Kämpe, tutor to Baron Humboldt.

Swithin (St.). If it rains on St. Swithun’s day (15th July), there will be rain for forty days. (See GERVAS.)

"St. Swithun’s day, if ye do rain, for forty days it will remain; St. Swithun’s day, if ye be fair, for forty days, it will rain the next day." The French have two similar proverbs—"Ne pleut pas le jour de St. Médan" (8th June), "Il pleut quarante jours plus tard;" and "Ne pleut pas le jour de St. Gervais" (19th June), "Il pleut quarante jours après."

The legend is that St. Swithun, Bishop of Winchester, who died 862, desired to be buried in the church-yard of the minster, that the "sweet rain of heaven might fall upon his grave." At canonisation the monks thought to honour the saint by removing his body into the choir, and fixed July 15th for the ceremony; but it rained day after day for forty days, so that the monks saw the saints were averse to their project, and wisely abandoned it.

The St. Swithin of Scotland is St. Martin of Boullons. The rainy saint in Flunders is St. Godric; in Germany, the Seven Sleepers.

Switzers. Swiss mercenaries. "Where are my Switzers? Let them guard the door" (Hamlet, iv. 5).

Swollen Head. Excessive conceit. One who has a greatly exaggerated opinion of himself is said to suffer from swollen head.

Sword Excalibr (The). At the death of Uter Pendragon there were many claimants to the crown; they were all ordered to assemble in "the great church of London," on Christmas Eve, and found a sword stuck in a stone and anvil with this inscription: "Ho who can draw forth this sword, the same is to be king." The knights tried to pull it out, but were unable. One day, when a tournament was held, young Arthur wanted a sword and took this one, not knowing it was a charmed instrument, whereupon he was universally acknowledged to be the God-elect king. This was the sword of Excalibr. (History of Prince Arthur, i. 3.)

The enchanted sword (in Amadis of Gaul). Whoever drew this sword from a rock was to gain access to a subterranean treasure. (Cap. xxx.) See also caps. lxxii. and xcix.

Sword of God (The). Khaled Ibn al Waled was so called for his prowess at the battle of Muta.

Sword of Rome (The). Marcellus, who opposed Hannibal. (B.C. 216-214.)

Sword of the Spirit (The). The Word of God (Eph. vi. 17).

Sword (phrases and proverbs).

At swords' point. In deadly hostility, ready to fight each other with swords.

Ike not fire with a sword. This was a precept of Pythagoras, meaning add not fuel to fire, or do not irritate an angry man by sharp words which will only increase his rage. (See Tannhleus : Prorepop, symbol ix.)

To put the sword. To slay.

Your tongue is a double-edged sword. You first say one thing and then the contrary; your argument cuts both ways. The allusion is to the double-edged sword out of the mouth of the Son of Man—one edge to condemn, and the other to save. (Rev. i. 16.)

Yours is a Delphic sword— it cuts both ways. Erasmus says a Delphic sword is that which accommodates itself to the pro or con, of a subject. The reference is to the double meanings of the Delphic oracles, called in Greek Delphikë mach-
Sword and Cloak Plays. So Calderon called topical or modern comedies, because the actors wore cloaks and swords (worn by gentlemen of the period) instead of heraldic, antique, or dramatically-historic dresses, worn in tragedy.

Swords Prohibited. Gaming ran high at Bath, and frequently led to disputes and resort to the sword, then generally carried by well-dressed men. Swords were therefore prohibited by Nash in the public rooms; still they were worn in the streets, when Nash, in consequence of a duel fought by torch-light by two notorious gamblers, made the rule absolute—"That no swords should on any account be worn in Bath."

Sworn Brothers. "in the Old English law, were persons who by mutual oath covenanted to share each other's fortune." (Burroll.)

Sworn at Highgate. (See High-gate.)

Sybarite (S y l). A self-indulgent person; a wanton. The inhabitants of Sybaris, in South Italy, were proverbial for their luxurious living and self-indulgence. A tale is told by Seneca of a Sybarite who complained that he could not rest comfortably at night, and being asked why, replied, "He found a rose-leaf doubled under him, and it hurt him." (See Euphilar.)

"All is calm as would delight the heart Of Sybarites of old."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, canto i.

Sybarites. The Sybarites taught their horses to dance to the sound of a pipe. When the Crotonians marched against Sybaris they began to play on their pipes, whereupon all the Sybarite horses drawn out in array before the town began to dance; disorder soon prevailed in the ranks, and the victory was quick and easy.

Sycamore and Sycomore. Sycamore is the plane-tree of the maple family (Acer pseudo-platanum, or greater maple). The sycomore is the Egyptian fig-tree (Greek, suknomoros, mukos, a fig). The tree into which Zacchaeus climbed (Luke xix. 4) to see Christ pass is wrongly called a sycamore or maple, as it was the sycomore or wild fig. The French have translated the word correctly—"[It] montait sur un sycomore pour le voir."

Synagogue, from the Greek synagōgē, "fig-gatherers." The men of Athens passed a law forbidding the exportation of figs; the law was little more than a dead letter; but there were always found mean fellows who, for their own private ends, impeached those who violated it; hence synagogen came to signify first a general toady, and then a toady generally.

"I here use 'synagogen' in its original sense, as a wretch who smears the prevailing party by informing against his neighbours, under pretence that they are exporters of prohibited figs."—Coleridge: Biographies, vol. iii. chap. x. p. 299.

Sycorax. A witch, whose son was Caliban. (Shakespeare: The Tempest.)

Syenite. A granite so called from Syene, in Egypt, its great quarry.

Syllogism. The five hexameter verses which contain the symbolic names of all the different syllogistic figures are as follow:

"Barbara, Celarent, Daril, Ferison, secundae, Cesare, Camestres, Festino, Barbara, secundae. tertia, Darapal, Dassinar, Darcal, Ferapton, Hokardi, Ferison, habet. Quarit trans pep adit Bramatulp, Cameness, Dimaris, Pesnap, Ferison."

N.B. The vowel

A universal affirmative.
E universal negative.
I particular affirmative.
O particular negative.

Taking the first line as the standard, the initial letters of all the words below it show to which standard the syllogism is to be reduced; thus, Barbara is to be reduced to "Barbara," Cesare to "Celantre," and so on.

Sylphs, according to Middle Age belief, are the elemental spirits of air; so named by the Rosicrucians and Cabalists, from the Greek sileph (a butterfly or moth). (See Gnomes.)

Sylphs. Any mortal who has preserved inviolate chastity may enjoy intimate familiarity with these gentle spirits. All coquettes at death become sylphs, "and sport and flutter in the fields of air."

"Whoever, fair and chaste, Rejects mankind, is by some sylph embraced."—Pope: Rape of the Lock, i.

Sylvam Lignum Ferre (In). To carry coals to Newcastle. The French say, "Porter de l'eau à la vireure." To do a work of supererogation; to paint the lily, or add another perfume to the violet, or perform any other superfluous or ridiculous excess.

Sylvester (St.). The pope who converted Constantine the Great; and his mother by "the miracle of restoring to life a dead ox." The ox was killed by a magician for a trial of skill, and he who restored it to life was to be accounted the servant of the true God. This tale is manifestly an imitation of the Bible Story of Elijah and the prophet of Beal. (I Kings xxi.)

Sylvius Be'ana. Supposed to be Coli the Good, a contemporary of Ausonius, who often mentions him; but not even the titles of his works are known. He was a British writer.

Symbol originally meant the corresponding part of a tally, ticket, or coin cut in twain. The person who presented the piece which fitted showed a "symbol" of his right to what he claimed. (Greek, sun ballo, to put or cast together.)

Symbols of Saints.

Sain The's. Symbols.

Thomas of Currac  Kneeling, and a man behind him striking him with a hammer.
Uroseia  A book and arrows. She was shot through with arrows by the Prince of Moab.

(See Apostles, Evangelists, etc.)
Symbols of other sacred characters.

Abraham ... An old man grasping a knife, ready to strike his son Isaac, who is bound on an altar. An angel arrests his hand, and a ram is caught in the thicket.

David ... Kneeling, above is an angel with a sword. Sometimes he is represented playing a harp.

Esther ... With bow and arrows, going to meet Jacob.

Job ... Sitting naked on the ground, with three friends talking to him.

Joseph ... Conversing with his brothers. Benjamin is represented as a mere boy.

Judas Iscariot ... With a money bag in the last supper, he has knocked over the salt with his right elbow.

Judith ... With Holopherne's head in one hand, and a sabre in the other.

Noah ... Is represented as looking out of the ark, which is flying to the ark, and men branch in its limb.

King Saul ... Is represented as arrayed in a rich tunic and crown. A harp is placed behind him.

Solomon ... Is represented in royal robes, standing under an arch.

Symbolism of Colours

Whether displayed in dresses, the background of pictures, or otherwise:
- Black typifies grief, death.
- Blue, hope, love of divine works; (in dresses) divine contemplation, piety, sincerity.
- Red, peace, Christian prudence, love of good works, a serene conscience.
- Gold, glory and power.
- Green, faith, gladness, immortality, the resurrection of the just; (in dresses) the gladness of the faithful.
- Pale green, baptism.
- Crimson, tribulation.
- Purple, justice, royalty.
- Silver, martyrdom for faith, charity; (in dresses) divine love.
- Saffron, confessors.
- Scarlet, the fervour and glory of witnesses to the Church.
- Silver, chastity and purity.
- Violet, penitence.
- White, purity, temperance, innocence, chastity, faith; (in dresses) innocence and purity.

Symbolism of Metals and Gems

Amethyst typifies humility.
- Diamond, invulnerable faith.
- Gold, glory, power.
- Sardonyx, sincerity.
- Sapphire, hope.
- Silver, chastity, purity.

Syrens of the Ditch. Fogo. So called by Tasso.

Syrtis, says Richardson, derives its name from Suris (a delicate rose); hence Suristan (the land of roses). The Jews called Syria Aram.

Syrtis. A quicksand. Applied especially to a part of the African coast. (Greek syrtis.)

Tab.

T, in music, stands for Tutti (all), meaning all the instruments or voices are to join. It is the opposite of S for Solo.

- t inserted with a double hyphen between a verb ending with a vowel and the pronouns elle, ti, or on, is called "t ephelepticly," as, nume-t-il, dire-t-on. (See n. MARKS IN GRAMMAR.

Marked with a T. Criminals convicted of felony, and admitted to the benefit of clergy, were branded on the brawn of the thumb with the letter T (thief). The law was abolished by 7 and 8 George IV., c. 27.

It fits to a T. Exactly. The allusion is to work that mechanics square with a T-rule, especially useful in making right angles, and in obtaining perpendiculars on paper or wood.

The *sanity T*s. Sin Tander, Sin Tantony, Sin Tawdry, Sin Tausin, Sin Tedmund, and Sin Tolders; otherwise St. Andrew, St. Anthony, St. Audry, St. Austin [Augustine], St. Edmund, and St. Ethelred. Tooley is St. Olat.

T-Rule (A). A ruler shaped like a Greek T. (See above.)

Tab. An old Tab. An old maid; an old tabby or cat. So called because old maids usually make a cat their companion.

Tabard. The Tabard, in Southwark, is where Chaucer supposes his pilgrims to have assembled. The tabard was a jacket without sleeves, whole before, open on both sides, with a square collar, winged at the shoulder like a cape, and worn by military nobles over their armour. It was generally emblazoned with heraldic devices. Heralds still wear a tabard.

Item... A chacun un grand tabard.

Le grand Tournois de Matière François Villon.
Tabard, A sizar of Queen’s Col-lege, Oxford. So called because his gown has tabard sleeves—that is, loose sleeves, terminating a little below the elbow in a point.

Tabarín. He’s a Tabarín—a merry
Andrew. Tabarin was the fellow of Mondor, a famous vendor of quack medicines in the reign of Charles IX.
By his antics and coarse wit he collected great crowds, and both he and his master grew rich. Tabarin bought a handsome château in Dauphiné, but the aristocracy out of jealousy murdered him.

Tabby, a cat, so called because the bridlings of the tabby were thought to resemble the waterings of the silk of the name. (French, tabes; Italian, etc., tabi; Persian, retabi, a rich figured silk.)

"Demurest of the tabby kind.
The pensive Selima reclined." Gay.

Tabula Rasa (Latin). A clean slate on which anything can be written.

"When a girl has been taught to keep her mind a tabula rasa till she comes to years of maturity, she will be more free to act on her own natural impulses."— W. S. L.

table, representing the excellency of soberity on one side, and the deformity of intemperance on the other.

Tables of Cebès. Cebès was a Theban philosopher, a disciple of Socrates, and one of the interlocutors of Plato’s Phædo. His Tables or Tableau supposes him to be placed before a tableau or panorama representing the life of man, which the philosopher describes with great accuracy of judgment and splen-dour of sentiment. This tableau is sometimes appended to Epictetus.

Table of Pythianorum. The common multiplication table, carried up to ten.
The table is parcelled off into a hundred little squares or cells. (See Tabule.)

Knights of the Round Table. A military order instituted by Arthur, the “first king of the Britons,” A.D. 516.
Some say they were twenty-four in number, some make the number as high as 160, and others reduce the number to twelve. They were all seated at a round table, that no one might claim a post of honour.

The Twelve Tables. The tables of the Roman laws engraved on brass, brought from Athens to Rome by the decemvirs.

Turning the tables. Rebutting a charge by bringing forth a counter-charge. Thus, if a husband accuses his wife of extravagance in dress, she “turns the tables upon him” by accusing him of extravagance in his dress.
The Romans pride themselves on their tables made of cypress wood from Marrita’nia, inlaid with ivory, and sold at a most extravagant price—some equal to a senator’s income. When the gentlemen accused the ladies of extravagance, the ladies retorted by reminding the gentlemen of what they spent in tables.
Pliny calls this taste of the Romans mensa’rum insania.

It is also used for “audi alteram partem,” and the allusion is then slightly modified—“We have considered the wife’s extravagance; let us now look to the husband’s.”

“We will now turn the tables, and show the hexameters in all their vigour.”—The Times.

Table d’Hôte [the host’s table]. An ordinary. In the Middle Ages, and even down to the reign of Louis XIV., the landlord’s table was the only public dining-place known in Germany and France. The first restaurant was opened in Paris during the reign of the Grand Monarque, and was a great success.

Table Money. Money appropriated to the purposes of hospitality.

Table-Turning. The presumed art of turning tables without the application of mechanical force. Said by some to be the work of departed spirits, and by others to be due to a force akin to mesmerism. Jackson Davis (the Seer of Poughkeepsie), a cobbler, professed, in 1848, to hear “spirit voices in the air.”
(See Spiritualism.)

Tableaux Vivants (French, living pictures). Representations of statuary groups by living persons, invented by Madame Genlis while she had charge of the children of the Duc d’Orléans.

Tabooed. Devoted. Forbidden. This is a Polynesian term, and means consecrated or set apart. Like the Greek anathema, the Latin sacre, the French sacre, etc., the word has a double meaning—one to consecrate, and one to incur the penalty of violating the consecration. (See Tapu.)

Taborites (3 syl.). A sect of Hus-sites in Bohemia. So called from the fortress Tabor, about fifty miles from Prague, from which Nicholas von Huss-nez, one of the founders, expelled the Imperial army. They are now incorporated with the Bohemian Brethren.

Tabouriet. The right of sitting in the presence of the queen. In the ancient French court certain ladies had the droit de tabouret (right of sitting on a tabouret in the presence of the queen). At first it was limited to princesses; but subsequently it was extended to all the chief ladies of the queen’s household; and later still the wives of ambassadors, dukes, lord chancellor, and keeper of the seals, enjoyed the privilege. Gentlemen similarly privileged had the droit de fauteuil.

Tabule Toletane. The astronomical tables composed by order of Alphonso X., of Castile, in the middle of the thirteenth century, were so called because they were adapted to the city of Tole-do.

“Les Tables Toletanes faitz he brought.
Pat war colded, ne ther laked noth.”

Chaucer. Castle y Tale, 11,583

Tace (2 syl.). Latin for candle. Silence is most discreet. Tace is Latin for “be silent,” and candle is symbolic of light. The phrase means “keep it dark,” do not throw light upon it. Fielding, in his Amelia (chap. x.), says, “Tace, madam, is Latin for candle.” There is an historical allusion worth remembering. It was customary at one time to express disapproval of a play or actor by throwing a candle on the stage, and when this was done the curtain was immediately drawn down. Oulter (vol. i. p. 6), in his History of the Theatre of London, gives us an instance of this which occurred January 29th, 1772, at Covent Garden theatre, when the piece before the public was An Hour before Marriage. Someone threw a candle on the stage, and the curtain was dropped at once.

“Tace and a candle赛 the stage, and the curtain was dropped at once.

There are some old stories that cannot be ripped up again with entire safety to all concerned. Tace is Latin for “be silent,” and candle is symbolic of light. The phrase means “keep it dark,” do not throw light upon it. Fielding, in his Amelia (chap. x.), says, “Tace, madam, is Latin for candle.”

Chaucer. Castle y Tale, 11,583

N.B. We have several of these old phrases; one of the best is, “Brandy is Latin for goose” (g.v.).

Tache brune (2 syl.). The horse of Ogier le Dane. The word means “brown-spot.” (See Horse.)

Tenea Nationis. Show of argument. Argument which seems prima facie plausible and specious, but has no real depth or value.

Mr. Spencer is again afflicted with his old complaint tense nationis, and takes big words for real things.”—The Ollis: Mr. Spencer’s First Principles.

Taiz’ping. Chinese rebels. The word means Universal Peace, and arose thus: Hung-sew-tzeuen, a man of humble birth, and an unsuccessful candidate for a government office, was induced by some missionary priests ‘to renounce idolatry, and found the society of Taiz’ping, which came into collision with the imperial authorities in 1850. Hung now gave out that he was the chosen instrument in God’s hands to uproot idolatry and establish the dynasty of Universal Peace; he assumed the title of Taiz’ping-wang (Prince of Universal Peace), and called his five chief officers princes. Nankin was made their capital in 1860, but Colonel Gordon (called Chinese Gordon) in 1864 quelled the insurrection, and overthrew the armies of Hung.

Taffeta or Taffety. A fabric made of silk; at one time it was watered; hence Taylor says, “No taffety more changeable than they.” “Noire mot taffeta est formée par cinsetopér, du bruit que just cette étoffe.” (Franciscus-Michel.)

Taffeta phrase. Smooth sleek phrases, euphemisms. We also use the words fustian, stuff, silk, shoddy, buckram, velvet, satin, lustrestring, etc., etc., to qualify phrases and literary compositions spoken or written.

“Taffeta phrases silken terms precise, Three-piled by pedoboles.”

Bunyan. açılent’s Labour’s Lost, v. 2

Taffy. A Welshman. So called from David, a very common Welsh name. David, familiarly Davy, becomes in Welsh Taffid, Taffy.

Tag Rag, and Bobtail. The humble ignobility. A “tag” is a doe in the second year of her age; a “rag” a herd of deer at rutting time; “bobtail,” a fawn just weaned.

According to Halliwell, a sheep of the first year is called a tag. Tag is sometimes written shag.

It will swallow us all up, six up and men, shag, tag, and bobtail.”—Babes of: Painters well, ist. 22.

Taghaim (2 syl.). A means employed by the Scotch in inquiring into futurity. A person wrapped up in the hide of a fresh-slain bullock was placed beside a waterfall, or at the foot of a precipice, and there left to meditate on the question propounded. Whatever his fancy suggested to him in this wild situation passed for the inspiration of his disembodied spirit.

"Last evening she
Bright as a sun, and strong.

At that kind which must not be
Unless in dread extremities,

Sir Walter Scott: The Lady of the Lake, st. 4.

Taherites (3 syl.) A dynasty of five kings who reigned in Khurasan for fifty-two years (820–872). So called from the founder, Tahsr, general of the Calif's army.

Tails. Lion's tail. Lions, according to legend, wipe out their footsteps with their tail, that they may not be tracked. Twisting the lion's tail. (See Twisting.)

He has no more tail than a Manx cat.

There is a breed of cats in the Isle of Man without tails.

Tails. The men of Kent are born with tails, as a punishment for the murder of Thomas à Becket. (Lambert: Tramab.) (See the Spectator, 178.)

"For Becket's sake, Kent always shall have tails."

And so Moral.

Tails. It is said that the Ghilas race, which number between 30,000 and 40,000, and dwell "far beyond the Senaar," have tails three or four inches long. Colonel du Corret tells us he carefully examined one of this race named Bellal, the slave of an omir in Mecca, whose house he frequented. (World of Wonders, p. 206.)

The Niam-niam of Africa are tailed, so we are told.

Tails. The Chinese men were made to shave their heads and wear a queue or tail by the Manchu Tartars, who, in the seventeenth century, subdued the country, and compelled the men to adopt the Manchu dress. The women were allowed to compress their feet as before, although the custom is not adopted by the Tartars.

"Anglicus a tergo caudam genus" probably refers to the pigtales once worn.

Tailors. The three tailors of Tooley Street. Canning says that three tailors of Tooley Street, Southwark, addressed a petition of grievances to the House of Commons, beginning—"We, the people of England." (See Vaughan.)

Nine tailors make a man. The present scope of this expression is that a tailor is so much more useful than another man that it would take nine of them to make a man of average stature and strength. There is a tradition that an orphan lad, in 1742, applied to a fashionable London tailor for airs. There were nine journeymen in the establishment, each of whom contributed something to set the little orphan up with a fruit barrow. The little merchant in time became rich, and adopted for his motto, "Nine tailors made me a man," or "Nine tailors make a man." This certainly is not the origin of the expression, inasmuch as we find a similar one used by Taylor a century before that date, and referred to as of old standing, even then.

"Some foolish knife, I think, at first began
The slander that thse tailors are one man."

Taylor: Wakes, 1st. 75 (1690).

Another suggestion is this: At the death of a man the tolling bell is rung thrice three tolls; at the death of a woman it is rung only three-two tolls. Hence nine tolls indicate the death of a man. Her bell gives telle-told, and a tolling-bell is a teller. In regard to "make," it is the French faire, as On le faut sort mort, i.e. some one gave out or made it known that he was dead.

"The fourme of the Trinities was founded in manne. ... Adam our forefather, ... and Eve of Adam the seconde persone, and of them both was the third personne. At the death of a manne three bells schulde be ronge as his knill, in worne hepe of the Trinities—for a womanne, who is the seconde persone of the Trinities, two balls schulde be ronge."—An old English Hymn for Trinity Sunday. (See Spald. Narranes and Curios, vol. III, p. 174.)

Tailor's Sword (A), or A Tailor's Dagger. A knife.

"The tailor's stools legged on their boards, Needle at me, hand extended, prepared To stab the black cloth with their swords To make up mourners"

The instant that death is declared"—Petr. Pandit: Great Cry and Little Woe, Krost 1.

Take a Back Seat (To). To be set aside; to be deferred for the present. A parliamentary phrase.

"When there seemed to be a tendency, to make the Irish question, in the course of the day, take a back seat. Unanimous indication knew no bounds."—The Daily Graphic, February 22, 1863.

Take a Hair of the Dog that Bit You. After a debauch, take a little wine the next day. Take a cool draught of ale in the morning, after a night's excess. The advice was given literally in ancient times. "If a dog bites you, put a hair of the dog into the wound," on the homoeopathic principle of "Similia similibus curantur" (like cures like).

Take in Tow (To). Take under guidance. A man who takes a lad in tow acts as his guide and director. To tow a ship or barge is to guide and draw it along by tow-lines.

"Too proud for hards to take in tow my name."—Peter Pan by: Future Laureate, Part II.
Take Mourning (To). Attending church the Sunday after a funeral. It is the custom, especially in the northern counties, for all the mourners, and sometimes the bearers also, to sit in a specific pew all together the Sunday after a funeral. It mattered not what place of worship they usually attend—all unite in the "taking mourning."

Take Tea with Him (I.), i.e. I floor my adversary by winning every rubber. If he beats me in billiards, he "has me on toast." (Indian slang.)

Takin' the Bank. A Scotch phrase for family worship.

Taking On. Said of a woman in hysterics; to fret; to grieve passionately, as "Come, don't take on so!"

"Lance took upon himself the whole burden of Dame Debitch's... taking out, as such fits of passio hysterica are usually termed." —Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak. chap. 22.

Taking a Sight. Putting the right thumb to the nose and spreading the fingers out. This is done as much as to say, "Do you see any green in my eye?"

"Tell that to the monkeys." —(Old Irish. non ego.) Captain Murray tells us that some "of the old coins of Denmark represent Thor with his thumb to his nose, and his four fingers extended in the air," and Panurge (says Rabelais, Pantagrul, book ii. 10) "suddenly lifted his right hand, put his thumb to his nose, and spread his fingers straight out" to express incredulity.

"The factaman he says no word that indicates a doubt. But puts his thumb to his nose and spreads his fingers out" —Ingoldsby: Neil Cook.

Taking Time by the Forelock. Seize the present moment. "Carpe diem." Time personified is represented with a lock of hair on his forehead but none on the rest of his head, to signify that time past cannot be used, but time present may be seized by the forelock.

Tal'botype (3 syl.). A photographic process invented in 1839 by Fox Talbot, who called it "the Calotype Process." (See Daguerrotype.)

Tale (1 syl.). A tall; a reckoning. In Exod. v. we have tale of bricks. A measure by number, not by weight.

A old wife's tale. Any marvellous legendary story.

To tell tales out of school. To utter abroad affairs not meant for the public ear.

A Tale of a Tub (The). A ridiculous narrative or tale of fiction. The reference is to Dean Swift's tale so called.

Talent, meaning cleverness or "gift" of intelligence, is a word borrowed from Matt. xxv. 14-30.

Tales (3 syl.). Persons in the court from whom the sheriff or his clerk makes selections to supply the place of jurors who have been empanelled, but are not in attendance. It is the first word of the Latin sentence which provides for this contingency. (Tales de circumstantibus.)

"To serve for jurymen or tales." —Butler: Hudibras, part iii. 8.

To pray a tales. To pray that the number of jurymen may be completed. It sometimes happens that jurymen are challenged, or that less than twelve are in the court. When this is the case the jury can request that their complement be made up from persons in the court. Those who supplement the jury are called talisman, and their names are set down in a book called a talebook.

Talgol (in Hudibras), famous for killing flies, was Jackson, butcher of Newgate Street, who got his captain's commission at Naseby.

Talisman. A figure cut or engraved on metal or stone, under the influence of certain planets. In order to free any place of vermin, the figure of the obnoxious animal is made in wax or consecrated metal, in a planetary hour, and this is called the talisman. (If an invention.)

"He swore that you had robbed his house, and stole his talisman house." —S. Butler: Hudibras, part iii. 1.

Talisman. The Abraxas Stone is a most noted talisman. (See Abraxas.) In Arabia a talisman is still used, consisting of a piece of paper, on which are written the names of the Seven Sleepers and their dog, to protect a house from ghosts and demons. The talisman is supposed to be sympathetic, and to receive an influence from the planets, which it communicates to the wearer.

Talk. To talk over. To discuss, to debate; also to gain over by argument.

Talk Shop. (See Shop.)

Tallkee Talkee. (A reduplication of talk with termination ee, borrowed in ridicule from some attempt of dark races to speak English.) A copious effusion of talk with no valuable result.

Talking Bird. A bird that spoke with a human voice, and could call all other birds to sing in concert. (The Sisters who Envised their Younger Sister; Arabian Nights.) (See Green Bird.)
Tall Men

Champions (a Welsh phrase); brave men.

"You were good soldiers, and tall fellows."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 2.

"The undaunted resolution and stubborn ferocity of Gwynedd... had long made him beloved among the 'Tall Men,' or champions of Wales."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 1.

Talleyrand, anciently written Talierwan, is the sobriquet derived from the words "tailler les range," "cut through the ranks."

Tally (A). The price paid for picking a bushel of hops. It varies (1891) from 1½d. to 2½d.

Tally. To correspond. The tally used in the Exchequer was a rod of wood, marked on one face with notches corresponding to the sum for which it was an acknowledgment. Two other sides contained the date, the name of the payer, and so on. The rod was then clamped in such a manner that each half contained one written side and half of every notch. One part was kept in the Exchequer, and the other was circulated. When payment was required the two parts were compared, and if they "tallied," or made a tally, all was right; if not, there was some fraud, and payment was refused. Tallies were not finally abandoned in the Exchequer till 1834. (French, tailler, to cut.)

In 1834 orders were issued to destroy the tallies. There were two cutlards of them, which were set fire to at six o'clock in the morning, and the conflagration set on fire the Houses of Parliament, with their offices, and part of the Palace of Westminster.

To break one's tally (in Latin, "Confregere tessevam"). When public houses were unknown, a guest entertained for a night at a private house had a tally given him, the corresponding part being kept by the host. It was expected that the guest would return the favour if required to do so, and if he refused he "violated the rites of hospitality," or confregere tessevam. The "white stone" spoken of in the Book of the Revelation is a teesa which Christ gives to his disciples.

To live tally is to live unwed as man and wife. A tally-woman is a concubine, and a tally-man is the man who keeps a mistress. These expressions are quite common in Cheshire, Yorkshire, and Lancashire. In mines a tin label is attached to each tub of coal, bearing the name of the man who sent it to the bank, that the weighman may credit it to the right person. As the tallies of the miner and weighman agree, so the persons who agree to live together tally with each other's taste.

Tally-ho is the Norman hunting cry Taliasan! (To the coppice). The tally-ho was used when the stag was viewed in full career making for the coppice. We now cry "Tally-ho!" when the fox breaks cover. The French cry is "Tarant!"

Tallyman (A). A travelling draper who calls at private houses to sell wares on the tally system—that is, part payment on account, and other parts when the man calls again.

Talmd (The). About 120 years after the destruction of the Temple, the rabbi Judah began to take down in writing the Jewish traditions; his book, called the Mishna, contains six parts: (1) Agriculture and seed-sowing; (2) Festivals; (3) Marriage; (4) Civil affairs; (5) Sacrifices; and (6) what is clean and what unclean. The book caused immense disputation, and two Babylonish rabbis replied to it, and wrote a commentary in sixty parts, called the Babylonian Talmud. Gemara (imperfect). This compilation has been greatly abridged by the omission of Nos. 5 and 6.

Talpot or Talpot Tree. A gigantic palm. When the sheath of the flower bursts it makes a report like that of a cannon.

"They burst, like Zelian's giant palm, Whose buds by open with a sound That shakes the jummy forest round."—Moore: The World's Captives.

Zelian is Portuguese for Ceylon.

Talus. Sir Artegal's iron man. Spenser, in his Faerie Queen, makes Talus run continually round the island of Crete to chastise offenders with an iron flail. He represents executive power—"swift as a swallow, and as lion strong." In Greek mythology Talos was a man of brass, the work of Hephaestos (Vulcan), who went round the island of Creto thrice a day. Whenever he saw a stranger draw near the island he made himself red-hot, and embraced the stranger to death.

Tam-o'-Shanter's Mare. Remember Tam-o'-Shanter's mare. You may pay too dear for your whistle, as Meg lost her tail, pulled off by Nannie of the "Cutty-sark."

"Think, ye may as joy our hearts dear— Remember Tam-o's sister's mare."—Burns.
Tamarisk, from a Hebrew word meaning to cleanse, so called from its astrigent qualities. The Romans wreathed the brows of criminals with tamarisk. The Arabs make cakes called sammus of the hardened juice extracted from this tree.

Tame Cat (A). A harmless danger after a married woman: a cavalier servant; a cicadae.

"He soon installed himself as a tame cat in the MacAulay mansion."—Truth (Queen's Story) October, 1893.

Tamariana (3 syl.). A corruption of Timour Lenagh (Timour the Lame), one of the greatest warrio Kings that ever lived. Under him Persia became a province of Tartary. He modestly called himself Apras (chief), instead of sultan or shah. (1380-1405.)

Taming of the Shrew. The plot was borrowed from a drama of the same title, published by S. Lacroft, of Charing Cross, under the title of Old Plays on which Shakespeare Founded his Comedies. The induction was borrowed from Heuterus' Remin Bingunian (Lib. iv.), a translation of which was published in 1607 by E. Grimstone, and called Admiraile and Memoriable Histories. Dr. Percy thinks that the ballad of The Frosthorne Duke, or the Turkey's Good Fortune, published in the Pepys Collection, may have suggested the induction. (See Syl.)

Tammamay (St.). Tammany was of the Delaware nation in the seventeenth century, and became a chief, whose rule was wise and pacific. He was chosen by the American democrats as their tuteary saint. His day is May 1st. Cooper calls him Tammenund, but the correct word is Tammend.

Tammany Ring. A cabal of power ful organisation of unprincipled officials, who enriched themselves by plundering the people. So called from Tammany Hall, the head-quarters of the high officials of the U.S., whose notorious practices were exposed in 1871.

Tammus. (See Tammax.)

Tancred (in Jerusalem Delivered) shows a generous contempt of danger. Son of Eudes and Emma (sister of Robert Guiscard). Bosoired or Boismond was his cousin. Tancred was the greatest of all the Christian warriors except Roland. His one fault was "women's love," and that woman Clorinda, a Pagan (bk. i.). He brought 800 horse from Tuscany and Campania to the allied Christian army. He slew Clorinda (not knowing her) in a night combat, and lamented her death with great lamentation (bk. xiii.). Being wounded, he was nursed by Erminia, who was in love with him (bk. xiv.).

Tandem. At length. A pun applied to two horses driven one before the other. This Latin is of a similar character to plenum sed (full butt).

Tandem D.O.M. Tandem Dee optimo marino. (Now at the end accordingly we praise to God, the best and greatest.)

Tangie. The water sprit of the Orkney's, from Danish tang (sea-weed), with which it is covered. The tangie sometimes appears in a human form, and sometimes as a little apple-green horse.

Tanist (A). One who held lands in Ireland under the Celtic law of tanistry. The chief of a sept. (Irish, tanaisi, now apparent to a chief.)

"Whoever stood highest in the estimation of the chief was nominated Tanist, or next chief.—L. Lawrence: Story of Ireland, chap vi.)

Tanist Stone. A monolith erected by the Celts at a coronation. We read in the Book of Judges (ix. 6) of Abimelech, that a "pillar was erected in Shechem" when he was made king, and (2 Kings xi. 14) it is said that a "pillar was raised when Josiah was made king, "as the manner was." The Lia Fail of Ireland was erected in Icolmkiel for the coronation of Fergus Errc. This stone was removed to Stone, and became the coronation chair of Scotland. It was taken to Westminster by Edward I., and is the coronation chair of our sovereigns. (Celtar, Tanist, the heir-apparent.)

Tankard of October (A). A tankard of the best and strongest ale, brewed in October.

He was in high favour with Sir Geoffrey; not merely on account of his sound orthodoxy and deep learning, but also for his excellent skill in playing at bowls and his frequent conversation over a pipe and tankard of October.—Sir W. Scott: Pencil of the Ear, chap iv.

Tanker. Sixpence. (The Italian danaro, small change, Gipsy, tanne, little one. Similarly a thaler is called a dollar.)

Tanker. A proper name. (See Brewer.)

Tanner of Tamworth. Edward IV. was hunting in Drayton Bassett when a tanner met him. The king asked him several questions, and the tanner, taking him for a highway robber, was very chary. At last they swapped horses; the tanner gave the king his gentle mare Brocke, which cost 4s., and the king gave the tanner his hunter, which soon threw him. Upon this the tanner paid dearly for changing back again. Edward now blew his horn, and when his courtiers came up in obedience to the summons, the tanner, in great alarm, cried out, “I hope I shall be hanged tomorrow” (i.e. I expect); but the king gave him the manor of Plumpton Park, with 300 marks a year. (Tennyson: Poems.)

Tannhäuser (3 syl.). A legendary hero of Germany, who wins the affections of Lisaura; but Lisaura, hearing that Sir Tannhäuser has set out for Venusberg to kiss the queen of love and beauty, deserts herself. After living some time in the cave-palace, Sir Tannhäuser obtains leave to visit the upper world, and goes to Pope Urban for absolution.

"No," said his holiness, "you can no more hope for mercy than this dry staff can be expected to bud again." On this the knight returned to Venusberg. In a few days the papal staff actually did bud, and Urban sent for Sir Tannhäuser, but the knight was nowhere to be found.

Tansy. A corruption of the Greek word athanasia, immortality, as thames, tansy. So called because it is "a sort of everlasting flower." (Horace, Epistles, vol. ii. p. 366.)

Tantalise. To excite a hope and disappoint it. (See next article.)

Tantálus (Latin, Tantalus), according to fable, is punished in the infernal regions by inconstant thirst. To make his punishment the more severe, he is plunged up to his chin in a river, but whenever he bends forward to slake his thirst the water flows from him.

"As beds fermented Tantalus to drink,
While from his lips the refusent waters shrink;
Again the rising stream his bosom wears,
And thirst consumes him in the same.

Cæsar in Bellum Gallicum."

Tantálus. Emblematical of a covetous man, who the more he has the more he craves. (See Covetous.)

Tantálus. A parallel story exists among the Chipoyana, who inhabit the deserts which divide Canada from the United States. At death, they say, the soul is placed in a stone ferry-boat, till judgment has been passed on it. If the judgment is adverse, the boat sinks in the stream, leaving the victim chin-deep in water, where he suffers endless thirst, and makes fruitless attempts to escape to the islets of the Blessed. (Alexander Mackenzie: Voyages in the Interior of America.) (1769, 1792, 1793.)

Tannony (St. Anthony). In Norwych are the churches called Sin Teller's (St. Ethelrude's), Sin Tendmunder's (St. Edmund's), Sin Tander's (St. Andrew's), and Sin Tausin's (St. Austin's). (See Tawdrey.)

Tantum Ergo. The most popular of the Eucharistic hymns sung in the Roman Catholic churches at Benediction with the Holy Sacrament. So called from the first two words of the last stanzn but one of the hymn Pange Lingua.

Taoan. The sect of Reason, founded in China by Laou-Tze, a contemporary of Confucius. He was taken to heaven on a black buffalo. (A.D. 523.)

Tap the Admiral. To suck liquor from a cask by a straw. Hotten says it was first done with the rum-cask in which the body of Admiral Lord Nelson was brought to England, and when the cask arrived the admiral was found "high and dry."

Tap the Toll (To). To pilfer from a till.

Tap-up Sunday. The Sunday preceding the fair held on the 2nd October, on St. Catherine's Hill, near Guildford, and so called because any person, with or without a licence, may open a "tap," or sell beer on the hill for that one day.

Tapis. On the tapis. On the carpet; under consideration; now being ventilated. An English-French phrase, referring to the tapis or cloth with which the table of the council-chamber is covered, and on which are laid the motions before the House.

"My business comes now upon the tapis."—Farquhar: The Beaux Stratagem, I. i.

Tapisserie. Faire tapisserie. To play gooseberry-picker; to be mere chaperon for the sake of "propriety."

"Se dit des personnes qui avertent à un bal ou à quelque autre grande réunion sans y prendre part."

"You accepted out of pure kindness faire tapisserie; Mrs. Arblinton, you are too amiable."—Mrs. Edwards: A Girl's Woes, chap. xxvi.

Tappit-hen (A). A huge pewter measuring-pot, containing at least three English quarts. Readers of Waverley will remember (in chap. xli.) the Baron Bradwardine's tappit-hen of claret from Bordeaux. To have a tappit-hen under the belt is to have swallowed three quarts. of claret. A hen and chickens means large and small drinking mugs or pewter pots. A tarpit was served from the tap. (See JEREBBAN.)

"Wet she loed a Hawick gill.
And laught to see a tarpit hen."

Tarpeter, says E. Adams (English Language), properly means a bar-maid; "-ster" is the Anglo-Saxon feminine suffix -sēr, which remains in spinster (a female spinner).

This is only a half-truth. After the thirteenth century, the suffix -ster was used for an agent of either sex. We have barrister, garnister, penister, etc., and Wickliffe uses sonister for a male singer. (See Dr. Morris: English Dialects, p 29.)

Tapan, among the South Sea Islanders, means "devoted" in a religious sense. Thus, a temple is tapu, and he who violates a temple is tapu. Not only so, but everyone and everything connected with what is tapu becomes tapu also. Thus, Captain Cook was tapu because some of his sailors took rails from a "temple" of the Hawaiians to supply themselves with fuel, and, being devoted, he was slain. Our taboo is the same word.

Tarabulus or Tantrabulus. We shall live till we die, like Tarabulus (or Tantrabulus). Tarabulus, Ali Pacha, was grand vizier in 1698, and was strangled in 1699 by order of Mustapha II.

"We shall live till we die, like Tantrabulus, is said to be a Cornish proverb. There is a cognate saying, "Like Tantrabulus, who lived till he died.""

Tantarabobs means the devil. Noisily playful children are called Tantrabols.

Tarakee, the Brahmin, was the model of austere devotion. He lived 1,100 years, and spent each century in some astounding mortification. 1st century. He held up his arms and one foot towards heaven, fixing his eyes on the sun the whole time. 2nd century. He stood on tiptoe the whole time. 8th century. He stood on his head, with his feet towards the sky. 9th century. He rested wholly on the palm of one hand. 11th century. He hung from a tree with his head downwards.

"One century he lied wholly on water, another wholly on air, another stretched to the neck in earth, and for another century he was always enveloped in fire. I don't know that the world has been benefited by such devotion." —Maurier: History of Hindostan.

Tartanism. The dancing mania, extremely contagious. It broke out in Germany in 1794, and in France in the Great Revolution, when it was called the Carmagnole. Clergymen, judges, men and women, even the aged, joined the mad dance in the open streets till they fell from exhaustion.

Tarantula. This word is derived from Taranto the city, or from Thara the river in Apulia, in the vicinity of which the venomous hairy spiders abound. (Kircher: De Arte Mag.)

Tarentella or Tarantella. Tunes and dances in triplets, supposed to cure the dancing mania.

Tariff. A list in alphabetical order of the duties, drawbacks, bounties, etc., charged or allowed on exports and imports. The word is derived from Tarif, a seaport of Spain about twenty miles from Gibraltar, where the Moors, during the supremacy in Spain, levied contributions according to a certain scale on vessels entering the Mediterranean Sea. (French, tarif; Spanish, tarija.)

Tarpoons or Taras. Sailors: more frequently called Jack Tims. Tarpoons are tarred cloths used commonly on board ship to keep articles from the sea-spray, etc.

The more correct spelling is ta-pull, from pull, Latin pullum, a chick or cloth.

Tarpeian Rock. So called from Tarpeia, a vestal virgin, the daughter of Spurius Tarpeius, governor of the citadel on the Capitol Hill. Tarpeia agreed to open the gates to the Sabines if they would give her "what they wore on their arms" (meaning their bracelets). The Sabines, "keeping their promise to the ear," crushed her to death with their shields, and she was buried in that part of the hill called the Tarpeian Rock. Subsequently, traitors were cast down this rock and so killed.

"Blew him to the rock Twypan, and from the new into destruction cast him." —Shakespeare: Coriolanus, iii 1

Tarred. All tarred with the same brush. All alike to blame; all sheep of the same flock. The allusion is to the custom of distinguishing the sheep of any given flock by a common mark with a brush dipped in tar.

Tarring and Feathering. The first record of this punishment is in 1189 (1 Rich. I.). A statute was made that any robber voyaging with the crusaders "shall be first shaved, then boiling pitch shall be poured upon his head, and a cushion of feathers shook over it." The wretch was then to be put on shore at the very first place the ship came to. (Bymer: Federa, i 66.)
Tarrinzean Field. The bowling-green of Southwark. So called because it belonged to the Barons Hastings, who were Barons Tarrinzeau and Mauchline.

Tartan Field. A plaid is a long shawl or scarf—some twelve yards of narrow cloth wrapped round the waist, or over the chest and one shoulder, and reaching to the knees. It may be chequered or not; but the English use of the word in such a compound as Scotch-plaids, meaning chequered cloth, is a blunder for Scotch tartans. The tartan is the chequered pattern, every clan having its own tartan. A tartan-plaid is a Scotch scarf of a tartan or checked pattern.

Tartar, the deposit of wine, means "infernal stuff," being derived from the word Tartaros (q.v.). Paracelsus says, "It is so called because it produces oil, water, tincture, and salt, which burn the patient as the fires of Tartarus burn."

Tartaros (Greek), Tartarus (Latin). That part of the infernal regions where the wicked are punished. (Classic mythology.)

The word "Hell" occurs seventeen times in the English version of the New Testament. In seven of these the original Greek is "Gehenna," in nine "Hades," and in one instance it is "Tartaros" (2 Peter ii. 4) περαίας ζόφου ταρταρών, παράδοχαν. It is a very great pity that the three words are translated alike, especially as Gehenna and Hades are not synonymous, nor should either be confounded with Tartarus. The Anglo-Saxon verb hēl-an means to cover, hence hell = the grave or Hades.

Tartuffe (2 syl). The principal character of Molière's comedy so called. The original was the Abbé de Roquette, a parasite of the Prince de Condé. It is said that the name is from the Italian tartufoli (truffles), and was suggested to Molière on seeing the sudden animation which lighted up the faces of certain monks when they heard that a seller of truffles awaited their orders. Bickerstaff's play, The Hypocrite, is an English version of Tartuffe.

Tassel-Gentle. The tiercel is the male of the gooshawk. So called because it is a tiercel or third less than the female. This is true of all birds of prey. The tiercel-gentle was the class of hawk appropriate to princes. (See HAWK.)

"O for a falconer's voice
To lure this tassel-gentle back again!"—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

Tasselled Gentleman. A top; a man dressed in fine clothes. A corruption of Teruel-gentle by a double blunder: (1) Teruel, erroneously supposed to be tassel, and to refer to the tags and tassels worn by men on their dresses; and (2) gentle corrupted into gentlemen, according to the Irish expression of the verse, "The gentle shall inherit the earth."

Tatianist. The disciples of Tatian, who, after the death of Justin Martyr, "formed a new scheme of religion; for he advanced the notion of certain invisible mons, branded marriage with the name of fornication, and denied the salvation of Adam." (Irenæus: Adv. Heresæs (ed. Grabe), pp. 105, 106, 262.)

Two Tatians are almost always confounded as one person in Church history, although there was at least a century between them. The older Tatian was a Platonic philosopher, born in Syria, and converted to Christianity by Justin the Martyr. He was the author of a Discourse to the Greeks, became a Gnost.ic, and founded the sect of the Tatianists. The other Tatian was a native of Mesopotamia, lived in the fourth century, and wrote in very bad Greek a book called Diatassaron, supposed to be based on four Gospels, but what four is quite conjectural.

Tattardemark. A ragamuffin.

Tattoo. A beat on the drum at night to recall the soldiers to their barracks. It sounded at nine in summer and eight in winter. (French, tapoter or tapotez-tons.)

The devil's tattoo. Drumming with one's finger on the furniture, or with one's toe on the ground—a monotonous sound, which gives the listener the "blue devils."

Tattoo (To). To mark the skin, especially the face, with indelible pigments rubbed into small punctures. (Tahitian, tatu; from ta, mark.)

Tau. Marked with a tau, i.e. with a cross. Tartullian says, "Haec est litera Graecorum T, nostra antem T, species crucis." And Cyprian tells us that the sign of the cross on the forehead is the mark of salvation.

"This reward [Heb. ix. 4] is for those whose foreheads are marked with Tau."—Ep. Andreæ: Sermons (Luke xvii, 22).

Taurus (the Bull). Indicates to the Egyptians the time for ploughing the earth, which is done with oxen.

Mount Taurus, in Asia. In Judges xv. 3-19 we have an account of Samson
Tawdry and the jawbone, but probably Chamor (translated an ass) was the name of a hill or series of hills like Taurus, and should not have been translated. Similarly, Lehi (translated a jawbone) is probably a proper name also, and refers to a part of Chamor. If so, the meaning is, When he (Samson) came to Lehi, the summit of Mount Chamor, seeing a moist boulder, he broke off and rolled it on his feet. Down it bounded, crushing "heaps upon heaps" of the Philistines. Where the boulder was broken off a spring of water jetted out, and with this water Samson quenched his thirst.

What is now called the Mountain of St. Patrick was previously called "Mount Eagle"—in Irish, Cnoc an Uacht.

Tawdry. Showy, worthless finery; a corruption of St. Audrey. At the annual fair of St. Audrey, in the isle of Ely, showy lace called St. Audrey's lace was sold, and gave foundation to our word tawdry, which means anything gaudy, in bad taste, and of little value. (See TANTONY.)

"Tawdry. Astrumenta, liminum, an tascole, esquere mumbus et biriedre.—Remarques. Come, you punished me a tawdry lace and a pair of sweet gloves. — Winter's Tale, ii, 4

Tawny (The). Alexandre Bonvici/no the historian, called Il Morveto. (1514-1564)

Taylor, called The Water-Poet, who confesses he never learnt so much as the accident. He wrote fourscore books, and afterwards opened an alehouse in Long Acre. (1550-1604)

"Taylor, their better Charon, leads an ear, Once swan of Thames, though now he sings no more." Dunciad, iii

Taylor's Institute. The Fitzwilliam Museum of Oxford. So called from Sir Robert Taylor, who made large bequests towards its erection. (1714-1788)

Tchih. The military system adopted in the municipal and masonic regiments of Russia.

"Peter the Great established what we have in Russia; the tchih, that is to say, he applied the military system to the general administration of the empire" — De Caxton : Hieron, chap vii.

Tchow Dynasty. The third imperial dynasty of China, which gave four kings, and lasted 606 years (A.D. 1127-206). It was so called from the head of government.

Te Deum, etc., is usually ascribed to St. Ambrose, but is probably of a much later date. It is said that St. Ambrose improvised this hymn while Bishoping St. Augustine. In allusion to this tradition, it is sometimes called "the Ambrosian Hymn."

Te Deum (of ecclesiastical architecture) is a "theological series" of carved figures in niches: (1) of angels, (2) of patriarchs and prophets, (3) of apostles and evangelists, (4) of saints and martyrs, (5) of founders. In the restored west front of Salisbury cathedral there is a "Te Deum," but the whole 123 original figures have been reduced in number.

Te Ignitur. One of the service-books of the Roman Catholic Church, used by bishops and other dignitaries. So called from the first words of the canon, "Te ignitur, clementissime Pater.

Oaths upon the Te Ignitur. Oaths sworn on the Te Ignitur service-book, regarded as especially solemn.

Teague. An Irishman, about equal to Pat or Paddy. Sometimes we find the word Teague-lander. Teague is an Irish servant in Farquhar's Twain Rituals; in act iii. 2 we find the phrase "a downright Teague," meaning a regular Irish character—blundering, witty, fond of whisky, and lazy. The name is also introduced in Shadwell's play, The Lancashire Witches, and Teague o'Divelly, the Irish Priest (1688).

"Was he Carol, brother James, or Teague, That made thee break the Triple League?" Rochester: History of Insipid.

Teakettle Broth consists of hot water, bread, and a small lump of butter, with pepper and salt. The French soup mangre.

Tean or Telan Poet. Anacon, who was born at Teos, in I'onia. (B.C. 563-478)

Teanlay Night. The vigil of All Souls, or last evening of October, when bonfires were lighted and revels held for succouring souls in purgatory.

Tear (to rhyme with "sneak"). To tear Christ's body. To use imprecations. The common oaths of mediaval times were by different parts of the Lord's body: hence the preachers used to talk of "tearing God's body by imprecations."

"Her other been so sweet and so damnable. That it is greatly for to have them aware. Our illustrious Lord's body they to-term." Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 1359.

Tear (to rhyme with "tear"). Tear and larmes. (Anglo-Saxon, teher; Gothic, tager; Greek, debrus; Latin, lacrims: French, larm's).
Tear Handkerchief. A handkerchief blessed by the priest and given, in the Tyrol, to a bride, to dry her tears. At death, this handkerchief is laid in her coffin over the face of the deceased.

Teaspoon (A). £3,000. (See Spoon.)

Teasle (Lady). A lively, innocent country maiden, married to Sir Peter, who is old enough to be her father. Planted in the hothed of London gaiety, she formed a liaison with Joseph Surface, but, being saved from disgrace, repented and reformed. (Sheridan: School for Scandal.) (See Towry.)

Teasle (Sir Peter). A man who had remained a bachelor till he had become old, when he married a girl from the country, who proved extravagant, fond of pleasure, selfish, and vain. Sir Peter was always gibing his wife for her inferior rank, teasing her about her manner of life, and yet secretly liking what she did, and feeling proud of her. (Sheridan: School for Scandal.)

Teck (A). A detective. Every suspicious man is a “teck” in the eyes of a thief. Of course, the word is a contraction of [de]tect[ive].

Teeth.
From the teeth outwards. Merely talk; without real significance.

“Much of the talk about General Gordon lately was only from the teeth outwards.”—The Daily News, 1885.

To set one’s teeth on edge. (See Edge.) He has cut his eye-teeth. He is “up to snuff;” he has “his weather-eye open.” The eye-teeth are cut late—

First set—5 to 8, the four central incisors.
6 7 8 9 10 lateral incisors.
11 12 anterior molars.
13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 the eye-teeth.

Second set—5 to 8, the anterior molars.
6 7 8 incisors.
9 10 incus.
11 12 13 14 15 16 17 18 19 20 eye-teeth.

In spite of his teeth. In opposition to his settled purpose or resolution. Holmstedt tells us of a Bristol Jew, who suffered a tooth to be drawn daily for seven days before he would submit to the extortion of King John. (See Jew’s Eye.)

“In despite of the teeth of all the army and nation.”—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, V. 4.

To cast into one’s teeth. To utter reproaches.

“All his faults observed
Set in a note-book, learned, and conned by rote.
To cast into my teeth.”

Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

The skin of his teeth. (See Skin.)

Teeth. The people of Ceylon and Malabar used to worship the teeth of elephants and monkeys. The Siamese once offered to a Portuguese 700,000 ducats to redeem a monkey’s tooth.

Wolf’s tooth. An amulet worn by children to charm away fear.

Teeth are Drawn (His). His power of doing mischief is taken from him.
The phrase comes from the table of The Lion in Love, who consented to have his teeth drawn and claws cut, in order that a fair damsel might marry him. When the teeth were drawn and claws cut off, the father of the maid fell on the lion and slew him.

Teeth of the Wind (In the). With the wind dead against us, with the wind blowing in or against our teeth.

“To strive with all the tempest in my teeth.”—Pope.

Testimonial. Those who sign the abstinence pledge are entered with O. P. (old pledge) after their name. Those who pledge themselves to abstain wholly from alcoholic drinks have a T (total) after their name. Hence, T = total abstainer.

The tale about Dick Turner, a plasterer or fish-hawker at Preston, in Lancashire, who stammered forth, “I’ll have nowt to do with the moderation botheration pledge; I’ll be rest down t—total, that or nowt,” is not to be relied on.

It is said that Turner’s tombstone contains the inscription. Beneath this stone are deposited the remains of Richard Turner, author of the word Testimonial as applied to abstinence from all intoxicating liquors, who departed this life on the 27th day of October, 1848, aged 30 years.

Testostotum (A). A working-man’s club in which all intoxicants are prohibited.

“You can generally depend upon getting your money’s worth if you go to a testostotum.”—Stephan Remarck, chap. v.

Teian Muse (The). Anacreon, a native of Teion, in Phaphigonia. (B.C. 663-478.)
Teinds. Tithes.

"Taking down from the window-seat that amusing folio (The Scotch Cobb upon Lustion), he opened it, as it instinctively, as the tenth title of Book Second, of Teinds or Tythes. "—St N.
Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xlv.

N.B. Those entitled to tithes were called in Scotland "teind-masters."

Telemann's. Supporters. (Greek, telamön.) Generally applied to figures of men used for supporters in architecture. (See Atlantes.)

Telegraph. Milking a telegram. A telegram is said to be "milked" when the message sent to a specific party is superscriptiously made use of by others.

"They receive their telegrams in cupola to avoid the risk of their being "milked" by rival Journaux."—The Times, August 14th, 1890.

Telemachus. The only son of Ulysses and Penelope. After the fall of Troy he went, under the guidance of Mentor, in quest of his father. He is the hero of Fénélon's prose epic called Telemachus.

Tell (William). The boldest of the Swiss mountaineers. The daughter of Leuthold having been insulted by an emissary of Albrecht Gessler, the enraged father killed the ruffian and fled. William Tell carried the assassin across the lake, and greatly incensed the tyrannical Governor. The people rising in rebellion, Gessler put to death Melch'tal, the patriarch of the district, and, placing the ducal cap of Austria on a pole, commanded the people to bow down before it in reverence. Tell refused to do so, whereupon Gessler imposed on him the task of shooting an apple from his little boy's head. Tell succeeded in this perilous trial of skill, but, letting fall a concealed arrow, was asked with what object he had secreted it. "To kill thee, O tyrant," he replied, "if I had failed in the task imposed on me." Gessler now ordered the bold mountaineer to be put in chains and carried across the lake to Küssnacht Castle "to be devoured alive by reptiles," but, being rescued by the people, he shot Gessler and liberated his country. (Rossini: Guiglielmo Tell, as opera.)

Telemus's monument at Altorf
(1892) has four reliefs on the pedestal:
(1) Tell shooting the apple; (2) Tell's leap from the boat; (3) Gessler's death;
and (4) Tell's death at Schachenbach.

William Tell. The story of William
Tell is told of several other persons:

(1) Egl, the brother of Wayland
Smith. One day King Nidung commanded him to shoot an apple off the head of his son. Egl took two arrows from his quiver, the straightest and sharpest he could find. When asked by the king why he took two arrows, the god-archer replied, as the Swiss peasant to Gessler. "To shoot thee, tyrant, with the second if the first one fails."
(2) Saxo Grammaticus tells nearly the same story respecting Toki; who killed Harald.
(3) Reginald Scott says, "Puncher shot a penny on his son's head, and made ready another arrow to have slain
the Duke Remgrave, who commanded it." (1584.)
(4) Similar tales are told of Adam Bell, Clym of the Clough, William of Cloudesle and Henry IV., Olaf and Eindrildi, etc.

Tellers of the Exchequer. A corrupption of taliers—i.e. tally-men, whose duty it was to compare the tallies, recieve money payable into the Exchequer, give receipts, and pay what was due according to the tallies. Abolished in the reign of William IV. The functionary of a bank who receives and pays bills, orders, and so on, is still called a "teller."

Temora. One of the principal poem-of Ossian, in eight books, so called from the royal residence of the kings of Connaught. Cairbar had usurped the throne, having killed Cormac, a distant relative of Fingal; and Fingal raised an army to dethrone the usurper. The poem begins from this point with an invitation from Cairbar to Oscar, son of Ossian, to a banquet. Oscar accepted the invitation, but during the feast a quarrel was vamped up, in which Cairbar and Oscar fell by each other's spears. When Fingal arrived a battle ensued, in which Fillan, son of Fingal, the Achilles of the Caledonian army, and Cathmor, brother of Cairbar, the bravest of the Irish army, were both slain. Victory crowned the army of Fingal, and Ferad-Artho, the rightful heir, was restored to the throne of Connaught.

Temper. To make trim. The Italians say, temperare la livra, to tune the lyre; temperare una penna, to mend a pen; temperare l'orziolo, to wind up the clock. In Latin, temperare calumnum is "to mend a pen." Metal well tempered is metal made trim or meet for its use, and if not so it is called ill-tempered.
When Otway says, "Woman, nature made thee to temper man," he means to make him trim, to soften his nature, to mend him.
Templars or Knights Templars.
Nine French knights bound themselves, at the beginning of the twelfth century, to protect pilgrims on their way to the Holy Land, and received the name of Templars, because their arms were kept in a building given to them for the purpose by the abbot of the convent called the Temple of Jerusalem. They used to call themselves the "Poor Soldiers of the Holy City." Their habit was a long white mantle, to which subsequently was added a red cross on the left shoulder. Their famous war-cry was "Baucaunt," from their banner, which was striped black and white, and charged with a red cross; the word Baucaunt is old French for a black and white horse.

Seat of the Knights Templars (two knights riding on one horse). The first Master of the Order and his friend were so poor that they had but one horse between them, a circumstance commemorated by the seal of the order. The order afterwards became wealthy and powerful.

Temple (London) was once the seat of the Knights Templars. (See above.)

Temple. The place under inspection, from the Latin verb tempor, to behold, to look at. It was the space marked out by the Roman augurs as the field of observation. When augurs made their observations they marked out a space within which the sign was to occur. Rather remarkable is it that the Greek theos and Latin deus are nouns from the verbs theo and teur, meaning the "presence" in this space marked out by the augurs.

Temple (A). A kind of stretcher, used by weavers for keeping Scotch carpeting at its proper breadth during weaving. The weaver's temple is a sort of wooden rule with teeth of a pothook form.

Temple Bar, called "the City Golgotha," because the heads of traitors, etc., were exposed there. (Removed 1878.)

Temple of Solomon. Timbs, in his Notable, p. 192, tells us that the treasure provided by David for this building exceeded 900 millions sterling (!). The building was only about 160 feet long and 105 wide. Taking the whole revenue of the British empire at 100 millions sterling annually, the sum stated by Timbs would exhaust nine years of the whole British revenue. The kingdom of David was not larger than Wales, and by no means populous.

Temple (Pagan) in many respects resembled Roman Catholic churches. There was first the vestibule, in which were the piscina with lustral water to sprinkle those who entered the edifice; then the nave (or nave), common to all comers; then the chancel (or aditus) from which the general public was excluded. In some of the temples there was also an apse, like our apse; and in some others there was a portico, which not unfaithfully was entered by steps or "degrees"; and, like churches, the Greek and Roman temples were consecrated by the pontif.

The most noted temples were that of Vulcan, in Egypt; of Jupiter Olympus, and of Apollo, in Delphi; of Diana, in Ephesus; the Capitol and the Pantheon of Rome; the Jewish temple built by Solomon, and that of Herod the Great.

Tempora Mutatur. (See Mutatur.)

Ten. Gothic, tai-hun (two hands); Old German, ze-hun, whence zehn, ten.

Ten Commandments (The). The following rhyme was written under the two tables of the commandments:

PHSVR Y PRFT MN
VR KP TSH PRCPTS TN.

The vowel ý supplies the key.

Ten Commandments (The). Scratching the face with the ten fingers of an angry woman; or a blow with the two fists of an angry man, in which the "ten commandments are summarised into two."

"I could I come near your beauty with my nails, I'd set my ten commandments in your face."—Shakespeare, Henry VI, 1, 3.

"I damn you to touch him, spreading abroad her long and muscullar fingers, garnished with claws, which a valiant mouth might have envied. I'll set my ten commandments on the face of the first hand that bares a finger on him."—Shelley, Wandering Jew, chap.

Tench is from the Latin tenuis, so called, says Aulus Gellius, because it is tenuis (tinted).

Tend in the Eyes. Dutch, "Temand naar de oogen te zien." The English equivalent is, "to wait on his nod" or beck.

"Her gentle eyes, like the Nereides,
So many kindles, tended her' the eyes."—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii, 2.

Tendon. (See Achilles.)

Tenglo. A river in Lapland on whose banks roses grow.

"I was surprised to see upon the banks of the river roses of as lovely a red as any that are in our own gardens."—R. de Moufierius.

of Marlborough and Prince Eugene over the French under Marshal Villars on September 11, 1709.

"Her course is tried

The Scottish Tenner. Sir David Wilkie (1785-1841).

Tener (adj.). A ten-pound note. A "fiver" is a five-pound note.

Tennis Bell of Fortune. Pertinax, the Roman emperor, was so called. He was first a seller of charcoal, then a schoolmaster, then a soldier, and lastly an emperor, but in three months he was deposed and murdered.

Tennyson (Alfred). Ballad of Arthurian Romance. His poems on the legends of King Arthur are—(1) The Coming of Arthur; (2) Geraint and Enid; (3) Merlin and Vivien; (4) Lancelot and Elaine; (5) The Holy Grail; (6) Pellaeus and Locrine; (7) Guinevere; (8) The Passing of Arthur. Also The Morte d'Arthur, Sir Galahad, The Lady of Shalott. (1810-1892.)

Tenpenny Nails. Very large nails, 1,000 of which would weigh 10 lbs. Four-penny nails are those which are much smaller, as 1,000 of them would weigh only 4 lbs.; two-penny nails, being half the size, 1,000 of them would weigh only 2 lbs. Then we come to the ounce nails, 1,000 weighing only 8, 12, or 16 ounces, the standard unit being always 1,000 nails. Penny is a corruption of pounder, pouner, punner, penny, as two penny nails, four-penny nails, ten-penny nails, etc., according to the weight of 1,000 of them.

Tenor. A subdivision of the chansons or poems of love and gallantry by the Troubadours. When the public jouste were over, the lady of the castle opened her "court of love," in which the combatants contended with harp and song.

Tent. Father of such as dwell in tents. Jabal. (Genesis iv. 20.)

Tent (Skhidhátris) would cover a whole army, and yet fold up into a parcel not too big for the pocket. (Arabian Nights.)

Tenterden. Tenterden steeple was the cause of Goodwin Sands. The reason alleged is not obvious; an apparent non-sequitur. Mr. More, being sent with a commission into Kent to ascertain the cause of the Goodwin Sands, called together the oldest inhabitants to ask their opinion. A very old man said, "I believe Tenterden steeple is the cause." This reason seemed ridiculous enough, but the fact is, the Bishop of Rochester applied the revenues for keeping clear the Sandwich haven to the building of Tenterden steeple. (See Goodwin Sands.)

Some say the stone collected for strengthening the wall was used for building the church tower.

Tenterhooks. I am on tenterhooks, or on tenter-hooks of great expectation. My curiosity is on the full stretch, I am most curious or anxious to hear the issue. Cloth, after being woven, is stretched or "tented" on hooks passed through the salvages. (Latin, teniit, stretched, hence "tent," canvas stretched.)

"He was not kept an instant on the tenter-hooks of suspicion longer than the appointed moment"—Sir W. W. Scott. Redgauntlet, chap. 211.

Tenth Legion (The), or the Submerged Tenth. The lowest of the proletarian class. A phrase much popularized in the last quarter of the nineteenth century by "General" Booth's book, In Darkest England. (See Submerged.)

Tenth Wave. It is said that every tenth wave is the biggest. (See Wave.)

"As length, running from the Baltic coast, the victorious tenth wave shall ride, like the bare, o'er all the sea"—Burke.

Tercel. The male hawk. So called because it is one-third smaller than the female. (French, tiers.)

Terence. The Terence of England, the wonder of hearts, is the exquisite compliment which Goldsmith, in his Retaliation, pays to Richard Cumberland, author of The Jew, The Wrat Indian, The Wheel of Fortune, etc. (1722-1811.)

Teresa (St.). The reformer of the Carmelites, canonised by Gregory XV. in 1621. (1615-1682.) (See Sancho Panza.)

Term Time, called, since 1873, Law Sessions.

Michaelmas Sessions begin November 2nd, and end December 31st.

Hilary Sessions begin January 11th, and end the Wednesday before Easter.

Easter Sessions begin the Tuesday after Easter-week, and end the Friday before Whitsunday.

Trinity Sessions begin the Tuesday after Whit-sun-week, and end August 8th.

Term Time of our Universities. There are three terms at Cambridge in a year, and four at Oxford, but the two middle Oxford terms are two only in name, as they run on without a break. The three Cambridge terms are Lent, Easter, and Michaelmas. The four Terramagant. The author of Junius says this was a Saxon idol, and derives the word from tyr magan (very mighty); but perhaps it is the Persian tir-magian (Magian lord or deity). The early Crusaders, not very nice in their distinctions, called all Pagans Saracens, and muddled together Magianism and Mahometanism in wonderful confusion, so that Termağant was called the god of the Saracens, or the co-partner of Mahound. Hence Ariosto makes Ferrau "blaspheme his Mahound and Termağant" (Orlando Furioso, xii. 59); and in the legend of Sir Guy the Soudan or Sultan is made to say—

"So help me, Mahoune, of might,
And Termağant, my God so bright."

Termağant was at one time applied to men. Thus Massinger, in The Picture, says, "A hundred thousand Turks as sailed him, every one a Termağant [Pagan]." At present the word is applied to a boisterous, brawling woman. Thus Arbuthnot says, "The eldest daughter was a termağant, an impetuous profigate wretch." The change of sex arose from the custom of representing Termağant on the stage in Eastern robes, like those worn in Europe by females.

"Twas time to counterfeit, or that hot termağant Scot (Douglas) had paid me scot and lot too."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 4.

Outdoing Termağant (Hamlet, iii. 2). In the old play the degree of rant was the measure of villainy. Termağant and Herod, being considered the beau-ideal of all that is bad, were represented as settling everything with club law, and bowing so as to split the ears of the groundlings. Bully Bottom, having ranted to his heart's content, says, "That is Erdles' vein, a tyrant's vein.

(Termağant is properly Terp-sik-on-re, but often pronounced Terp-si-core). The goddess of dancing. Terpașichore, relating to dancing. Dancers are called "the votaries of Terpașichore."

Terra Firma. Dry land, in opposition to water; the continents as distinguished from islands. The Venetians so called the mainland of Italy under their sway; as, the Duchy of Venice, Venetian Lombardy, the March of Treviso, the Duchy of Friuli, and Istria. The continental parts of America belonging to Spain were also called by the same term.

Terrestrial Sun (That). Gold, which in alchemy was the metal corresponding to the sun, as silver did to the moon. (Sir Thomas Browne: Religion Medici, p. 149, 3.)

Terrible (The). Ivan IV. [or II.]: of Russia. (1529, 1533-1584.)

Terrier is a dog that "takes the earth," or unearths his prey. Dog Tray is merely an abbreviation of the same word. Terrier is also applied to the hole which foxes, badgers, rabbits, and so on, dig under ground to save themselves from the hunters. The dog called a terrier creeps into these holes like a ferret to rout out the victim. (Latin, terra, the earth.) Also a land-roll or description of estates.

There are short- and long-haired terriers.
(1) Short-haired: the black-and-tan, the schippeke, the bull-terrier, and the fox-terrier.
(2) Long-haired: the Bedlington, the Dandy Dinmont, and the Irish, Scotch, and Yorkshire terrier.

Terry Alts. Insurgents of Clare, who appeared after the Union, and committed numerous outrages. These rebels were similar to "the Thrashers" of Connaught, "the Carders," the followers of "Captain Rock" in 1822, and the Fenians (1869).

Ter'tium Quid. A third party which shall be nameless. The expression originated with Pythagóras, who, defining bipeds, said—

"Sunt bipes homin, et avis, et tertium quid."

"A man is a biped, so is a bird, and a third thing (which shall be nameless)."

Iamblichus says this third thing was Pythagóras himself. (Vita Pyth., cxxvii.)

In chemistry, when two substances chemically unite, the new substance is called a tertium quid, as a neutral salt produced by the mixture of an acid and alkali.

Terza Rima. A poem in triplets, in which the second or middle line rhymes with the first and third lines of the succeeding triplets. In the beginning of the poem lines 1 and 3 rhyme independently, and the poem must end with the first line of a new triplet. Dante's Divine Comedy is in this metre, and Byron has adopted it in The Prophecy of Dante. The scheme is as follows:

- in
- x 2 - x e l - d - (a new rhyme for 1b and 2b)
- 1b - boat
- 2b - chest
- 1c - sides
- 2c - place - (a new rhyme for 1d and 2d)
- 1d - asse
- 2d - lace
- 1e - place
- 2e - grace
- 1f - gate
- 2f - cake

Tessarian Art. The art of gambling. (Latin, tæsæra, a die)

Tester. A surname. Called teston (testa, a head) because it was stamped on one side with the head of the reigning sovereign. Similarly, the head canopy of a bed was called its tester (Italian, testa, French, teste, tête). Copstuck in Dutch means the same thing. Worth 12d in the reign of Henry VIII, but 6d in the reign of Elizabeth.

Hold there a tester for the - whole peace

Henry VIII.

Testers are gone to Oxford, to study at Brasenose. When Henry VIII desired the silver testers, the alloy broke out in red pimples through the silver, giving the royal likeness in the con a bitchy appearance, hence the punning proverb

Tête-à-tête. A confidential conversation.

Tête Botée [Booted Head]. The nickname of Philippe des Commes

"You, Sir Philip des Commes were in a hunt ing-match with the duke, your master and when he sighted after the chase, he required you to sit down in turn, and rendered you the same office — but no sooner had he plucked out of your boots off than he brutally beat it about your head and his privileged friend Leet de Deuk gave you the name of Tête Botée — Sir W. Scott Quadern Durward chap xxx"

Tête du Pont. The barbacan or watch tower placed on the head of a drawbridge

Tether. He has come to the end of his tether. He has outrun his fortune, he has exhausted all his resources. The reference is to a cable run out to the bitter end (see Bitter End), or to the lines upon lines in whale fishing. If the whale runs out all the lines it gets away and is lost.

Horace calls the end of life "ultima resursum," the end of the goal, referring to the white chalk mark at the end of a racecourse.

Tethyn. The sea, properly the wife of Oceanus.

The golden sun above the watery bed
Of happy Tethyn raised his heavenly head.

Tetragrammaton. The four letters, meaning the four which compose the name of Deity. The ancient Jews never pronounced the word Jehovah composed of the four sacred letters JHVH. The word means "I am," or "I exist" (Exod. 14:1); but Rabbi Bechay says the letters include the three times—past, present, and future. P. Schleiermacher called Deity a Tetraktys or Tetractys, meaning the "four sacred letters."

"Such was the sacred Tetragrammaton / It was worth a thousand worlds to be revealed."

Dviden Britannia Rediviva [We have the Egyptian Θεός, like the Greek Θεός.]

Tetrapia. The Bible, disposed by Oigen under four columns, each of which contained a different Greek version. The versions were those of Aquila, Symmachus, Theodosian, and the Septuagint.

Tenuor. Brother of Ajax the Greater, who went with the allied Greeks to the siege of Troy. On his return home, his father banished him the kingdom for not avenging on Ulysses the death of his brother (Hom. Iliad.)

Teutonia. Thua-th-duné (north men) Our word Dutch and the German Deutsch are variations of the same word, originally written Theodisc.

Teutonic Knights. An order which the Crusaders gave birth to. Originally only Germans of noble birth were admissible to the order. (Abolished by Napoleon in 1800.)
Th (Θ, theta). — The sign given in the verdicth of the Areopagus of condemnation to death (Acts i. 17).

Thalatta. T (τῆλεως) meant absolution, and A = non liquet. In the Roman courts C meant condemnation, A absolution, and N L (non liquet) remanded.

Thales (3 syl.). An Athenian courteesman who induced Alexander, when excited with wine, to set fire to the palace of the Persian kings at Persepolis.

"The king sent a flame to him in his wrath; Thales led the way to light him to his pray. And, like another Helen,ired another Troy."—Byron. Alexander's Feast.

Thalasa. The Destroyer, son of Hodeirah and Zef'rab (Ζεφράβα); hero of a poem of Southey, in twelve books.

Thalia. — (See Seven Sages.)

Thalestris. Queen of the Amazons, who went with 300 women to meet Alexander the Great, under the hope of raising a race of Alexanders.

"This was no Thalestris from the fields, but a quiet domestic character from the seaside."—C. J. N. C., p. 246.

Thalia. One of the muses, generally regarded as the patroness of comedy. She was supposed by some, also, to preside over husbandry and planting, and is represented leaning on a column holding a mask in her right hand, etc.

Thames (1 syl.). The LatinThamnes (the broad Issus, where Issus is a mere variation of an, outer, nassy, etc., meaning water). The river Churn unites with the Thames at Cricklade, in Wiltshire, where it was at one time indifferently called the Thames, Issus, or Thamnes. Thus, in the Saxon Chronicle we are told the East Angles "overran all the land of Mercia till they came to Cricklade, where they forded the Thanes." In Camden's Britannia mention is made of Summerford, in Wiltshire, on the east bank of the "Issus" (eius vocabulium Tema juxta vadum, quin appellatur Summerford). Canute also forded the Thames in 1016 in Wiltshire. Hence Thames is not a compound of the two rivers Thame and Issis at their junction, but of Thamensis. Tham is a variety of the Latin annis, seen in such words as Northampton, Southampton, Tamworth, etc. Pope perpetuates the notion that Thames = Thame and Issis in the lines—

"Around his throne the sea-born brothers stood; Fast the famed authors of his sacred name, The wondrous Issis and the fruitful Thame! The covered shore, with verdant alders crowned; The Loddon slow, with verdant alders crowned; Cole, whose dark streams his flowery islands love; And chalky Wey that rolls a milky wave; The blue transparent Vandsel his hard; The gushy Lee his sodgy, tresses vary; And sulen Nole that hides his diving flood; And silent Darent stained with Danish blood."—Pope. Windsor Forest.

"He'll never set the Thanes on fire. He'll never make any figure in the world; never plant his footsteps on the sands of time. The popular explanation is that the word Thanes is a pun on the word tames, a corn-sieve; and that the parallel French locution He will never set the Scene on fire is a pun on moureuse, a drag-net; but these solutions are not tenable.

There is a Latin saw, "Tiberii ascendere nequaquam potest," which is probably the fons et origo of other parallel sayings. Then, long before our proverb, we had "To set the Rhine on fire" (Dent Rhein anzünden), 1630, and Er hat den Rhein und das Meer ausgezündet, 1580.

"There are numerous similar phrases as "He will never set the Saffee on fire," ' to set the Trent on fire,' ' to set the Humber on fire,' etc. Of course it is possible to set water on fire but the scope of the proverb is the other way, and it may take its place beside such sayings as "If the sky falls we may catch larks."

Thamus. The Syran and Phoeniciuan name of Adonis. His death happened on the banks of the river Adonis, and in summer-time the waters always become reddened with the huntei's blood. (See Ezekiel viii. 1.)

"Thamus came next behind Whose annual wound on Lycabettus burned, The burn datum to lands at his fate,"

In amorous duties all a summer's day,

While smooth Adonis from his native rock Ran purple to the sea, apparent with blood

Of Thamus' daily wounded."

—Milton. Paradise Lost, i. 446-452.

Thamyris. A Thracian bard mentioned by Homer (Iliad, ii. 553). He challenged the Muses to a trial of skill, and, being overcome in the contest, was deprived of them by his sight and power of song. He is represented with a broken lyre in his hand.

"Blind Thamyris and blind Meon'thas [Homer], And Thoeris and Phineus, prophete old."

"Tiresias" pronounce Ty-re-sis;

"Phineus" pronounce Phine-see.

That. Seven "thats" may follow each other, and make sense.

"For he it known that we may safely write Or say that 'that that' that man wrote was right.

Nay, even that that that, that 'that that' has followed.

Through seven repeats, the grammar's rule has bumbled.

And that that that that 'that that' began."

Repeated seven times is right, den't who can"

"My lord the gentleman's assurance that a say is this 'That that that' that that gentleman has advanced is put that that he should have proved to your lordships." — Spectator, No. 54
That's the Ticket

That's the Ticket. That's the right thing to do; generally supposed to be a corruption of "That's the etiquette," or proper mode of procedure, according to the programme; but the expanded phrase "That's the ticket for soup" seems to allude to the custom of showing a ticket in order to obtain a basin of soup given in charity.

That's the Ticket. A straw hat. A hat being called a tile, and the word being mistaken for a roof-tile, gave rise to several synonyms, such as roof, roofing, thatch, etc.

Thaumaturgus. A miracle worker; applied to saints and others who are reputed to have performed miracles. (Greek, thauma a gon.)

Praxe Alexander of Hohenlohe, whose power was looked upon as miraculous.

Apollosaus of Tyre, Cappadocia (A.D. 3-96). (See his Life, by Philostratus.)

St. Bernard of Clervaux, called "the Thaumaturgus of the West." (1091-1153.)

St. Francis d'Assisi, founder of the Franciscan order. (1182-1226.)

J. Joseph de Brat, of the Tyrol, who, looking on disease as a possession, exorcised the sick, and his cures were considered miraculous. (1277-1779.)

Gregory, Bishop of Neo-Caesarea, in Cappadocia, called emphatically "the Thaumaturgus," from the numerous miracles he is reported to have performed. (212-270.)

St. Isidore. (See his Life, by Damascius.)

Jannes and Jambres, the magicians of Pharaoh who withstood Moses.

Blaes Pascal. (1623-1662.)

Ptolemy, and several other Alexandrine philosophers. (285-270.) (See the Life of Ptolemy, by Porphyry.)

Proclus. (416-485.) (See his Life, by Marinus.)

Simon Magus, of Samaria, called "the Great Power of God." (Acts viii. 10.)

Several of the Sophists. (See Lives of the Philosophers, by Eunapius.)

Synnora possessed the omniscient power of seeing all that was done in every part of the globe. (Eunapius: Eunapius."

Vincenzo de Paul, founder of the "Sisters of Charity." (1576-1660.)

Peter Schott has published a treatise on natural magic called Thaumaturgus Physeorum. (See below.)

Thaumaturgus. Filumena is called Thaumaturga, a saint unknown till 1803, when a grave was discovered with this inscription on tiles: "DEUXHA PAXM CYMM, which, being rearranged, makes Pax tecum Filumena. Filumena was at once accepted as a saint, and so many wonders were worked by "her" that she has been called Le Thaumaturge du Dixième Siecle.

Theagenses and Charicles. The hero and heroine of an erotic romance in Greek by Hahodo'mus, Bishop of Thylakia (fourth century).

Theban Bard or Eagle. Pindar, born at Thebes. (B.C. 518-436.)

Theban Legion. The legion raised in the Thebaid of Egypt, and composed of Christian soldiers, led by St. Mauritius. This legion is sometimes called "the Thundering Legion" (q.v.).

Thebes (I syl.), called The Hundred-Gated, was not Thebes of Boeotia, but of Thebes of Egypt, which extended over twenty-three miles of land. Homer says out of each gate, the Thebans could send forth 200 war-chariots. (Egyptian, Taor or Taouw, city of the sun.)

The word great empress on the Egyptian plain. That vastes her conquests o'er a thousand states.

And poni in her heroes through a hundred gates. Two hundred horsemen and two hundred guides from each wide port of issuing to the war. (Pope Had.)

Thecla (St.), styled in Greek martyrologies the proto-martyress, as St. Stephen is the proto-martyr. All that is known of her is from a book called the Penate, or Acts of Paul and Thecla, pronounced apocryphal by Pope Gelasian, and unhappily lost. According to the legend, Thecla was born of a noble family in Ico'num, and was converted by the preaching of St. Paul.

Theist, Deist, Atheist, Agramont. A theist believes there is a God who made and governs all creation; but does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, nor in a divine revelation.

A deist believes there is a God who created all things, but does not believe in His superintendence and government. He thinks the Creator implanted in all things certain immutable laws, called the Laws of Nature, which set per se, as a watch acts without the supervision of its maker. Lake the theist, he does not believe in the doctrine of the Trinity, nor in a divine revelation.

The atheist disbelieves even the existence of a God. He thinks matter is external, and what we call "creation" is the result of natural laws.

The agnostic believes only what is knowable. He rejects revelation and the doctrines of the Trinity as "past human understanding." He is neither Chrestian, deist, nor atheist, as all these are past understanding.

Thelasius Act. The 39th and 40th George III, cap 98. An Act to prevent testators from leaving their property to accumulate for more than twenty-one years. So called because it was passed in reference to the last will and testament of the late Mr Thelasius, in which he desired his property to be invested till it had accumulated to some nineteen millions sterling.

The not. An old shepherd who relates to Cuddy the fable of The Oak and the Brier, with the view of curing him of his vanity (Spenzer Shepherd's Calendar).

Theocratus. The Scottish Theocratus Allan Ramsay, author of The Gentle Shepherd (1865-1758).

Theod'omas. A famous trumpeter at the siege of Thebes.

At every trumpet the sound menadoned, That roused the great Josh for to strike. No he Theod'mas was half so there.

At Thebes when the city was in doubt,
Chacek Coun't and Cild late a.

Theodora (in Orianda Futado), sister of Constantine, the Greek Emperor. Greatly enraged against Roger, who slew her son, she vowed vengeance. Rogero, captured during sleep, being committed to her hands, she cast him into a foul dungeon, and fed him on the bread of affliction till Prince Leon released him.

Theod'rick. One of the heroes of the Nibbing, a legend of the Sigges. This king of the Goths was also selected as the centre of a set of champions by the German minnesangers (nunswahl), but he is called by these romancers Didierick of Ben (Ves'ton).

Thes'm's Teeth. The bite of an ill-natured or carping critic. "Bene Thes'mus crumna,d, to be musly apserfed (Horne Epistles, i. 18, 62) Thes'm was a carping grammarian of Rome.

Theosophy (the society was founded in November, 1875). It means divine wisdom, the "wisdom religion," the "hidden wisdom." It is borrowed from Ammonius Saccus of the third century A.D. Theosophists tell us there has ever been a body of knowledge, teaching the universe, known to certain sages, and communicated by them in doles, as the world was able to bear the secrets. Certainly Esdras supports this hypothesis. Of the two hundred books Jehovah said —

"The first that thou hast written publish openly, that the wise men of all the world may read it. But keep the seventy last that thou mayst deliver them only to such as are wise among the people for in them is wisdom and the stream of knowledge." — Esdras xiv 45-47.

At my first approach to the Wisdom Religion I rather suspected the necessity of having to master the profusion of technical terms which Madame Blavatsky very freely alluded about her Agni to the sly such as Buddha, Bhagavat, Atma Ma'am, Sanaah, etc. — "I googled"

Therapeutes. The Therapeutes of Philo were a branch of the Essenes. The word Essenes is Greek, and means "doctors" (esueto), and Therapeut is merely a synonym of the same word.

Theera. Daughter of the Count Palatine of Padula, beloved by Mazepa. The count, her father, was very ingurtant that a mere page should presume to fall in love with his daughter, and had Mazepa bound to a wild horse and set adrift. As for Theressa, Mazepa never knew her future history. Theressa was historically not the daughter, but the young wife, of the fiery count (Byron Mazepa).

Thermid's rians. Those who took part in the con d'état which effected the fall of Robespierre, with the desire of restoring the legitimate monarchy. So called because the Reign of Terror was brought to an end on the ninth Thermidor of the second Republican year (July 27th, 1794). Thermidor or "Hot Month" was from July 16th to August 15th (Dural Bouvet's Thermidors).

Thers' tas. A deformed, scurrilous officer in the Greek army which went to the succ of Troy. He was always railing at the chief, and one day Achilles fell him to the earth with his fist and killed him (Homor Iliad).

He squinted, halted all hours was a child
And jinched before an man his tapering head Grew up only of the sun to down
Limbs falters his feet hit 22.

The miserly who abode him country near Cupes a Foundation book it

A Therm's. A dastardly, malevolent, impudent raile against the powers that be (See above).

Thessseus (3 syl.) Lord and governor of Athens, called by Chaucer Duke Thes'seus. He married Hippolytia, and as he returned home with his bride, and Emilly her sister, was accosted by a crowd of female suppliants, who complained of Creon, King of Thebes. The Duke forthwith set out for Thebes, slew Creon, and took the city by assault. Many captives fell into his hands, amongst whom were the two knights named Palamon and Arcite (q.v.). (Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.)

The Christian Theseeus. Roland the Paladin.

Thes'pis, Thespian. Dramatic. Thespis was the father of Greek tragedy.

> "The race of learned men,
> ... oft they snatch the pen,
> As it inspired, and in a Thespian rage,
> Then write."
> Theocritus: Cast of Indolence. p. 52.

> "Thespis, the first professor of our art.
> As country wails sang ballads from a curt" > Dryden: Prologue to Sophonisba.

Thessalian. Deceitful, fraudulent; hence θεσσαλός = deceit or fraud. θεσσαλόν εσφράλμα = double dealing, referring to the double-dealing of the Thessalians with their confederates, a notable instance of which occurred in the Peloponnesian War, when, in the very midst of the battle, they turned sides, deserting the Athenians and going over to the Lacedaemonians. The Lociians had a similar bad name, whereas Αρκαδικά εσφράλμα; but of all people, the Spartans were most noted for treachery.

Thes'tylias. Any rustic maiden. In the Idylls of Theocritus, Thesylia is a young female slave.

> "And there haste her bower she leaves,
> With Thesylus to bind the sheaves."
> Milton: L’Allegro.

Thick. Through thick and thin (Dryden). Through evil and through good report; through soggy mud and stones only thinly covered with dust.

> "Through perils both of wind and land
> She followed him through thick and thin."
> Butler: Hudibras.

> "Thick and thin blocks" are pulley-blocks with two sheaves of different thickness, to accommodate different sizes of ropes.

Thin-skinned. Not sensitive; not irritated by rebukes and slanders. Thin-skinned, on the contrary, means impatient of reproof or censure; their skin is so thin it annoys them to be touched.

Thin. (See ARTYLOXUS, CAUCUS, etc.)

Thieves’ Latin. Slang; dog, or dog’s Latin; gibberish.

> "What did actually reach his ears was disguised so completely by the use of cant words and the thieves' Latin, called slang, that he could not make sense of the conversation." — Sir W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xiii.

> "It is as easy to learn Greek and Hebrew as fast as I can learn’s Latin." — Sir W. Scott: Kenilworth, chap. xxi.

Thieves on the Cross, called Gesamas (the impudent) and Desmas (afterwards ‘St. Desmas,’ the penitent thief) in the ancient mysteries. Hence the following charm to scare away thieves:
> "Impropibus meritus pennent tra corpora ruas
> Desmas et Desmas, media est divina potestas;
> Alt s petit Desmas, infelix, infima, Gesamas;
> Nos et reas nostras conserva, summus potestas,
> Nos versus dictas me in turto tuas perdas."

Thimble. Scotch, Thumkle, originally "Thumb-bell," because it was worn on the thumb, as sailors still wear their thimbles. It is a Dutch invention, introduced into England in 1695 by John Lofting, who opened a thimble manufactory at Islington.

Thimble-rig. A cheat. The cheating game so called is played thus: A pea is put on a table, and the conjurer places three or four thimbles over it in succession, and then sets the thimbles on the table. You are asked to say under which thimble the pea is, but are sure to guess wrong, as the pea has been concealed under the man’s nail.

Thin-skinned. (See above, THICK-SKINNED.)

Thin Red Line (The). The old 93rd Highlanders were so described at the battle of Balaclava by Dr. W. H. Russell, because they did not take the trouble to form into square. "Balaclava" is one of the honour-names on their colours, and their regimental magazine is named The Thin Red Line.

Thin as a Whipping-post. As a lath; as a waffer. (See SKILES.)

> "I assure you that, for many weeks afterwards, I was as thin as a whipping-post." — Kingston: The Three Admiralts, chap. xi.

> "I wish we had something to eat," said Tom. "I shall grow as thin as a whipping-post, I suspect." — Kingston: The Three Admiralts, chap. xi.

Think about It (I’ll). A courteous refusal. When the sovereign declines to accept a bill, the words employed are Le roi (or la reine) s’avisera.

Thirteen Unlucky. The Turks so dislike the number that the word is almost expunged from their vocabulary. The Italians never use it in making up the numbers of their lotteries. In Paris no house bears the number, and persons, called Quartorziennes (q.v.), are reserved to make a fourteenth at dinner parties.

> "Jamais on ne devrait
> Be mettre a table tris de.
> Mal douce c’est parfuit."
> La Mascotte (an opera), i. 3.

Sitting down thirteen at dinner, in old Norse mythology, was deemed unlucky, because at a banquet in the Valhall, Thistles. A Babylonish maiden beloved by Piramus. They lived in contiguous houses, and as their parents would not let them marry, they contrived to converse together through a hole in the garden wall. On one occasion they agreed to meet at Ninnus' tomb, and Thise, who was first at the spot, hearing a lion roar, ran away in a fright, dropping her garment on the way. The lion seized the garment and tore it. When Piramus arrived and saw the garment, he concluded that a lion had eaten Thise, and he stabbed himself. Thise returning to the tomb, saw Piramus dead, and killed herself also. This story is travestied in the Midsummer Night's Dream, by Shakespeare.

Thistle (The). The species called Silybum Marianum, we are told, owes the white markings on its leaves to the milk of the Virgin Mary, some of which fell thereon and left a white mark behind. (See Christian Traditions.)

Thistles are said to be a cure for stitch in the side, especially the species called "Our Lady's Thistle." According to the Doctrine of Signatures, Nature has labelled every plant, and the prickles of the thistle tell us the plant is efficacious for prickles or stitches in the side. (See Turmeric.)

Thistle Beds. Withoo, a Dutch artist, is famous for his homely pictures where thistle-beds abound.

Thistle of Scotland. The Danes thought it cowardly to attack an enemy by night, but on one occasion deviated from their rule. On they crept, bare-footed, noiselessly, and unobserved, when one of the men set his foot on a thistle, which made him cry out. The alarm was given, the Scotch fell upon the night-party, and defeated them with terrible slaughter. Ever since the thistle has been adopted as the insignia of Scotland, with the motto "Nemo me impune lacessit." This tradition reminds us of Brennus and the greece. (See also STARS AND STRIPES.)

Thistle. The device of the Scotch monarchs was adopted by Queen Anne; hence the riddle in Pope's pastoral proposed by Daphnis to Strephon:

"Tell me ... in what more happy fields
The thistle springs, to which the lily yields?"

Pope: Spring.

In the reign of Anne the Duke of Marlborough made the "lily" of France yield to the thistle of Queen Anne. The lines are a parody of Virgil's Eclogue, iii. 104-108.

Thistles. Throwing the thistles about. A thistle is an Irish shilling, which, prior to 1825, was worth 13 pence, and many years after that date, although reduced to the English standard, went by the name of "thistles." When Members of Parliament were chaired after their election, it was by no means unusual to carry a bag or two of "thistles," and scatter the money amongst the crowd.

Thirteenpence-halfpenny. A hangman. So called because threepence-halfpenny was at one time his wages for hanging a man. (See Hangman.)

Thirty. A man at thirty must be either a fool or a physician. (Tiberius.)

Thirty Tyrants. The thirty magistrates appointed by Sparta over Athens, at the termination of the Peloponnesian war. This "reign of terror," after one year's continuance, was overthrown by Thrasybulos (B.C. 403).

The Thirty Tyrants of the Roman empire. So those military usurpers are called who endeavoured, in the reigns of Valerian and Gallienus (233-268), to make themselves independent princes. The number thirty must be taken with great latitude, as only nineteen are given, and their resemblance to the thirty tyrants of Athens is extremely fanciful. They were:

In the East.
(1) Oryx'addis.
(2) Macri'nus.
(3) Balista.
(4) Odom'zua.
(5) Zeno'bela.

In the West.
(6) Post'humus.
(7) Lolli'nus.
(8) Victor'ius and his mother Victoria.
(9) Mar'ictus.
(10) Tevri'cius.

Thirty Years' War. A series of wars between the Catholics and Protestants of Germany in the seventeenth century. It began in Bohemia in 1618, and ended in 1648 with the "peace of Westphalia."
Thomas (St.). Patron saint of architects. The tradition is that Gondoforus, king of the Indies, gave him a large sum of money to build a palace. St. Thomas spent it on the poor, "thus erecting a superb palace in heaven."

The symbol of St. Thomas is a builder’s square, because he was the patron of masons and architects.

Christians of St. Thomas. In the southern parts of Malabar there were some 200,000 persons who called themselves "Christians of St. Thomas" when they discovered India. They had been 1,300 years under the jurisdiction of the patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their materene (archbishop). When Gama arrived the head of the Malabar Christians was Jacob, who styled himself "Metropolitan of India and China." In 1525 a stone was found near Sigamani with a cross on it, and containing a list of the materenes of India and China.

Sir Thomas. The dogmatical prating squire in Crabbe’s Borough (letter x.).

Thomas-a-Kempis. Thomas Hammelein of Kempen, an Augustinian, in the diocese of Cologne. (1380-1471.)

Thomas the Rhymor. Thomas Learmont, of Erclidoune, a Scotchman, in the reign of Alexander III., and contemporary with Wallace. He is also called Thomas of Erclidoune, Sir Walter Scott calls him the "Merlin of Scotland." He was magician, prophet, and poet, and is to return again to earth at some future time when Shrove Tuesday and Good Friday change places.

Care must be taken not to confound "Thomas the Rhymor" with Thomas Rymer, the historiographer and compiler of the Faderas.

Thomasing. In some rural districts the custom still prevails of "Thomasing," that is, of collecting small sums of money or obtaining drink from the employers of labour on the 21st of December—"St. Thomas’s Day." December 21st is still noted in London as that day when every one of the Common Council has to be either elected or re-elected, and the electors are wholly without restriction except as to age and sex. The aldermen and their officers are not elected on St. Thomas’s Day.

Thomasists. Followers of Thomas Aquinas, who denied the doctrine of the immaculate conception maintained by Duns Scotus.

Thomson (James), author of The Seasons and Castle of Indolence, in 1729 brought out the tragedy of Sophonisba, in which occurs the silly line: "O Sophonisba, Sophonisba, O!" which a wag in the pit parodied into "O Jimmy Thomson, Jimmy Thomson, O!" (1700-1748.)

Thone (1 syl.) or Thoma. Governor of a province of Egypt. His wife was Polydamnia. It is said by post-Homeric poets that Paris took Helen to this province, and that Polydamnia gave her a drug named nepenthes to make her forget her sorrows, and fill her with joy.

"Not that nepenthes which the wife of Thone in Egypt gave to tear-bitten Helen, Is of such power to sur ‘up joy to this."

Milton: Comus, 366-367.

Thopas (Sir). Native of Poperyng in Flanders; a capital sportsman, archer, wrestler, and runner. He resolved to marry no one but an "elf queen," and set out for fairy-land. On his way he met the three-headed giant Olifaunt, who challenged him to single combat. Sir Thopas got permission to go back for his armour, and promised to meet him next day. Here mine host interrupts the narrative as "intolerable nonsense," and the "rime" is left unfinished.

"An elf queen wo! I have, I wis, For in this world no woman is Worthy to be my mate."

Chaucer: Bins of Sir Thopas.

Thor. Son of Odin, and god of war.

His attendants were THIALFI, the swift runner, his belt was MEKGNGARDER or MEKGNGARD, which doubled his strength whenever he put it on.

His goats were CRACK, GRYND, CRASH, and CRASH.

His hammer or mace was MJOLNIR.

His palace was BLAIKINIR (Bright Space), where he received the warriors who had fallen in battle.

His realm was THORUVANG.

His wife was SIF (Love).

He is addressed as Asa Thor or Ring Thor (Winged Thor, i.e. Lightning). (Scandinavian mythology.)

The word enters into many names of places, etc., as Thorsby in Cumberland, Thunderhill in Surrey, Thor in Wiltshire, Torthorwald (i.e. "Hill of Thor-in-the-wood") in Dumfriesshire, Thursday, etc.

Thorn. The Conference of Thorn met October, 1645, at Thorn, in Prussia, to remove the difficulties which separate Christians into sects. It was convoked by Ladislas IV. of Poland, but no good result followed the conference.

Thorn in the Flesh (A). Something to mortify; a skeleton in the cupboard. The allusion is to a custom common amongst the ancient Pharisees, one class of which used to insert thorns in the borders of their gaberdines to prick their legs in walking and make them bleed. (See Pharisees.)

Thorns. Calvin (Admonitio de Reliquiis) gives a long list of places claiming to possess one or more of the thorns which composed the Saviour's crown. To his list may be added Glastonbury Abbey, where was also the spear of Longius or Longinus, and some of the Virgin's milk.

The thorns of Dauphiné will never prick unless they prick the first day. This proverb is applied to natural talent. If talent does not show itself early, it will never do so—the truth of which application is very doubtful indeed.

"Si espume non pleques quand nais,
A pene que pleques jamais!"

Proverb in Dauphiné.

Thorpe-man. Villagers. This very pretty Anglo-Saxon word is worth restoring. (Thorpe, Anglo-Saxon, a village.)

Thoth. The Hermes of Egyptian mythology. He is represented with the head of an ibis on a human body. He is the inventor of the arts and sciences, music and astronomy, speech and letters. The name means "Logos" or "the Word."

Though Lost to Sight, to Memory Dear. A writer in Harper's Magazine tells us that the author of this line was Ruthven Jenkyns, and that the poem, which consists of two stanzas each of eight lines, begins each stanza with "Sweetheart, good-bye," and ends with the line, "Though lost to sight, to memory dear." The poem was published in the Greeorrhich Magazine for Marines in 1701 or 1702.

Thousand. Everyone knows that a dozen may be either twelve or thirteen, a score either twenty or twenty-one, a hundred either one hundred or one hundred and twenty, and a thousand either one thousand or one thousand two hundred. The higher numbers are the old Teutonic computations. Hickes tells us that the Norwegians and Icelandic people have two sorts of decad, the lesser and the greater called "Tolfred." The lesser thousand = 10 x 100, but the greater thousand = 12 x 100. The word tolf, equal to tole, is our twelve. (Institutiones Grammaticae, p. 43.)

"Five score of men, money, or pines, Six score of all other things." Old Sow.

Thread. The thread of destiny—i.e. that on which destiny depends. The Greeks and Romans imagined that a grave maiden called Clotho spun from her distaff the destiny of man, and as she spun one of her sisters worked out the events which were in store, and Atropos cut the thread at the point when death was to occur.

A St. Thomas's thread. The tale is that St. Thomas planted Christianity in China, and then returned to Malabar. Here he saw a huge beam of timber floating on the sea near the coast, and the king endeavoured, by the force of men and elephants, to haul it ashore, but it would not stir. St. Thomas desired leave to build a church with it, and, his request being granted, he dragged it easily ashore with a piece of packthread. (Farina y Sousa.)

Chief of the Triple Thread. Chief Brahmin. Osorius tells us that the Brahmins wore a symbolical Tessera of three threads, reaching from the right shoulder to the left. Faria says that the religion of the Brahmins proceeded from fishermen, who left the charge of the temples to their successors on the condition of their wearing some threads of their nets in remembrance of their vocation; but Osorius maintains that the triple thread symbolises the Trinity.

"Terna filia ab huncero de sex parte in lutice singlum gerunt ut designant trium in natura divina matronam." (1 Peter iii. 8.) Precisely the same is said of Brahma. "A day of Brahma is as a thousand revolutions of the Yoogs, and his might extendeth also to a thousand more." (Krishna : Bhagavat Geeta.

Thraill. A slave; bondage; wittily derived from drill, in allusion to the custom of drilling the ear of a slave in token of servitude, a custom common to the Jews. (Deut. xv. 17.) Our Saxon forefathers used to Pierce at the church-door the ears of their bond-slaves. (Anglo-Saxon, thrael, slave or bondman.)

Threadneedle Street. A corruption of Thryddaman or Thryddenal Street, meaning third street from "Chepesye" to the great thoroughfare from London. Bridge to "Bushope Gate" (consisting of New Fysho Strete, Gracious Strete, and Bushope Gate Strete). (Anglo-Saxon, thryddo or thrydde, third.)

Another etymology is Thryng-needle (three-needle street), from the three needles which the Needlemaker's Company bore in their arms. It begins from Three

Three. Pythagoras calls three the perfect number, expressive of "beginning, middle, and end," wherefore he makes it a symbol of Deity. The word was supposed to be under the rule of three gods, viz. Jupiter (heaven), Neptune (sea), and Pluto (Hades). Jove is represented with three-forked lightning, Neptune with a trident, and Pluto with a three-headed dog. The Fates are three, the Furies three, the Graces three, the Harpies three, the Sibylline books three; the fountain from which Hylas drew water was presided over by three nymphs, and the Muses were three times three; the pythons sat on a tripod. Man is three-fold (body, soul, and spirit); the world is three-fold (earth, sea, and air); the enemies of man are three-fold (the world, the flesh, and the devil); the Christian graces are three-fold (Faith, Hope, and Charity); the kingdoms of Nature are three-fold (mineral, vegetable, and animal); the cardinal colours are three in number (red, yellow, and blue), etc. (See Nine, which is three times three.)

Three Estates of the Realm are the nobility, the clergy, and the commonalty. In the collect for Gunpowder Treason we thank God for "preserving (1st) the king, and (2nd) the three estates of the realm," from which it is quite evident that the sovereign is not one of the three estates, as nine persons out of ten suppose. These three estates are represented in the two Houses of Parliament. (See Fourth Estate.)

Three Cities. So the French call the three cities of Lorraine, Metz, and Verdun, each of which was at one time under the lordship of a bishop. They were united to the kingdom of France by Henry II. in 1552. Since the Franco-German war they have been attached to Germany.

Three Books in the Wind. Unsteady from over-drinking, as a ship when its sheets are in the wind. The sail of a ship is fastened at one of the bottom corners by a rope called a "tack;" the other corner is left more or less free as the rope called a "sheet" is disposed; if quite free, the sheet is said to be "in the wind," and the sail flaps and flutters without restraint. If all the three sails were so loosened, the ship would "reel and stagger like a drunken man."

Three Sheets (The). Three books, or parts of three books—one by Theodore of Mopsuestia, one by Theodore of Cyprus, and the third by Iba, Bishop of Edessa. These books were of a Nestorian bias on the subject of the incarnation and two natures of Christ. The Church took up the controversy warmly, and the dispute continued during the reign of Justinian and the popedom of Vigilius. In 563 the Three Chapters were condemned at the general council of Constantinople.

Three Sheel in the Wall (The), to which Macaulay alluded in his speech, September 26th, 1831, are three sheel or niches in a ruined mound in the borough of Old Sarum, which before the Reform sent two members to Parliament. Lord John Russell (March, 1831) referred to the same anomaly. (See Notes and Queries, March 14th, 1883, p. 213.)

Three bard. (Living up a). Living in a garret, which is got at by mounting to the third storey by a back staircase.

Three-quarters or ʒ. Rhyming slang for the neck. This certainly is a most ingenious perversion. "Three-quarters of a peck" rhymes with neck, so, in writing, an expert simply sets down ʒ. (See Chivy.)

Three R's (The). (See under R.)
Three-tailed Bashaw. (See Bashaw.)

Three Tuns. A fish ordinary in Billingsgate, famous as far back as the reign of Queen Anne.

Threshold. Properly the door-sill, but figuratively applied to the beginning of anything; as, the threshold of life (infancy), the threshold of an argument (the commencement), the threshold of the inquiry (the first part of the investigation). (Saxon, thorsaelf, door-wood; German, thorschwellen; Icelandic, throsaldur. From their comes our door.)

Thread-box. A money-box, in which thirfts or savings are put. (See Spendthrift.)

Throgmorton Street (London). So named from Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, head of the ancient Warwickshire family, and chief banker of England in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

Through-stone (A). A flat gravestone, a stone coffin or sarcophagus, also a bond stone which extends over the entire thickness of a wall. In architecture, called “Perpend” or “Perpend Stones” or “Throughs.” (French, Pierre parpainge.)

“Old he is not stirring yet, war is he were a through-stone.”—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (Introduction).

Throw. To throw the helve after the hatchet. (See Helve.)

Throw. Throw lots of dirt, and some will stick. Find plenty of fault, and some of it will be believed. In Latin, Fortiter calumniari, aliquid adhærebit.

Throw Up the Sponge (Tv). (See Sponge.)

“Hubert, Hubert, throw thine eye on you young bov.”—Shakespeare: King John, iii. 3.

Throwing an Old Shoe for Luck. (See under Shoe.)

“Now, for good luck case an old shoe after me.”—Haywood (1668-1756).

“Ay, with all my heart, there’s an old shoe after you.”—The Parson’s Wedding (Bodley, vol. i. p. 496).

Thrum. Weaver’s ends and fag-ends of carpet, used for common rags. (The word is common to many languages, as Icelandic, thraum; German, trumn; Dutch, drom; Greek, thrumma; all meaning “fag-ends” or “fragments.”)

“Come, sister, come, cut thread and thrum; Quail, crush, conclude, and quell.”—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream, v. 1

Thread and thrum. Everything, good and bad together.

Thrummy Cap. A sprite described in Northumberland fairy tales as a “queer-looking little auld man,” whose exploits are generally laid in the cellars of old castles.

Thug (a cheat). So a religious fraternity in India was called. Their patron goddess was Devi or Kâli, wife of Siva. The Thugs lived by plunder, to obtain which they never halted at violence or even murder. In some provinces they were called “stranglers” (phanisgara), in the Tamil tongue “noosers” (ari tulukar), in the Canarese “cat gut thieves” (tanti kalvar). They banded together in gangs mounted on horseback, assuming the appearance of merchants; some two or more of these gangs concerted to meet as if by accident at a given town. They then ascertained what rich merchants were about to journey, and either joined the party or lay in wait for it. This being arranged, the victim was duly caught with a lasso, plundered, and strangled. (Hindu, thaga, deceive.)

Thuggee (2 syl.). The system of secret assassination preached by Thugs; the practice of Thugs.

Thug or Tug (Norse). The mounds raised by the old Scandinavians where their courts were held. The word is met with in Iceland, in the Shetlands, and elsewhere in Scotland.

Thule (2 syl.). Called by Drayton Thuly. Pliny, Solinus, and Mela take it for Iceland. Pliny says, “It is an island in the Northern Ocean discovered by Pytheas, after sailing six days from the Órcades.” Others, like Camden, consider it to be Shetland, still called Thylens-el (isle of Thyle) by seamen, in which opinion they agree with Marinius, and the descriptions of Ptolemy and Tacitus. Bochart says it is a Syrian word, and that the Phoenician merchants who traded to the group called it Gesirat Thulë (isles of darkness). Its certain etymology is unknown; it may possibly be the Gothic Thuile, meaning the “most remote land,” and connected with the Greek teles (the end).

“Where the Northern Ocean, in vast whirls,..Boils round the naked melancholy isles”

Of Farthest Thule.”—Thomson: Autumn.
Thumb

Ultima Thule. The end of the world; the last extremity. Thule was the most northern point known to the ancient Romans.

"Tibi serviat Ultima Thule."—Steele: Essays, i. 30.

"Feshawar cantonment is the Ultima Thule of British India."—Nineteenth Century, Oct., 1893, p. 533.

Thumb. When a gladiator was vanquished it rested with the spectators to decide whether he should be slain or not. If they wished him to live, they shut up their thumbs in their fists (police compresso favor judicabatur); if to be slain, they turned out their thumbs. Adam, in his Roman Antiquities (p. 287), says, "if they wished him to be saved, they pressed down their thumbs; if to be slain, they turned up [held out] their thumbs." (Pliny, xxviii. 2; Juvenal, iii. 36; Horace: Epist., xviii. 66.)

? It is not correct to say, if they wished the man to live they held their thumbs downwars; if to be slain, they held their thumbs upwards. "Police compressio" means to hold their thumbs close.

"Where, influenced by the rabbit's bloody will, With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill." Dryden: Third Satire.

The pricking of my thumbs, something wicked this way comes. Another proverb says, "My little finger told me that." When your ears turn hot and red, it is to indicate that someone is speaking about you. When a sudden fit of "shivering" occurs, it is because someone is treading on the place which is to form your grave. When the eyes itch, it indicates the visit of a friend. When the nose itches, it shows that a present will shortly be received. When the bones ache, it prognosticates a coming storm. Plautus says, "Timo quidem rerum gesserim hic ita dorsi tonus gruit." (Miles Gloriosus.) All these and many similar superstitions rest on the notion that "coming events cast their shadows before," because our "angel," ever watchful, forewarns us that we may be prepared. Sudden pains and prickings are the warnings of evil on the road; sudden glows and pleasurable sensations are the couriers to tell us of joy close at hand. These superstitions are relics of demonology and witchcraft.

"In ancient Rome the augurs took special notice of the palpitation of the heart, the flickering of the eye, and the pricking of the thumb. In regard to the last, if the pricking was on the left hand it was considered a very bad sign, indicating mischief at hand.

Do you bite your thumb at me? Do you mean to insult me? The way of expressing defiance and contempt was by snapping the finger or putting the thumb in the mouth. Both these acts are termed a jee, whence our expression "Not worth a fig," "I don't care a fig for you." Decker, describing St. Paul's Walk, speaks of the biting of thumbs to begot quarelus. (See GLOVES.)

"I see contempt marching forth, giving me the sweep with his thumb in his mouth."—Wise Men's (1596).

"I will bite my thumb at them; which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

Every honest miller has a thumb of gold. Even an honest miller grows rich with what he prigs. Thus Chaucer says of his miller—

"We clove he stelle and tolle thries, And yet he had a thumb of gold, parle [was what is called an 'honest miller']."—Cantebury Tales: Prologue, 560.

Rule of thumb. Rough measure. Ladies often measure yard lengths by their thumb. Indeed the expression "sixteen nails make a yard" seems to point to the thumb-nail as a standard. Countrymen always measure by their thumb.

Tom Thumb. (See Tom.) Under one's thumb. Under the influence or power of the person named.

Thumb-nail Legacies. Legacies so small that they could be written on one's thumb-nail.

"Tis said, some men may make their wills On their thumb-nails, for aught they can bestow."—Pope: Essay: Lord B. and his Muses.

Thumb-locks or Thumb-screw. An instrument of torture largely used by the Inquisition. The torture was compressing the thumb between two bars of iron, made to approach each other by means of a screw. Principal Carstairs was the last person put to this torture in Britain; he suffered for half an hour at Holyrood, by order of the Scotch Privy Council, to wring from him a confession of the secrets of the Argyll and Monmouth parties.

Thunder. The giant who fell into the river and was killed, because Jack cut the ropes that suspended the drawbridge, and when the giant ventured to cross it the bridge fell in. (Jack the Giant Killer.)

Thunder (Sons of) [Boanerges]. James and John, the sons of Zebedee (Mark iii. 17). So called because they asked to be allowed to consume with lightning those who rejected the mission of Christ. (Luke ix. 64; Mark iii. 17).
Thunder and Lightning or Tor-nament. Stephen II. of Hungary (1100, 1114-1131).

Thunder of the Vatican. The anathemas and denunciations of the Pope, whose palace is the Vatican of Rome.

Properly speaking, the Vatican consists of the Papal palace, the court and garden of Belvedere, the library, and the museum, all on the right bank of the Tiber.

Thunderbolt of Italy. Gaston de
Foix, nephew of Louis XII. (1489-1512.)

Thunderbolts. Jupiter was depicted by the ancients as a man seated on a throne, holding a sceptre in his left hand and thunderbolts in his right. Modern science has proved there are no such things as thunderstones, though many tons of boulders (2 syl.), aëroliotes (3 syl.), meteors, or shooting stars (of stony or metallic substance) fall annually to our earth. These “air-stones,” however, have no connection with thunder and lightning.

"Be ready, gods, with all your thunderbolts;
Dash him to pieces!"
Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

Thunderer (The). A name applied to The Times newspaper, in allusion to an article by Captain Ed, Sterling, beginning thus:—

"We thundered forth the other day an article upon the subject of social and political reform."—
The Times.

Thundering Legion. Under cover of a thunderstorm which broke over them they successfully attacked the Marcomanni. (See Legion, Théban Legion.)

□: This is a mere legend of no historic value.
The legion was so called at least a century before the reign of Aurelius; probably because it bore on its shields or ensigns a representation of Jupiter Tonans.

Thunstone. The successor of King
Arthur. (Nursery Tale: Tom Thumb.)

Thursday. That is, Thor's day. In French, Jendii—i.e. Jove’s day.

Thursday. (See Black.)

When three Thursdays meet, Never (g.e.). In French, “Cela arrivera la semaine des trois jendii.” Mawundy Thursday. (See Maundy Thursday.)

Tibia. A composite emblem. Its primary meaning is purity and chastity —the foundation being of fine linen.
The gold band denotes supremacy. The first cap of dignity was adopted by Pope Damasus II. in 1048. The cap was surmounted with a coronet in 1295
by Boniface VIII. The second coronet was added in 1335 by Benedict XIII., to indicate the prerogatives of spiritual and temporal power combined in the Papacy.
The third coronet is indicative of the Trinity, but it is not known who first adopted it: some say Urban V., others
John XXII., John XXXIII., or Benedict XII.

"The symbol of my threelfold dignity, in heaven, upon earth, and in purgatory."— Pope Pius IX.
(1871.)

♀ The triple crown most likely was in imitation of that of the Jewish high prist.

"On his head was a white turban, and over this a second striped with dark blue. On his forehead he wore a plate of gold, on which the name of Jehovah was inscribed. And, being at once high priest and prince, this was connected with a triple crown on the temples and back of the head."—Eldad the Pilgrim, chap. 3.

Tib. St. Tib's Erve. Never. A corruption of St. Ubbe. There is no such saint in the calendar as St. Ubbe, and therefore her eye falls on the “Greek Kalends” (g.e.), neither before Christmas Day nor after it.

Tib and Tom. Tib is the ace of trumps, and Tom is the knave of trumps in the game of Glesk.

"That gamester needs must overcome,
That can play both Tib and Tom."
Rondolph: Hermafroditus, p. 640.

Tiber, called The Yellow Tiber, because it is discoloured with yellow mud.
"Verticibus rapidis, et multa flavus arena."
Virgil: Æneid, vi. 21.

Tibullus. The French Tibulle.
Evariste Dacré Desforges, Chevalier de
Parny (1753-1814).

Tiburc (3 syl.) or Tiburco (2 syl.).
Brother of Valrian, converted by the teaching of St. Cecilia, his sister-in-law, and baptised by Pope Urban. Being brought before Almachius the prefect, and commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, both the brothers refused, and were decapitated. (Chaucer: Sceonde Nones Tale.)

"All this thing sone unto Tiburco toled (3 syl.),
And after this Tiburco, in good entente (2 syl.),
With Valarian to Pope Urban wente."
Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 1270.

Tiburiius's Day. (St.). April 14th.
The cuckoo sings from St. Tiburiius's
Day (April 14th) to St. John's Day (June 24th).

This most certainly is not correct, as I have heard the cuckoo even in August; but without doubt July is the month of its migration generally.

The proverb says:

"July, prepare to fly; August, go he must."
♀ It is said that he migrates to Egypt.
Tick. To go on tick—on ticket. In the seventeenth century, ticket was the ordinary term for the written acknowledgment of a debt, and one living on credit was said to be living on tick. Betting was then, and still is to a great extent, a matter of ticket—i.e. entry of particulars in a betting-book. We have an Act of Parliament prohibiting the use of betting tickets: "Be it enacted, that if any person shall play at any of the said games... (otherwise than with and for ready money), or shall bet on the sides of such as shall play... a sum of money exceeding £100 at any one time... upon ticket or credit... he shall," etc. (16 Car. II. cap. 16.)

"If a servant usually buy for the master upon tick, and the servant buy some things without the master's order... the master is liable."—Chief Justice Holt (Blackstone, chap. xii. p. 483).

Ticket. That's the ticket or That's the ticket for soup. That's the right thing. The ticket to be shown in order to obtain something. Some think that the word "ticket" in this phrase is a corruption of etiquette.

"What's the ticket? What is the arrangement?"

"Well," said Bob Crouse, "what's the ticket, youngster? Are you to go aboard with us?"—Captain Mervat.

Ticket of Leave (A). A warrant given to convicts to have their liberty on condition of good behaviour.

Tickle the Public (7b). When an actor introduces some gag to make the audience laugh, "il chatonille le public." One of the most noted chatouilleurs was Odry, a French actor.

Tide-rode, in seaman phrase, means that the vessel at anchor is swung about by the force of the tide. Metaphorically, a person is tide-rode when circumstances over which he has no control are against him, especially a sudden glut in the market. Tide-rode, ridden at anchor with the head to the tide; wind-rode, with the head to the wind.

Tide-waiters. Those who vote against their opinions. S. G. O. (the Rev. Lord Osborne), of the Times, calls the clergy in Convocation whose votes do not agree with their convictions "ecclesiastical tide-waiters."

Tidy means in tide, in season, in time. We retain the word in even-tide, spring-tide, and so on. Tuerse has the phrase, "If the weather be fair and tidy," meaning seasonable. Things done punctually and in their proper season are sure to be done orderly, and what is orderly done is neat and well arranged. Hence we get the notion of methodical, neat, well-arranged, associated with tidy. (Danish, tidy, seasonable, favourable.)

Tide-up. Married; tied up in the marriage-knot.

"When first the marriage-knot was tied between my wife and me."—Walkingame's Arithmetic.

Tiffin (Indian). Luncheon; refreshment. (Tiff, a draught of liquor.)

Tig' (A). Properly means a gentleman's attendant, and page a lady's attendant; but the distinction is quite obsolete, and any servant in livery who rides out with his master or mistress is so called; also a boy in buttons attendant on a lady, like a page; a parasite.

"Yes," she cried rily over the banisters, "my face and my tig are waiting."—A Fellow of Trinity, chap. xiv.

Tiger-kill (A). An animal tied up by hunters in a jungle to be killed by a tiger. This is a lure to attract the tiger preparatory to a tiger-hunt.

Tig'res. The car of Bacchus was drawn by tigers, and tigers are generally drawn by artists crouching at the feet of India a tiger is called 1

Stripes.

Tigernach. Oldest of the Irish annalists. His annals were published in Dr. O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicae, Scriptores Veteres, at the expense of the Duke of Buckingham (1814-1826).

Tight. Intoxicated.

Tigris [the Arrow]. So called from the rapidity of its current. Hiddekel is "The Dekel," or Diglath, a Semitic corruption of Tigra, Medo-Persic for arrow. (Gen. ii. 14.)

"Fifina, a rostrum, quaedam femina nomen est; qui. Persica lingua, tigrum signum appellant." Quintus Curtius.

Tike. A Yorkshire tike. A clownish rustic. In Scotland a dog is called a tyke (Icelandic, tik); hence, a snarling, obstinate fellow.

Tulbert (Sir). The cat in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (See Tybalt.)

Tie. A hat. (Anglo-Saxon, tigel; Latin, tegio, to cover.)

Til Loose. He has a tile loose. He is not quite compos mentis; he is not all there.

Tile a Lodge, in Freemasonry, means to close the door, to prevent anyone uninitiated from entering. Of course, to tile a house means to finish building it, and to tile a lodge is to complete it.

Timber-tie (A). A wooden leg; one with a wooden leg.

Time. Time and tide wait for no man.

"For the next inn he spurs again, in haste alighting, and scuds away,--
But time and tide for no man stay." Somerville: The Sweet-scented Miseric.

Take or Seize. Time by the forelock (Tha'tis of Mid'eus). Time is represented as an old man, quite bald, with the exception of a single lock of hair on the right hand. Shakespeare calls him "that

This is, Time was, when a poor Bacon made a brazen head, and it was said he heard his head speak he would succeed in his work in hand, if not he would fail. A man named Miles was set to watch the head, and while Bacon was sleeping the head uttered these words: "Time is;" and half an hour afterwards it said "Time was;" after the expiration of another half-hour it said "Time's past," fell down, and was broken to pieces.

"Like Friar Bacon's brazen head, I've spoken; Time is, time was, time's past." Byron: Don Juan, l. 217-8.

Time-bargain (A), in Stock, is a speculation, not an investment. A time-bargain is made to buy or sell again as soon as possible and receive the difference realized. An investment is made for the sake of the interest given.

Time of Grace. The lawful season for venery, which began at Midsummer and lasted to Holyrood Day. The fox and wolf might be hunted from the Nativity to the Annunciation; the roebuck from Easter to Michaelmas; the roe from Michaelmas to Candlemas; the hare from Michaelmas to Midsummer; and the boar from the Nativity to the Purification. (See Sporting Seasons.)

Time-honoured Lancaster. Old John of Gaunt. His father was Edward III., his son Henry IV., his nephew Richard II. of England; his second wife was Constance, daughter of Peter the Cruel of Castile and Leon; his only daughter married John of Castile and Leon; his sister Johanna married Alphonso, King of Castile. Shakespeare calls him "time-honoured" and "old;" honoured he certainly was, but was only fifty-nine at his death. Reckoned is called Old, meaning "long ago."

Times (The). A newspaper, founded by John Walter. In 1785 he established The Daily Universal Register, but in 1788 changed the name into The Times, or Daily Universal Register. (See Thunderer.)

Timoleon. The Corinthian who so hated tyranny that he murdered his own brother Timoph'anes when he attempted to make himself absolute in Corinth.

"The fair Corinthian host... Timoleon, happy temper, mild and firm, who was the brother while the tyrant was... Thucydides: Hist."

Timon of Athens. The misanthrope. Shakespeare's play so called. Lord Macaulay uses the expression to "out-Timon Timon"--i.e. to be more misanthropical than even Timon.

Tin. Money. A depreciating synonym for silver, called by alchemists "Jupiter."

Tin-man (The). The Earl of Douglas, who died 1424. (See Sir W. Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, chap. xviii.)

Ting. The general assembly of the Northmen, which all capable of bearing arms were bound to attend on occasions requiring deliberation and action. The words Volkstathing and Storting are still in use.

"A short filled the Ting, a thousand swords clashed loud approval." Frithiof-Saga (The Farthing).

Tinker. The man who tinkers, or beats on a kettle to announce his trade. John Bunyan (1628-1688) was called The inspired Tinker.

Tintagel or Tintagil. A strong castle on the coast of Cornwall, the reputed birth-place of King Arthur. "When Uther in Tintagil passed away." Tennyson: The Coming of Arthur.
Tintern Abbey. Wordsworth has a poem called Lines Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey, but these lines have nothing whatever to do with the famous ruin, not even once alluding to it.

Tintoretto, the historical painter. So called because his father was a dyer (tinto). His real name was Jacopo Robusti. He was nicknamed II Furioso, from the rapidity of his productions. (1512-1594.)

Tip. Private information, secret warning. In horse-racing, it means such secret information as may guide the person tipped to make bets advantageously. A "straight tip" comes straight or direct from the owner or trainer of the horse in question. A man will sometimes give the police the "tip", or hint where a gang of confederates lie concealed, or where law-breakers may be found. Thus, houses of ill fame and keepers of clandestine gaming houses in league with the police, receive, the "tip" when spies are on them or legal danger is abroad.

"If he told the police, he felt assured that the 'tip' would be given to the parties concerned, and his efforts would be frustrated — My stood a defence - November 2nd, 1895"

He gave me a tip — a present of money, a bribe. (See Dibs.)

Tip of my Tongue. To have a thing on the tip of my tongue means to have it so pat that it comes without thought; also, to have a thing on the verge of one's memory, but not quite perfectly remembered. (In Latin, in labiis natat.)

Tip One the Wink (To). To make a signal to another by a wink. Here tip means "to give," as tip in the previous example means "a gift."

Tip'any, according to the calendar of saints, was the mother of the Three Kings of Cologne. (See Colognes.)

Tip'phys. A pilot. He was the pilot of the Argoonauts.

"Many a Tip'phys ocean's depths explore,
To open wonders, was a unriv'd before."

Hoope's Jostle, bk viii.

Tipperary Rifle (A). A shillelagh or stick made of blackthorn. At Ballybunchy station an itinerant vendor of walking-sticks pushed up close to their Royal Highnesses [the Prince and Princess of Wales]... The Prince asked him what he wanted, and the man replied, "Nothing, your honour, but to ask your honour to accept a present of a Tipperary rifle," and so saying he handed his Royal Highness a stout hawthorn. The Prince sent the man a sovereign, for which a gentleman offered him 20s. "No," said the man, "I would not part with it for twenty-five gold guineas." In a few minutes the man had sold all his sticks for princely prices. (April 26th, 1895.)

Tippling Act (The), 24 Geo. II., chap. 40, which restricted the sale of spirituous liquors on credit for less than 20s., at one time. In part repealed. A "tippler" originally meant a tavern-keeper or tapster, and the tavern was called a "tippling-house." At Boston, Lincolnshire, in 1577, five persons were appointed "tipplers of Lincoln beer," and no "other tippler [might] draw or sell beer"... under penalties.

Tippling House. A contemptuous name for a tavern or public-house.

Tipstaff. A constable so called because he carried a staff tipped with a bull's horn. In the documents of Edward III., allusion is often made to his staff. (See Rymer's Feder.)

Tip toe of Expectation (On the). All agog with curiosity. I am like one standing on tiptoe to see over the shoulders of a crowd.

Tipper one Dent. To draw a man's tooth, or extort money from him. The allusion is to the tale told by Holinshed of King John, who extorted 10,000 marks from a Jew living at Bristol by extracting a tooth daily till he consented to provide the money. For seven successive days a tooth was taken, and then the Jew gave in.

Tiremaia. Blind as Tuc'sias. Tiremaia the Theban by accident saw Athéna bathing, and the goddess struck him with blindness by splashing water in his face. She afterwards repented doing so, and, as she could not restore his sight, conferred on him the power of soothsaying, and gave him a staff with which he could walk safely as if he had his sight. He found death at last by drinking from the well of Tiphiaa.

"Juno the truth of what was said desired.
Tircias, therefore, must the cause decide." — Adderso. Transformation of Tircias.

Tiring Irons*. Iron rings to be put on or taken off a ring as a puzzle. Lightfoot calls them "tiring irons never to be untied."

Tired*. He tilled at the pin. He twiddled or rattled with the latch before opening the door. — Guillaume di Lorris, in his Romance of the Rose (thirteenth century), says, "When persons visit a friend they ought not to bounce all at once into the room, but should announce their approach by a slight cough, or few words spoken in the hall, or a slight shuffling of their feet, so as not to take their friends unawares." The pin is the door-latch, and before a visitor entered a room it was, in Scotland, thought good manners to fumble at the latch to give notice of your intention to enter. (Tirl is the Anglo-Saxon thwær-an, to turn; Dutch dwarlen, our twirl, etc.; or Danish tvíll, German triller, Welsh treillioc; our trill, to rattle or roll.)

"Right quick he mounted up the stairs,
And tiptoed at the pin."

Charlie is my Darling.

Tirionian Sign (The). The symbol (&) for "and" or the Latin et. Said to have been invented by Tullius Tiro, Cicero's freed-man. (See Marks in Grammar.

Tiryns. An ancient city of Argolis in Greece, famous for its Cyclopean architecture. The "Gallery of Tiryns" is the oldest and noblest structure of the heroic ages. It is mentioned by Homer, and still exists.

Tirynthian Swan. Hercules is so called by Spenser, but he is more frequently styled the Tirynthian Hero, because he generally resided at Tiryns, a town of Argolis.

Tit. A horse.

"They scour’d the coasst, they scour’d the rails,
Two speckling tiles with streaming tail.

The End of All Things"

"What spurrers need now for an unnamed tilt."

Burnsfield: Afectionate Shepherd (1594).

Tit for Tat. J. Bellenden Ker says this is the Dutch "Dit vor dat" (this for that); "Quid pro quo." Heywood uses the phrase "tat for tat," perhaps the French phrase, "tant pour tant."

Titian. The sun, so called by Ovid and Virgil.

"And flacked Darkness like a drunkard reels
From for the Day’s path and Titian’s fiery wheels."

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 3.

The Titans. The children of Heaven and Earth, who, instigated by their mother, deserted their father, and liberated from Tartaro their brothers the Hundred-handed giants, and the Cyclopes. (Classical mythology.)

Titan’s War with Jove (The). The Titans set their brother Cronus on the throne of heaven; and Zeus [Zeus] tried to dethrone him. The contest lasted ten years, when Zeus became the conqueror and hurled the Titans into hell.

*This must not be confounded with the war of the giants, which was a revolt against Zeus, and was soon put down by the help of the other gods and the aid of Hercules. (See Giants.)

Titania. Wife of O’beron, king of the fairies. According to the belief in Shakespeare’s age, fairies were the same as the classic nymphs, the attendants of Diana. The queen of the fairies was therefore Diana herself, called Titania by Ovid (Metamorphoses, iii. 173). (Keightley: Fairy Mythology.

Tithonus. A beautiful Trojan beloved by Aurora. He begged the goddess to grant him immortality, which request the goddess granted; but as he had forgotten to ask for youth and vigour he soon grew old, infirm, and ugly. When life became insupportable he prayed Aurora to remove him from the world; this, however, she could not do, but she changed him into a grasshopper. Synonym for "an old man."

"An idle scene Tithonus acted When to a grasshopper contracted."

Prior: The Turtle and Sparrows.

"Thinner than Tithonus was Before he faded into air."

Tales of Miletus, ii.

Titi (Prince). Frederick, Prince of Wales, eldest son of George II. Seward, a contemporary, tells us that Prince Frederick was a great reader of French memoirs, and that he himself wrote memoirs of his contemporaries under the pseudonym of "Prince Titi."

There was a political fairy tale by St. Ryelinthe (1664-1741) called the History of Prince Titi. Ralph also wrote a History of Prince Titi. These histories are manifestly covert reflections on George II. and his belongings.

Titián [Tiziano Vecellio]. An Italian landscape painter, celebrated for the fine effects of his clouds. (1477-1576.)

"Not Titian’s pencil ever could so array,"

"So fleecy with clouds the pure ethereal space."

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, cant. i.

The French Titian. Jacques Blanchard, the painter (1560-1638).

The Titian of Portugal. Alonso Sanchez Coello (1515-1580).

Título (3 syl.). To tidy up; to dress up; to set in order. "Título" is a variant of tidy; and "vato" is an affix, from the Latin vado (to go), meaning "to go and do something."

Tittle Tattle. Tattle is prate. (Dutch tateren, Italian, tatta-mille.) Tattle is Titus. The penitent thief, called Desmas in the ancient mysteries. (See Dumæus.)

Titus the Roman Emperor was called “the delight of men.” (40, 79-81.)

The Ark of Titus commemorates the capture of Jerusalem, A.D. 70.

Tityos. A giant whose body covered nine acres of land. He tried to defile Leda, but Apollo cast him into Tartarus, where a vulture fed on his liver, which grew again as fast as it was devoured. (Greek fable.) (See Giants.)

Titus loved to lurk in the dark night looking for mischief). “Titus” = tuss.

Titurus. Any shepherd. So called in allusion to the name familiar from its use in Greek idyls and Virgil's first Eclogue. In The Shepherd's Calendar Spenser calls Chaucer by this name:

“Heroes and their feats
Fatigue me, never weary of the pipe
Of Titurus, assembling as he sang
The rustic throng beneath his favourite beech.”

Tissoe. One of the favourite swords of the Old, taken by him from King Bucar. His other favourite sword was Cola'da. Tixona was buried with him. (See Sword.)

Titsey (A). A sixpence. A variant of tester. In the reign of Henry VIII. a "teneste" was a shilling, but only sixpence in the reign of Elizabeth. (French, teste, tôle, the [monarch's] head.)

To (1) (to rhyme with do). To be compared to; comparable to. Thus, Sir Thomas Browne (Religio Medici) says: “There is no torture to the rack of a disease” (p. 60, 20); and again, “No reproach to the scandal of a story.” And Shakespeare says:

“There is no woe to his correction, Nor to his service no such joy on earth.”

Two Gentlemen of Verona, ii. 4.

To. Altogether; wholly.

“If the pedesch be burned to . . . we say the byshop hath put his fote in the potte.”—Sydons.

To-do. Here's a pretty to-do. Disturbance. The French affair—i.e. a faire (to do).

ToRights. In apple-pie order. To put things to rights. To put every article in its proper place. In the United States of America the phrase is used to signify directly. (Latin, rectus, right.)

"I said I had never heard it, so she began to rights and told me the whole thing."—Story of the Night-ride.

To Wit. For example. (Anglo-Saxon, wit-an, to know.)

To (3) (to rhyme with so, foe, etc.).

To En (The). The One—that is, the Unity. This should be To him properly.

To On (The). The reality.

To Pan (The). The totality.

"So then he falls back upon force as the "ultimate of ultimates," as the To En, the To On, and the To Pan of creation."—Fra. Olens.

Toads. The device of Clovis was three toads (or botes, as they were called in Old French), but after his baptism the Arians greatly hated him, and assembled a large army under King Candat to put down the Christian king. While on his way to meet the heretics, he saw in the heavens his device miraculously changed into three lilies or on a banner azure. He had such a banner instantly made, and called it his lifband. Even before his army came in sight of King Candat, the host of the heretic lay dead, slain, like the army of Sennacherib, by a blast from the god of battles. (Énaul de Prées : Grans Cronicques de France.)

"It is wittnesayd of Maister Robert Gagwyne that before those dayes all French kynges used to bore in their armes ill Teddy, but after this Clodoveus had reconised Cristes religyon ill Fourre de lys were sent to hym by dwayne pweer, sette in a shkyde of azure, the whiche sym that been bare of all French kynges."—Fabian's Chronicles.

The toad, ugly and venomous, wears yet a precious jewel in its head. Fenton says: “There is to be found in the heads of old and great toads a stone they call borax or stelon, which, being used as rings, give forewarning against venom” (1569). These stones always bear a figure resembling a toad on their surface,
Toad-eater

Lupton says: "A toad-stone, called viperauto, touching any part envenomed by the bite of a rat, wasp, spider, or other venomous beast, ceases the pain and swelling thereof." In the London Borough Collection is a silver ring of the fifteenth century, in which one of these toad-stones is set. The stone was supposed to sweat and change colour when poison was in its proximity. Technically called the Batrachyte or Batrachos, an antidote of all sorts of poison.

Toads unknown in Ireland. It is said that St. Patrick cleared the island of all "varmint" by his malédiction.

Toad-eater. At the final overthrow of the Moors, the Castilians made their servants, and their active habits and officious manners greatly pleased the proud and lazy Spaniards, who called them mi todita (my factotum). Hence a cringing officious dependent, who will do all sorts of dirty work for you, is called a todita or toad-eater.

Pulteney's toad-eater. Henry Vane. So called by Walpole (1742).

Tody. (See Toad-eater.)

Toast. A name given, to which guests are invited to drink in compliment. The name at one time was that of a lady. The word is taken from the toast which used at one time to be put into the tankard, and which still floats in the loving-cup, and also the cupule called cupus, bishop, and cardinal, at the Universities. Hence the lady named was the toast or savour of the wine—that which gave the draught piquancy and merit. The story goes that a certain beau, in the reign of Charles II., being at Bath, pledged a noted beauty in a glass of water taken from her bath; whereupon another roysterer cried out he would have nothing to do with the liquor, but would have the toast—i.e. the lady herself. (Rambler, No. 24.)

"Let the toast pass, drink to the lass."—Sheridan: School for Scandal.

"Say, why are beauties praised and honoured most? The wise man's passion and the vain man's toast."—Pope: Rape of the Lock, canto 1.

Tobit, sleeping one night outside the wall of his courtyard, was blinded by sparrows "muting warm dung into his eyes." His son Tobias was attacked on the Tigris by a fish, which leapt out of the water to assail him. Tobias married Sara, seven of whose betrothed lovers had been successively carried off by the evil spirit Asmodeus. Asmodeus was driven off by the angel Azari'as, and, fleeing to the extremity of Egypt, was bound. Old Tobit was cured of his blindness by applying to his eyes the gall of the fish which had tried to devour his son. (Apocrypha: Book of Tobit.)

Toboso. Dulcinea del Toboso. Don Quixote's lady. Sancho Panza says she was "a stout-built sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish." The knight had been in love with her when he was simply a gentleman of the name of Quixada. She was then called Aldonza Lorenzo (daughter of Lorenzo Corchuelo and Aldonza Noagales); but when the gentleman became a don, he changed the style of address of the village damsel into one more befitting his new rank. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, bk. i. chap. 1.)

"Sir," said Don Quixote, "she is not a descendant of the ancient Cen. Curit, and Scipio of Rome; nor of the modern Colomos and Orofili; nor of the modern Castile and Villancos of Valencia; neither is she a descendant of the Piresco, Newcas, Rucabertes, Gallicas, Lucas, Alagoncs, Thus, Force, and Guerra of Aragon; neither does the Lady Dulcinea descend from the Ceruela, Mauque, Mondanis, and Guimana of Castile; nor from the Vizcayanos, Pullos, and Meurcas of Portugal; but she derives her origin from a family of Toboso, near Mancha." (Ok. ii. chap. v.)

"In English the accent of Dulcinea is often on the second syllable, but in Spanish it is on the third.

"Ask you for whom my tears do flow so? Why, for Dulcinea del Toboso, Don Quixote's Love-song.

Tobo'sian. The rampant Man'eche-gian lion shall be united to the white Tobosian lion. Literally, Don Quixote de la Mancha shall marry Dulcina del Toboso. Metaphorically, "None but the brave deserve the fair."

Toby (the dog). In Punchinello, wears a fringe garnished with bells, to frighten away the devil from his master. This is a very old superstition. (See Passing Bell.)

The Chinese and other nations make a great noise at death to scare away evil spirits. "Keeping is probably based on the same superstition.

Toby. The high toby, the high-road the low toby, the by-road. A highwayman is a "high tobyman;" a mere footpad is a "low tobyman."

"So we can do a thing now... as well as you grand gentlemen on the high toby."—Buckwheat:
Robbery under Arms, chap. xxvi.

Toddy. A favourite Scotch beverage compounded of spirits, hot water, and sugar. The word is a corruption of raudt, the Indian name for the saccharine juice of palm spathes. The Sanskrit is toldi or tali, from tal (palm-juice). (Rhzid: Vegetable Kingdom.)
Toes. The most dexterous man in the use of his toes in lieu of fingers was William Kingston, born without hands or arms. (See World of Wonders, pt. x.; Correspondence, p. 66.)

Tofana. An old woman of Naples immortalised by her invention of a tasteless and colourless poison, called by her the Manna of St. Nicola of Bari, but better known as Aqua Tofana. Above 600 persons fell victims to this insidious drug. Tofana died 1730.

Hieronyma Spara, generally called La Spara, a reputed witch, about a century previously, sold a similar elixir. The secret was revealed by the father confessors, after many years of concealment and a frightful number of deaths.

Tog. Toga, dress. (Latin, toga.) “Toggled out in his best” is dressed in his best clothes. Toggery is finery.

Toga. The Romans were called toga'tii or gens toga'ta, because their chief outer dress was a toga.

Toga'd or Togated Nation (The). Gens togata, the Romans, who wore togas. The Greeks wore “palla,” and were called the gens palliata; the Gauls wore breeches, and were called gens braccata. (Toga, pallium, and braccae.)

Tolle'do. Famous for its swords. “The temper of Tole'dan blades is such that they are sometimes packed in boxes, curled up like the mainsprings of watches”!! Both Livy and Polybius refer to them.

Tolmen (in French, Dolmen). An immense mass of stone placed on two or more vertical ones, so as to admit a passage between them. (Celtic, tol or dol, table; men, stone.)

The Constantine Tolmen, Cornwall, consists of a vast stone 33 feet long, 14½ deep, and 18½ across. This stone is calculated to weigh 750 tons, and is poised on the points of two natural rocks.

Tolo'na. He has got the gold of Tolona. (Latin proverb meaning “His ill-gotten wealth will do him no good.”) Cepio, in his march to Gallia Narbonensis, stole from Toulouse (Tolose) the gold and silver consecrated by the Cimbrian Druids to their gods. In the battle which ensued both Cepio and his brother consul were defeated by the Cimbrians and Teutons, and 112,000 Romans were left dead on the field. (c.c. 106.)

Tom. Between “Tom” and “Jack” there is a vast difference. “Jack” is the sharp, shrewd, active fellow, but Tom the honest dullard. Counterfeits are “Jack,” but Toms are simply bulky examples of the ordinary sort, as Tomatoes. No one would think of calling the thick-headed, ponderous male cat a Jack, nor the pert, dexterous, thief-daw a “Tom.” The former is instinctively called a Tom-cat, and the latter a Jack-daw. The subject of “Jack” has been already set forth. (See Jack.) Let us now see how Tom is used:

Tom o’ Bedlam (g.v.). A mendicant who levies charity on the plea of insanity.

Tom-cat. The male cat.

Tom Drum’s entertainment. A very clumsy sort of horse-play.

Tom Farthing. A born fool.

Tom Fool. A clumsy, witless fool, fond of stupid practical jokes, but very different from a “Jack Pudding,” who is a wit and bit of a conjurer.

Tom Long. A lazy, dilatory sluggard.

Tom Lony. A simpleton.

Tom Noddy. A puffing, fuming, stupid creature, no more like a “Jack-a-dandy” than Bill Sikes to Sam Weller.

Tom Noodle. A mere nincompoop.

Tom the Piper’s son. A poor stupid thief who got well basted, and blubbered like a booby.

Tom Thumb. A man cut short or stinted of his fair proportions. (For the Tom Thumb of nursery delight, see next page.)

Tom Tidler. An occupant who finds it no easy matter to keep his own against sharper rivals. (See Tom Tidler’s Ground.)

Tom Tiller. A hen-pecked husband.

Tom Tinker. The brawny, heavy blacksmith, with none of the wit and fun of a “Jack Tar,” who can tell a yarn to astonish all his native village.

Tom Tit. The “Tom Thumb” of birds.

Tom-Toe. The clumsy, bulky toe, “bulk without spirit vast.” Why the great toe? “For that being one o’ the lowest, basest, poorest of this most wise rebellion, thou goest foremost.” (Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 1.)

Tom Tuq. A waterman, who bears the same relation to a Jack Tar as a cart-horse to an Arab. (See Tom Tuq.)

Great Tom of Lincoln. A bell weighing 5 tons 8 cwt.

Mighty Tom of Oxford. A bell weighing 7 tons 12 cwt.

Old Tom. A heavy, strong; intoxicating sort of gin.

Long Tom. A huge water-jug.
Tommy Atkins (A). A British soldier, as a Jack Tar is a British sailor. The term arose from the little pocket ledgers served out, at one time, to all British soldiers. In these manuals were to be entered the name, the age, the date of enlistment, the length of service, the wounds, the medals, and so on of each individual. The War Office sent with each little book a form for filling it in, and the hypothetical name selected, instead of John Doe and Richard Roe (selected by lawyers), or M. N. (selected by the Church), was "Tommy Atkins."
Tommy Dodd

The books were instantly so called, and it did not require many days to transfer the name from the book to the soldier.

Tommy Dodd. The "odd" man who, in tossing up, either wins or loses according to agreement with his confederate. There is a music-hall song so called, in which Tommy Dodd is the "knowing one."

Tommy Shop. Where wages are paid to workmen who are expected to lay out a part of the money for the good of the shop. Tommy means bread or a pennny roll, or the food taken by a workman in his handkerchief; it also means goods in lieu of money. A Tom and Jerry shop is a low drinking-room.

To morrow never Comes. A reproof to those who defer till to-morrow what should be done to-day.

"I shall acquaint your mother, Miss May, with your pretty behaviour to-morrow,"—I suppose you mean to-morrow come never," answered Mar-riolls."—Le Faus: The House in the Churchyard, p. 118.

Tonans. Delirium tonans. Loud talk, exaggeration, gasonade. Blackwood's Magazine (1869) introduced the expression in the following clause:—

"Irishmen are the victims of that terrible malady that is characterized by a sort of subacute raving, and may, for want of a better name, be called 'delirium tonans.'"

Tongue of the Trump (The). The spokesman or leader of a party. The trump means a Jew's harp, which is vocalised by the tongue.

"The tongue of the trump to them a:"

Tongues.
The Italian is pleasant, but without sinews, as still floating water.
The French—delicate, but like an overnice woman, scarce daring to open her lips for fear of marring her countenance.
The Spanish—majestical, but fulsome, running too much on the letter o; and terrible, like the devil in a play.
The Dutch—manlike, but withal very harsh, as one ready at every word to pick a quarrel.

We (the English), in borrowing from them, give the strength of consonants to the Italian; the full sound of words to the French; the variety of terminations to the Spanish; and the mollifying of mere vowels to the Dutch. Thus, like bees, we gather the honey of their good properties and leave the dregs to themselves. (Camden.)

Tossa (Mrs.), Charlotte Elizabeth, the author of Personal Recollections (1792–1846).

Ten' sure (2 syl.). The t essure of St. Peter consists in shaving the crown and back of the head, so as to leave a ring or "crown" of hair.
The t essure of James consists in shaving the entire front of the head. This is sometimes called "the t essure of Simon the Magician," and sometimes "the Scottish t essure," from its use in North Britain.

Tessures vary in size according to rank.

For clerics the tessure should be 1 inch in diameter. (Gastaldus, ii sect i., chap. viii.)
For those in minor orders it should be 1½ inch. (Council of Palencia under Urban VI.)
For a sub-deacon 1½ inch. (Gastaldus, xl sect. 1., chap. 3 vili.)
For a deacon 2 inches. (Gastaldus, xl sect. 1., chap. ix.)
For a priest 2½ inches. (Council of Palencia.)

Tontine (2 syl.). A legacy left among several persons in such a way that as anyone dies his share goes to the survivors, till the last survivor inherits all. So named from Lorenzo Tonti, a Neapolitan, who introduced the system into France in 1653.

Tony Lumpkin. A young clownish bumpkin in She Stoops to Conquer, by Oliver Goldsmith.

Too Many for [Me] or One too many for [me]. More than a match. "It est trop fort pour moi."

"The Irishman is cunning enough; but we shall be too many for him."—Mrs. Edgeworth.

Tooba or Touba [eternal happiness]. The tree Touba, in Paradise, stands in the palace of Mahomet. (Sale: Preliminary Discourse to the Koran.)

Tool. To tool a coach. To drive one; generally applied to a gentleman Jehu, who undertakes for his own amusement to drive a stage-coach. To tool is to use the tool as a workman; a coachman's tools are the reins and whip with which he tools his coach or makes his coach go.

Tooey Street. A corruption of St. Olaf—i.e. 'Tolay, Tolay, Tooly. Similarly, Sise Lane is St. Oysth's Lane.

Toom Tabard [empty jacket]. A nickname given to John Baliol, because of his poor spirit, and sleeveless appointment to the throne of Scotland. The honour was an "empty jacket," which he enjoyed a short time and then lost. He died dishonored in Normandy.

Tooth. Greek, odont:; Latin, dent:; Sanskrit, danta:; Gothic, tumht:; Anglosaxon, deth, plural, deth.
Tooth and Egg

Golden tooth. (See Golden.)
Wolf’s tooth. (See Teeth.)
In spite of his teeth. (See Teeth.)

Tooth and Egg. A corruption of Tutunag, a Chinese word for spelter, the metal of which canisters are made, and tea-chests lined. It is a mixture of English lead and tin from Quintang.

Tooth and Nail. In right good earnest, like a rat or mouse biting and scratching to get at something.

Top. (See Sleep.)
Top-heavy. Liable to tip over because the centre of gravity is too high. Intoxicated.

Top Ropes. A display of the top-ropes. A show of gushing friendliness; great promise of help. The top-ropes is the rope used in hauling the top-mast up or down.

“...This display of the top-ropes was rather new to me, for time had blunted from my memory the ‘General’s’ rhumbodies.”—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 180.

Top-sawyer. A first-rate fellow. The sawyer that takes the upper stand is always the superior man, and gets higher wages.

Topham. Take him, Topham. Catch him if you can; lay hold of him, tipstaff. Topham was the Black Rod of the House of Commons in the reign of Charles II., very active in apprehending “suspects” during the supposed conspiracy revealed by Titus Oates, “...taketh roverbial”

“Who stole the donkey?” “How are your poor feet?” and so on.

“...Till ‘Take him, Topham’ became a proverb, and a formidable one, in the mouth of the people.”—Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xx.

To’phet. A valley near Jerusalem, where children were made to “pass through the fire to Moloch.” Josiah threw dead bodies, ordure, and other unclean things there, to prevent all further application of the place to religious use. (2 Kings xxii, 10, 11.) Here Sennacherib’s army was destroyed. (Isaiah xxx. 31–33.) The valley was also called “Gehinnom” (valley of Hinnom), corrupted into Gehenna; and Rabbi Kimchi tells us that a perpetual fire was kept burning in it to consume the dead bodies, bones, filth, and ordure deposited there. (Hebrew, topah, a drum. When children were offered to Moloch, their shrinks were drowned by beat of drum.)

Top’ta. This word has wholly changed its original meaning. It now signifies a subject for talk, a theme for discussion or to be written about; but originally “topics” were what we call common-place books; the “sentences” of Peter Lombard were theological topics. (Greek, topikos, from topos, a place.)

Topsy. A slave-girl, who impersonates the low moral development but real capacity for education of the negro race. Her reply to Aunt Ophelia, who questioned her as to her father and mother, is worthy Dickens. After maintaining that she had neither father nor mother, her solution of her existence was “I 'specs I growed.” (Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom’s Cabin.)

Topsy-turvy. Upside down. (Anglo-Saxon, top side turn-awep.) As Shakespeare says, “...Turn it topsy-turvy down.” (1 Henry IV., iv. 1.) (See Half-seas Over.)

Toralva. The licentiate who was conveyed on a cane through the air, with his eyes shut. In the space of twelve hours he arrived at Rome, and lighted on the tower of Nona, whence, looking down, he witnessed the death of the constable de Bourbon. The next morning he arrived at Madrid, and related the whole affair. During his flight through the air the devil bade him open his eyes, and he found himself so near the moon that he could have touched it with his finger. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, pt. ii. bk. iii. chap. v.)

Tornea’s. A lake, or rather a river of Sweden, which rises from a lake in Lapland, and runs into the Gulf of Bothnia, at the town called Tornea or Torné.

“Still pressing on beyond Tornea’s lake.”
Thomson: Winter.

Torqua’to—i.e. Torquato Tasso, the poet. (1544-1595.) (See Alfonso.)

“And see how dearly earned Torquato’s fame.”
Lord Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 20.

Torquemada (Inquisitor-general of Spain, 1420-1498). A Dominican of excessive zeal, who multiplied confessions, condemnations, and punishments to a frightful extent; and his hatred of the Jews and Moors was diabolical.

“General Strel'noff was the greatest accursed who defied the earth since Torquemada.”
Foster: The Expulsion of the Winter-Plague, Februa-ary, 1883.

Torr’s MSS., in the library of the dean and chapter of York Minister. These voluminous records contain the clergy list of every parish in the diocese.
of York, and state not only the date of each vacancy, but the cause of each removal, whether by death, promotion, or otherwise.

Terraela (Doctor), who resided some time in the court of Charles V of Spain. He was tried by the Inquisition for sorcery, and confessed that the spirit Caequel took him from Valladolid to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. (Percy)

Torre (16) (1 syl.) Brother of Elaine, and son of the lord of Astolat. A kind blunt heart, brisk in manners, and but little of a knight. (Tennyson Idylls of the King, Elaine) Terracelli, an Italian mathematician (1608-71), noted for his explanation of the rise of water in a common barometer. Galileo explained the phenomenon by the word vavso of "Nature abhors a vacuum".

Tercce which supports the Earth (The) is Chukwa, the elephant (between the tortoise and the world). is Maha-pudma Tortore (2 syl.) The most celebrated instruments of torture were the sack, called by the English "the Duke of Exeter's daughter", the thumbs or thumbers, the boots, the pincis, the monacles, and the *sawgoer's daughters".

Tory. This word, says Defoe, is the Irish torsh, used in the reign of Queen Elizabeth to signify a band of Catholic outlaws who haunted the bogs of Ireland. It is formed from the verb torsh (to make sudden raids). Colours say—"Tory, slaughter, murder, slain, fiend, et intruque ulus hand ibi est" (Whatever inhabitants mountains and forests is a Tory). Lord Macaulay says—"The name was first given to those who refused to concur in excluding James from the throne." He further says—"The bogs of Ireland afforded a refuge to Popish outlaws, called tories." Tory hunting was a pastime which has even found place in our nursery rhymes—"I went to the wood and I killed a tory."

F. Crozley gives as the derivation, Tivth-ruca (Celtic), "king's party." H. T. Hodgson, in Notes and Queries, gives Tivth-ruca, "partisans of the king."

G. Borrow gives Tur-a-ru, "Come, O king."

In 1835 after the Reform Act, the Tory party again to call themselves Conservative and after Gladstone's Bill of Home Rule for Ireland in 1886 the Whigs and Radicals who objected to the Bill joined the Conservatives and the two parties called themselves Unionists. In 1895 the queen sent for Lord Salisbury, who formed a Unionist government.

Tottum Pole (A) A pole elaborately carved, erected before the dwelling of certain American Indians. It is a sort of symbol, like a public house sign, or Imagine a huge log, forty or fifty feet high set up in a staff fashion in front or at the side of a low one-storied wooden house and carved in its whole height into immense grotesque representations of man beast and bird. It is emblazoned on the side a reverence of ancestors and legendary relics. Sometimes the tree is only a massive pole with a bird or some wild animal at the top, the crest of the chief 13 whose house it stands. Sometimes it was raised at the base so as to allow a doorway to be cut through it. Usually the whole pole was carried into great测定, the heads turned one at a time and the effect heightened by dyes of paint—blue, red, and green. —American Century Dictionary, 1905.

Totemism. Totem is the representation of a symbol by an animal, and totemism is the system or science of such symbolism. Thus, in Egyptian mythology, what is represented as a pig or hippopotamus by one tribe, is (for some totemic reason) represented as a crocodile by another.

The ancient wealth of (Egyptian) mythology depends on the custom of the inhabitants of the Nile Valley to consecrate to each tribe an animal as the emblem of the tribe dwelling in that locality. —Lavisse Nineteenth Century July 1894.

Toto Cola. Entirely. The allusion is to augurs who divided the heavens into four parts. Among the Greeks the left hand was unlucky, and the right lucky. When all four parts concurred a prediction was certified toto cola. The Romans called the east Aurora, the west Occa the south Dextra, and the north Sinistra.

When when they are relaxing those general 1 comfort. The education differs tota cola from instruction induced by the taste of an individual boy. —Nineteenth Century January 1895.

Totus Teres atque Retundus. Finished and completely rounded off.

Touch. In touch with him. In sympathy. The allusion to the touchstone, which shows by its colour what metal has touched it.

Touch. To keep touch—faith, fidelity. The allusion is to "touching" gold and other metals on a touchstone to prove Shakespeare speaks of "friends of noble touch" (proof).

"And trust me on my truth,
For thou keep touch with me,
My dearest friend, as my own heart,
Shall right welcome be." — George Barnwell (1730).

Touch At (To). To go to a place without stopping at it.

"The next day we touched at Sidon." — Acts xxvii. 12.

Touch Bottom (To). To know the worst. A sea-phrase.

"It is much better for the ministry to touch bottom at once and know the whole truth, than to remain any longer in suspense." — Newspaper paragraph, January, 1888.

Touch Up (To). To touch a horse with a whip for greater speed. To touch up a picture, etc., is to give it a few touches to improve it.

Touch and Go (4). A very narrow escape; a very brief encounter. A metaphor derived from driving when the wheel of one vehicle touches that of another passing vehicle without doing mischief. It was a touch, but neither vehicle was stopped, each went on its way.

Touche. When Charles IX. introduced Henri of Navarre to Marie Touchet, he requested him to make an anagram on her name, and Henri therefore wrote the following: — Je charmee tout.

Touchstone. A dark, flinty schist, called by the ancients Lapis Lydus; called touchstone because gold is tried by it, thus: A series of needles arranged (1) of pure gold; (2) of 23 gold and 1 copper; (3) of 22 gold and 2 copper, and so on. The assayer selects one of these and rubs it on the touchstone, when it leaves a reddish mark in proportion to the quantity of copper alloy. Dr. Ure says: "In such small work as cannot be assayed... the assayer... ascertains its quality by touch. They then compare the colour left behind, and form their judgment accordingly."

"The tale is, that Battus saw Mercury steal Apollo's oxen, and Mercury gave him a cow to secure his silence on the theft. Mercury, distrustful of the man, changed himself into a peasant, and offered Battus a cow and an ox if he would tell him the secret. Battus, caught in the trap, told the secret, and Mercury changed him into a touchstone. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, ii.)

"Gold is tried by the touchstone, and men by gold." — Savigny.

Touchstone. A clown whose mouth is filled with quips and cranks and witty repartees. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.) The original one was Tariton.

Touchy. Apt to take offence on slight provocation. Ne t'ouche pas, non me tangere, one not to be touched.

Tour. The Grand Tour. Through France, Switzerland, Italy, and home by Germany. Before railways were laid down, this tour was made by most of the young aristocratic families as the finish of their education. Those who merely went to France or Germany were simply tourists.

Tour de Force. A feat of strength.

Tourlourou. Young unfledged soldiers of the line, who used to be called "Jean-Jean."

"Les Tourlourous sont les nouveaux enrois, ceux qui n'ont pas encore de vieilles moustaches, et qui flâinent sur les boulevards et regardent les images, les paillassages, et en cherchant des paysers." — Paul de Kock: Un Tourlourou, chap. xiii.

Tournament or Tourney. A tilt of knights; the chief art of the game being to manœuvre or turn your horse as to avoid the adversary's blow. (French, tournoiement, verb, tournoyer.)

Tournament of the Drum. A comic romance in verse by Sir David Lindsay; a ludicrous mock tournament.

Tournament of Totenham. A comic romance, printed in Percy's Reliques. A number of clowns are introduced, practising warlike games, and making vows like knights of high degree. They ride tilt on cart-horses, fight with plough-shares and flails, and wear for armour wooden bowls and saucepan-hulls. It may be termed the "high life below stairs" of chivalry.

Tournement (3 syl.). That's Tournement. Your wish was father to the thought. Tournement was a Jesuit of the eighteenth century, of a very sanguine and dreamy temperament.

Tours. Geoffrey of Monmouth says: "In the party of Brutus was one Turcines, his nephew, inferior to none in courage and strength, from whom Tours derived its name, being the place of its sepulture. Of course, the table is wholly worthless historically. Tours is the city of the Tu'rouns, a people of Gallia Lugdunensis.

Tent (pronounce tout). To ply or seek for customers. "A touter" is one who touts. (From Tooting, where persons on their way to the court held at Epsom were pestered by "toute."

"A century or two ago, when the courts took up its quarters at Epsom... [many of the inhabitants used to stand on their own piece of land and ask for money]... The tradesfolk... passed through Tooting. It became a common expression for carriagefolk to say, 'The Touts are on us again.'" - Walked in Greater London, vol. 11, p. 830

Tout Ensemble (French). The whole massed together; the general effect.

Tout est Pardu Hormis L'Honneur, is what François I. wrote to his mother after the battle of Pavia.

Tout le Monde. Everyone who is anybody.

Tower of Hunger. Gualandi. (Ne Uegol'no.)

Tower of London. The architect of this remarkable building was Gundolphus, Bishop of Rochester, who also built or restored Rochester keep, in the time of William I. In the Tower lie buried Anne Boleyn and her brother, the guilty Catherine Howard, and Lady Rochford her associate; the venerable Lady Salisbury, and Cromwell the munister of Henry VIII.; the two Seymours, the admiral and protector of Edward VI.; the Duke of Norfolk and Earl of Sussex (Queen Elizabeth's regent); the Duke of Monmouth, son of Charles II.; the Earl of Balmerino and Kilmarnock, and Lord Lovat, Bishop Fisher and his illustrious friend More.

Towers of Silence. Towers in Persia and India, some sixty feet in height, on the top of which Parsi places the dead to be eaten by vultures. The bones are picked clean in the course of a day, and are then thrown into a receptacle and covered with charcoal.

"A procession is then formed, the friends of the dead following the enquiry to the Towers of Silence on Malabar Hill. -Ezra Pound-Jones"

The Parsi will not burn or bury their dead because they consider a dead body impure, and they will not suffer themselves to defile any of the elements. They carry their dead on a bier to the Tower of Silence. At the entrance they light their last on the dead, and the corpse-leaves carry the dead body within the precincts and set it down to be devoured by vultures which crowd the tower. (Nineteenth Century, Oct., 1861, p. 611.)

Town (A) is the Anglo-Saxon tin, a plot of ground fenced round or enclosed by a hedge; a single dwelling; a number of dwelling-houses enclosed together forming a village or burgh.

"Our ancestors in time of war... would cast a ditch, or make a strong hedge about their houses, and houses so environed... got the name times annexed unto them (as Cote-tin, now Cotton, the role or house fenced in or fenced about) Northin, now Norton... South-in, now Sutton... in troubous times whole 'thorpes' were fenced in, and took the name of towns (towns), and then 'stedes' (now cities), and 'burhps' (villages), and... burhps (burrows)... got the name of towns."

Tract for the Times. Published at Oxford during the years 1833-1841, and hence called the Oxford Tracts.

A. i.e. Rev. John Keble, M.A., author of the Christian Year, fellow of Oriel, and formerly Professor of Poetry at Oxford.

B. Rev. Isaac Williams, Fellow of Trinity; author of The Cathedral, and other Poems.

C. Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., Regius Professor of Hebrew, and Canon of Christ Church.

D. Rev. John Henry Newman, D.D., Fellow of Oriel, writer of the celebrated Tract No. 90, which was the last.

E. Rev. Thomas Keble.

F. Sir John Provost, Bart.

G. Rev. R. F. Wilson, of Oriel.

Tractsarians. Those who concur in the religious views advocated by the Oxford Tracts.

Tracy. All the Traces have the wind in their faces. Those who do wrong will always meet with punishment. William de Traci was the most active of the four knights who slew Thomas à Becket, and for this misdeed all who bore the name were saddled by the Church with this ban: "Wherever by sea or land they go, the wind in their face shall..." ever blow." Fuller, with his usual exaggeration, says, "So much the better in hot weather, as it will save the need of a fan."

Trade. (See Balance.)

Trade Mark. A mark adopted by a manufacturer to distinguish his productions from those made by other persons.

Trade Winds. Winds that trade or tread in one uniform track. In the northern hemisphere they blow from the north-east, and in the southern hemisphere from the south-east, about thirty degrees each side of the equator. In some places they blow six months in one direction, and six in the opposite. It is a mistake to derive the word from trade (commerce), under the notion that they are "good for trade." (Anglo-Saxon, treadan, to tread; treadan, to tread.)

Trade follows the Flag. Colonies promote the trade of the mother country. The reference is to the custom of planting the flag of the mother country in every colony.

Traditions. (See Christian Traditions.)

Tran Meat. Meat prohibited as food by Jews from some ritual defect. It was sold cheap to general butchers, but at one time the law forbade the sale. In 1285 Roger de Lakenham, of Norwich, was fined for selling "Tran meat."

Tragery. The goat-song (Greek, tragos-ode). The song that wins the goat as a prize. This is the explanation given by Horace (De Arte Poetica, 220). (See Comedy.)

Tragedy. The first English tragedy of any merit was Gorboduc, written by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville. (See Ralph Roister Doister.)

The Father of Tragedy. Eschylus the Athenian. (B.C. 525-426.) Thespis, the Richardson of Athens, who went about in a waggon with his strolling players, was the first to introduce dialogue in the choral odes, and is therefore not unfrequently called the "Father of Tragedy or the Drama."

"Thespis was first who, all beavered with bee, begot the pleasure for posterity." — Pydeson; Art of Poetry (Tragedy), c. iii.

Trammel. Father of French Tragedy. Garnier (1534-1600).

Traill. The trail of the serpent is over them all. Sin has set his mark on all. (Thomas Moore: Paradise and the Peri.)

Traitors' Bridge. A loyal heart may be found under Traitors' Bridge. Traitor's Bridge, in the Tower, was the way by which persons charged with high treason entered that State prison.

Traitors' Gate. opens from the Tower of London to the Thames, and was the gate by which persons accused of treason entered their prison.

Trajan's Column commemorates his victories over the Dacians. It was the work of Apollodorus. The column of the Place Vendôme, Paris, is a model of it.

Trajan's Wall. A line of fortifications stretching across the Dobrudjea from Czernavoda to the Black Sea.

Tram. (A). A car which runs on a tramway (q.v.). Trams in collieries were in use in the seventeenth century, but were not introduced into our streets till 1865.

Tramway or Tram Rails. A railway for tram-carts or wagons, originally made of wooden rails. Iron rails were first laid down in 1738, but apparently were called "dram-roads" (Greek, dramm-eis, to run). We are told there were wagons called drams (or trams). Benjamin Outram, in 1800, used stone rails at Little Eaton, Derbyshire; but the similarity between tram and Outram is a mere coincidence. Perhaps he was the cause of the word dram being changed to tram, but even this is doubtful. (See Reed's Cyclopedia.)

"Trams are a kind of sledge on which coals are brought from the place where they are heaped to the shaft. A tram has four wheels, but a sledge is without wheels." — Branda: History of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, vol. II, p. 561, n. (1769).

Trameckian and Siameckian. The high heels and low heels, the two great political factions of Lilliput. The high heels are the Tories, and the low heels the Radicals of the kingdom. "The animosity of these two factions runs so high that they will neither eat, nor drink, nor speak to each other." The king was a low heel in politics, but the heir-apparent a high heel. (Swift: Gulliver's Travels; Voyage to Lilliput, chap. iv.)

Trammel means to catch in a net. (French, tramail, trame, a woof; verb, tramer, to weave.)
Tramontane (3 syl.). The north wind; so called by the Italians because to them it comes over the mountains. The Italians also term the atmosphere of the Alps French, on the other hand, apply the word to Italian canonists, whom they consider too Roman. We in England generally call overstrained Catholic notions "Ultramontane."

Translator. A cobbler, who translates or transmogrifies two pairs of worn-out shoes into one pair capable of being worn; a reformer, who tries to cobble the sky.

The dull and in mode reformers or translators have pulled the church all to pieces and know not how to patch it up again. — Mercure de France, March, 1847, No. 57.

Translator-General. So Fuller, in his Worthies, calls Philemon Holland, who translated a large number of the Greek and Latin classics. (1561-1636.)

Trap. A carriage, especially such as a phaeton, dog-cart, commercial sulky, and such like. It is not applied to a gentleman's close carriage. Contraction of tripplings (whatever is "put on") furniture for horses, decorations, etc.

"The trap in question was a carriage which the Major had bought for six pounds ten shillings." — Bear's Game, chap. 17.

Traps. Luggage, as "Leave you trap at the station," "I must look after my trap," etc. (See above.)

"The traps were packed up as quickly as possible, and the party drove away." — Daily Telegraph.

Trapezium. The Count de Trapani was the ninth child of Mary Isabel and Ferdinand II. of the two Sicilies. He married the Archduchess Mary, daughter of Leopold II., Grand Duke of Tuscany.

N.B. Francis de Paul, usually called Louis-Emmanuel, Count of Trapani, was born in 1857.

Trapier. The Spaniards, in putless railery of the Spanish marriages, called the trapos or dishcloths used by waiters in the cafes to wipe down the dirty tables "trapier.

Trapper. In America, is one whose vocation is to set traps for wild animals for the sake of their fur. The Trapper. (See Natty Bumppo.)

Trappista. A religious order, so called from La Trappe, an abbey of the Cistercian order, founded in the middle of the twelfth century.

Trastago. Same as Duende (f. s.),

Travels in the Blue. A brown study; in cloudland.

"Finding him gone for 'travels in the blue,' I assembled my mind and did not resent his long absence." — Remington Dummer, 1883, p. 51.

Traveller's Licence. The long bow; exaggeration.

"If the captain has not taken 'traveller's licence,' we have in Norway a most successful development of peasant proprietorship." — Bowronman.

Travista. An opera representing the progress of a countess. The libretto is borrowed from a French novel, called La Dame aux Camélias, by Alexandre Dumas, jun. It was dramatised for the French stage. The music of the opera is by Giuseppe Verdi.

Tre, Pol, Pen.

"By then Tre, then Pol, and Pen, Ye shall know the Cornish men."

The extreme east of Cornwall is noted for Tre, the extreme west for Pol, the centre for Pen.

On December 19th, 1891, the following residents are mentioned by the Lawrenson Weekly News as attending the funeral of a gentleman who lived at Tre-hummar House, Tresmew — Residents from Trevell, Tremawh, Trethith, Trebarrow, Trelothing, etc., with Treloaven the Mayor of Lanecost is.

Trecle (tr' a-kl) properly means an antidote against the bite of wild beasts (Greek, ther's iaka [pharmakos], from ther, a wild beast). The ancients gave the name to several sorts of antidotes, but ultimately it was applied chiefly to Venice trecle (ther'sica antrodi), a compound of some sixty-four drugs in honey.

"Sir Thomas More speaks of "a most strong trecle (i.e. antidote) against these venomous heresies." And in an old version of Jeremiah viii, 22, "balm" is translated trecle — "Is there no trecle at Gilead?" Is there no physician there?"

Treading on One's Corns. (See Corns.)

Treasures. These are my treasures; meaning the sick and poor. So said St. Lawrence when the Roman priest commanded him to deliver up his treasures. He was then condemned to be roasted alive on a gridiron (268). One day a lady from Campi's niece called upon Cornelia, the mother of the Gracchi, and after showing her jewels, requested in return to see those belonging to the famous mother-in-law of Africanus.

Cornelia sent for her two sons, and said to the lady, "These are my jewels, in which alone I delight."

Treasury of Sciences. Bokhara (Asia), the centre of learning. It has 108 colleges, with 10,000 students, besides a host of schools and 360 mosques.

Tree. The oldest in the world—
(1) De Candolle considers the deciduous cypress of Chapultepec, in Mexico, one of the oldest trees in the world.
(2) The chestnut-trees on Mount Etna, and the Oriental plane-tree in the valley of Bujukure, near Constantinople, are supposed to be of about the same age.
(3) The Rev. W. Tuckwell says the "oldest tree in the world is the Soma cypress of Lombardy. It was forty years old when Christ was born."

Trees of a patriarchal age.

I. Oaks.
(1) Damorey's Oak, Dorsetshire, 2,000 years old; Blown down in 1703.
(2) The great Oak of Saintes, in the department of Charente Inférieure, is from 1,800 to 2,000 years old.
(3) The Winfarthing Oak, Norfolk, and the Bentley Oak, 700 years old at the time of the Conquest.
(4) Cowthorpe Oak, near Wetherby, Yorkshire, according to Professor Burnet, is 1,600 years old.
(5) William the Conqueror's Oak, Windsor Great Park, is at least 1,200 years old.
(6) The Bull Oak, Wedgenock Park, and the Plestor Oak, Colborne, were in existence at the time of the Conquest.
(7) The Oak of the Parishes, in the forest of Parey, St. Ouen, is above 650 years old. Wallace's Oak, at Ellersley, near Paisley, was probably fifty years older. Blown down in 1595.
(8) Owen Glendower's Oak, Shelton, near Shrewsbury, is so called because that chieftain witnessed from its branches the battle between Henry IV. and Harry Percy, in 1403. Other famous oaks are those called The Twelve Apostles and The Four Evangelists.

In the Dukeries, Nottinghamshire, are some oaks of memorable age and renown: (a) In the Duke of Portland's Park is an oak called Robin Hood's Ladder. It is only a shell, held together with strong iron braces.

The Parliament Oak, Clipston, Notts., is said to be above 1,000 years old. We are told that Edward I., hunting in Sherwood Forest, was informed of the Welsh revolt, and summoned a "parliament" of his barons under this oak, and it was agreed to make war of extermination on Wales. Others say it was under this tree that King John assembled his barons and decreed the execution of Prince Arthur. The Parliament Oak is split into two distinct trees, and though both the trunks are hollow, they are both covered with foliage and acorns stop during the season.

The Major Oak, in the park of Lord Manvers, is a veritable giant. In the hollow trunk fifteen persons of ordinary size may find standing room. At its base it measures 90 feet, and at 5 feet from the ground about 35 feet. Its head covers a circumference of 270 yards.

Another venerable oak (some say 1,500 years old) is Greendale Oak, about half a mile from Welbeck Abbey. It is a mere ruin supported by props and chains. It has a passage through the bole large enough to admit three horsemen abreast, and a coach-and-four has been driven through it.

The Seven Sisters Oak, in the same vicinity, is so called because the trunk was composed of seven stems. It still stands, but in a very dilapidated state.

II. Yews.
(1) Of Braughn, in Kent, according to De Candolle, is 3,000 years old.
(2) The Scotch yew at Fortingal, in Perthshire, is between 2,500 and 3,000 years.
(3) Of Darley churchyard, Derbyshire, about 2,050 years.
(4) Of Crowchurch, Surrey, about 1,400.
(5) The three at Fountains Abbey, in Yorkshire, at least 1,200 years. Beneath these trees the founders of the abbey held their council in 1132.
(6) The yew grove of Norbury Park, Surrey, was standing in the time of the Druids.
(7) The yew-trees at Kingsley Bottom, near Chichester, were standing when the sea-kings landed on the Sussex coast.
(8) The yew-trees of Harleyngton churchyard, Middlesex, is above 800 years old.
(9) That at Ankerwycke House, near Staines, was noted when Magna Charta was signed in 1215, and it was the trysting tree for Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn.

III. Miscellaneous.
(1) The right olive-trees on the Mount of Olives were flourishing 800 years ago, when the Turks took Jerusalem.
(2) The lime-tree in the Griscus is upwards of 600 years old.

The spruce will reach the age of 1,200 years.
Tree of Buddha

"The poet's tree." A tree grows over the tomb of Tan-Sein, a musician of incomparable skill at the court of Akbar, and it is said that whoever chews a leaf of this tree will have extraordinary melody of voice. (W. Hunter.)

"His voice was as sweet as if he had chewed the leaves of that enchanted tree which grows on the tomb of the musician Tan-Sein."—More: Life of Ruchoo.

"The singing tree. Each leaf was a mouth, and every leaf joined in concert. (Arabian Nights.)

He is altogether up the tree. Quite out of the swim, nowhere in the competition list.

Up a tree. In a difficulty, in a mess. It is said that Spurgeon used to practise his students in extemporaneous preaching, and that one of his young men, on reaching the desk and opening the note containing his text, read the single word "Zachaeus" and his text. He thought his minute or two, and then delivered himself thus:—"Zachaeus was a little man, so am I; Zachaeus was up a tree, so am I. Zachaeus made haste and came down, and so do I."

Tree of Buddha (The). The bos-tree.

Tree of Knowledge (The). Genesis ii. 9.

Tree of Liberty. A tree set up by the people, hung with flags and devices, and crowned with a cap of liberty. The Americans of the United States planted poplars and other trees during the war of independence, "as symbols of growing freedom." The Jacobins in Paris planted their first tree of liberty in 1790. The symbols used in France to decorate their trees of liberty were tricoloured ribbons, circles to indicate unity, triangles to signify equality, and a cap of liberty. Trees of liberty were planted by the Italians in the revolution of 1848.

Tree of Life. Genesis ii. 9.

Trees. Trees burst into leaf—

Tree of the Sun and Moon. Ornamental trees growing "at the extremity of India," mentioned in the Italian romance of Guerino Macchino.
Trèves

The Holy Coat of Trèves. A relic preserved in the cathedral of Trèves. It is said to be the seamless coat of our Saviour, which the soldiers would not rend, and therefore cast lots for. (John xix. 23, 25.) The Empress Helena, it is said, discovered this coat in the fourth century.

Trias Juncta in Uno. The motto of the Order of the Bath.

Triads. Three subjects more or less connected formed into one continuous poem or subject: thus the Creation, Redemption, and Resurrection would form a triad. The conquest of England by the Romans, Saxons, and Normans would form a triad. Alexander the Great, Julius Caesar, and Napoleon Bonaparte would form a triad. So would Law, Physic, and Divinity. The Welsh triads are collections of historic facts, mythological traditions, moral maxims, or rules of poetry disposed in groups of three.

Trials at Bar. Trials which occupy the attention of the four judges in the superior court, instead of at nisi prius. These trials are for very difficult causes, and before special juries. (See Wharton: Law Lexicon, article “Bar.”)

Triamond. Son of Agapē, a fairy: very daring and very strong. He fought on horseback, and employed both sword and shield. He married Canace. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. iv.) (See Priamond.)

Triangles. Tied up at the triangles. A machine to which a soldier was at one time fastened when flogged. “He was tied up at the triangles, and branded D.”—Olinda: Under Two Flags, chap. vii.

Triangular Part of Men (The). The body. Spenser says, “The divine part of man is circular, but the mortal part is triangular.” (Faerie Queene, book ii. 9.)

Tribune. Last of the Tribunes. Cola di Bienni, who assumed the title of “Tribune of liberty, peace, and justice.” Bienni is the hero of one of Lord Lytton’s most vigorous works of fiction, (1813-1864.)

Tribune of the People (A). A democratic leader.

“Delmar had often spoken of Ainsa, and of his power in the East End, and had come to the conclusion that he was no ordinary man, this tribune of the people.”—T. Terrell: Lady Delmar, bk. ii. chap. vii.

Trias. I’ll do it in a trias. The hour is divided into minutes, seconds, and trices or thirds. I’ll do it in a minute. I’ll do it in a second, I’ll do it in a trias.

Trick. An old dog learns no tricks. When persons are old they do not readily conform to new ways. The Latin proverb is “Senex pultiens neglipit feri-lam;” the Greeks said, “Nekron ıa-reun ei kai geronta novetheis tauton esis;” the Germans say, “Ein alter hund ist nicht gut kundigen.”

Tricolour. Flags or ribbons with three colours, assumed by nations or insurgents as symbols of political liberty. The present European tricolour ensigns are for—

Belgium, black, yellow, red, divided vertically.

France, blue, white, red, divided vertically. (See below.)

Holland, red, white, blue, divided horizontally.

Italy, green, white, red, divided vertically.

Tricolour of France. The insurgents in the French Revolution chose the three colours of the city of Paris for their symbol. The three colours were first devised by Mary Stuart, wife of Francois II. The white represented the royal house of France; the blue, Scotland; and the red, Switzerland, in compliment to the Swiss guards, whose livery it was. The heralds afterwards tinctured the shield of Paris with the three colours, expressed in heraldic language: “Paris portait de gueules, sur venteau d’argent, flottant sur des ondes de même, le chef coumis de France” (a ship with white sails, on a red ground, with a blue chef). The usual tale is that the insurgents in 1789 had adopted for their flag the two colours, red and blue, but that Lafayette persuaded them to add the Bourbon white, to show that they bore no hostility to the king. The first flag of the Republicans was green. The tricolour was adopted July 11th, when the people were disgusted with the king for dismissing Necker.

“ If you will wear a livery, let it at least be that of the city of Paris—blue and red.”—Dumas: Ste 1ma. Afterwards, chap. xiv.

Trieste (2 syl.). Since 1816 it has Trigon. The junction of three signs.
The zodiac is partitioned into four trigons, named respectively after the four elements; the watery trigon includes Cancer, Scorpio, and Pisces; the fiery, Aries, Leo, and Sagittarius; the earthy, Taurus, Virgo, and Capricornus; and the airy, Gemini, Libra, and Aquarius.

Trif'esy. A group of three tragedies.
Everyone in Greece who took part in the poetic contest had to produce a trilogy and a satyr play. We have only one specimen, and that is by Eschylus, embracing the Agamemnon, the Choephoroe, and the Eumenides.

Trimalchii. The Anglo-Saxon name for the month of May, because in that month they began to milk their knee three times a day.

Trimmer. One who runs with the hare and holds with the hounds. George Savile, Marquis of Halifax, adopted the term in the reign of Charles II. to signify that he was neither an extreme Whig nor an extreme Tory. Dryden was called a trimmer, because he professed attachment to the king, but was the avowed enemy of the Duke of York.

Tris'culo. A jester in Shakespeare's Tempest.

Trine. In astrology, a planet distant from another one-third of the circle is said to be in trine; one-fourth, it is in square; one-sixth or two signs, it is in sextile; but when one-half distant, it is said to be "opposite."

"In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite
Of nosum efficacy.
Molion: Paradise Lost, x 469"

N.B. Planets distant from each other six signs or half a circle have opposite influences, and are therefore opposed to each other.

Tris'tity. Tertullian (160-248) introduced this word into Christian theology. The word tristia is much older. Almost every mythology has a threefold deity. (See There.)

Tripos. A Cambridge term, meaning the three honour classes into which the best men are disposed at the final examination, whether of Mathematics, Law, Theology, or Natural Science, etc. The word is often emphatically applied to the voluntary classical examination.

Trojan War. (See above.)

Triumph. A term applied to the three classes into which the canonical writings of the Buddha are divided—viz. the Sutrás, the Vinaya, and the Abhidharma. (See These Words.)

Triple Alliance. A treaty entered into by England, Sweden, and Holland against Louis XIV. in 1668. It ended in the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. (See Next Page.)

A treaty between England, France, and Holland against Charles XII. This league was called the Quadruple after Germany joined it. (1717.)

A third (1789) between Great Britain, Holland, and Russia, against Catherine of Russia in defence of Turkey.

A fourth in 1833, between Germany, Italy, and Austria, against France and Russia.
Trismegistus

Trismegistus [three greatest]. Hermes, the Egyptian philosopher, or Thoth, councillor of Osiris, King of Egypt, to whom is attributed a host of inventions amongst others the art of writing in hieroglyphics, the first code of Egyptian laws, harmony, astrology, the lute and lyre, magic, and all mysterious sciences.

Tristram (Sir), Tristrem, Tristan, or Tristam. Son of Boulaud Riese, Lord of Ermonice, and Blanche Fleur, sister of Marike, King of Cornwall. Having lost both his parents, he was brought up by his uncle. Tristram, being wounded in a duel, was cured by Ysolde, daughter of the Queen of Ireland, and on his return to Cornwall told his uncle of the beautiful princess. Marike sent to solicit her hand in marriage, and was accepted. Ysolde married the king, but was in love with the nephew, with whom she had guilty connection. Tristram being banished from Cornwall, went to Brittany, and married Ysolt of the White Hand, daughter of the Duke of Brittany. Tristram then went on his adventures, and, being wounded, was informed that he could be cured only by Ysolde. A messenger is dispatched to Cornwall, and is ordered to host a white sail if Ysolde accompanies him back. The vessel came in sight with a white sail displayed; but Ysolt of the White Hand, out of jealousy, told her husband that the vessel had a black sail flying, and Tristram instantly expired. Sir Tristram was one of the knights of the Round Table. Gotfrid of Strasbourg, a German minnesanger (minstrel) at the close of the twelfth century, composed a romance in verse, entitled Tristan et Isole. It was continued by Ulrich of Turheim, by Henry of Freyberg, and others, to the extent of many thousand verses. The best edition is that of Breslau, two vols. 8vo, 1823. (See Ysolt, Hermit.)

Sir Tristram's horse. Passetreul.

Triton. Son of Neptune, represented as a fish with a human head. It is this sea-god that makes the roaring of the ocean by blowing through his shell.

"Hear old Triton blow his wreathed horn (hear the sea roar)."

A Triton among the minnows. The sun among inferior lights Luna inter minores ignes.

Triumph. A word formed from thrísambo, the Dionysiac hymn.

"Some . . . have assigned the origin of . . . triumphal processions to the mythic songs of Dionysus, after his conquests in the East, the version being known also as the Dionysiac hymn." -Petru: Horace the Epigramm. 1, chap. 11.

Trivet. Right as a trivet. (See Right.)

Trivis. Goddess of streets and ways. Gay has a poem in three books so entitled.

"Thou, Trivis, aid my song Through spacious streets conduct thy bard Along to save thy king, and smooth the broken way of earth from her womb a flinty tribute pays." Gay. Trivis, bk. 1.

Trivial, strictly speaking, means "belonging to the beaten road." (Latin, trivium, which is not tres viae [three roads], but from the Greek tribo [to rub], meaning the worn or beaten path.) As what comes out of the road is common, so trivial means of little value. Trench connects this word with trivium (the three or cross ways), and says the gossp cast on at these places gave rise to the present meaning of the word.

Trivium. The three elementary subjects of literary education up to the twelfth century—Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic. (See Quadrivium.)

N.B. Theology was introduced in the twelfth century.

Trochilus (The). says Barrow, "enters with impunity into the mouth of the crocodile. This is to pick from the teeth a leech which greatly torments the creature."

"Not half so bold The punky bird that dares, with trailing Humbly within the crocodile's stretched jaws to come." Thomas Moore. Lalla Rookh, pit. 1.

Trog'lydotes (3 syl.). A people of Ethiopia, south-east of Egypt. Remains of their cave dwellings are still to be seen along the banks of the Nile. There were Troglydotes of Syria and Arabia also, according to Strabo. Pliny (v. 8) asserts that they fed on serpents. (Greek, trog'le, a cave; dhún, to get into.)

"King François, of eternal memory, abolished these abominable snake-eaters"—Basilius Lupus of Pantagrol (Ch. 1, Sec. 17)

Trog'lydote. A person who lives so secluded as not to know the current events of the day, is so self-opinionated as to condemn everyone who sees not eye to eye with himself, and scorns everything that comes not within the scope of his own approval; a detractor; a critic. The Saturday Review introduced this use of the word. (See above.)

Miners are sometimes facetiously called Troglydotes.

Trolus (3 syl.). The prince of chivalry, one of the sons of Pristam, killed by Achilles in the siege of Troy (Homer's Iliad). The loves of Trolus and Cresida, celebrated by Shakespeare.
and Chaucer, form no part of the old classic tale.

As true as Troilus. Troilus is meant by Shakespeare to be the type of constancy, and Cressida the type of female inconstancy. (See Cressida.)

"After all comparisons of truth...
'As true as Troilus' shall crown up the verse,
And sanctify the numbers."

Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

Troilus and Cressida (Shakespeare). The story was originally written by Lollius, an old Lombard author, and since by Chaucer (Pope). Chaucer's poem is from Boccaccio's Filostrato.

Trois pour Cent. A cheap hat.

"Running with bare head about,
While the town is tempest-tost,
Prentice had unheed'd shew'd
That their three-pence-cent are lost."

Desaguer's: Le Fierre du Cofe.

Trojan. He is a regular Trojan. A fine fellow, with good courage and plenty of spirit; what the French call a brave homme. The Trojans in Homer's Iliad and Virgil's Æneid are described as truthful, brave, patriotic, and confiding.

"There they may right, and like true Trojans" (Butler: Hudibras, i. 1.)

Trojan War (Ther). The siege of Troy by the Greeks. After a siege of ten years the city was taken and burnt to the ground. The last year of the siege is the subject of Homer's Iliad; the burning of Troy and the flight of Æneas is a continuation by Virgil in his Æneid.

The Trojan War, by Henry of Veldig; (Weldeck), a minnesinger (twelfth century) is no translation of either Homer or Virgil, but a German adaptation of the old tale. By far the best part of this poetical romance is where Lavinia tells her tale of love to her mother.

Troilus. Dwarfs of Northern mythology, living in hills or mounds; they are represented as stumpy, misshapen, and humbacked, inclined to thieving, and fond of carrying off children or substituting one of their own offspring for that of a human mother. They are called hill-people, and are especially averse to noise, from a recollection of the time when Thor used to be for ever flinging his hammer after them. (Icelandic, troll.) (See FAIRY.)

"Out then spake the tiny Troll;"
"No bigger than an enameled pea." (Danish ballad, Elisas of Vilemork.)

Trolly. A cart used in mines and on railways. A railway trolly is worked by the hand, which moves a treadle; a coal-mine trolly used to be pushed by trolly-boys; ponies are now generally employed instead of boys. (Welsh, trol, a cart; trollo, to roll or trundle, whence "to troll a catch"—i.e. to sing a catch or round.)

Trompée. Votre religion a été trompée.
You have been greatly imposed upon. Similarly, "Suprendre la religion de quelqu'un" is to deceive or impose upon one. Cardinal de Bonnechose used the former phrase in his letter to The Times respecting the Report of the Ecumenical Council, and it puzzled the English journals, but was explained by M. Notterelle. (See The Times, January 1st, 1870.)

We use the word faith both for credulity and for religion—e.g.
"Your faith (credulity) has been imposed upon." The "Catholic faith," "Mahometan faith," "Brahminical faith," etc., virtually mean "religion."

Tromen, Tronis, or Trophy Money, or Trophy Tax. "A duty of fourpence [in the pound] paid annually by housekeepers or their landlords, for the drums, colours [trophies], etc., of the companies or regiments of militia." (Dr. Scott's Bailey's Dictionary.)

Troopers mean troopships, as "Indian troopers," ships for the conveyance of troops to India, especially between February and October, when the annual reliefs of British forces in India are made. Similarly, whaler is a ship for whaling.

Troops of the Line. All numbered infantry or marching regiments, except the foot-guards.

Trophon'ios (Greek), Latin, Tropho'nium. He has visited the cave of Trophonious (Greek). Said of a melancholy man. The cave of Trophonious was one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. The entrance was so narrow that he who went to consult the oracle had to lie on his back with his feet towards the cave, whereupon he was caught by some unseen force and violently pulled inside the cave. After remaining there a time, he was driven out in similar fashion, and looked most ghastly pale and terrified; hence the proverb.

Troubadours (3 syl.). Minstrels of the south of France in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries; so called from the Provençal verb troubere (to invent). Our word poet signifies exactly the same thing, being the Greek for "create." (See Trouvères.)
Trouble means a moral whirlwind. (Latin, turba, a whirlwind; Italian, turba; French, troublé.) Disturb is from the same root. The idea pervades all such words as agitation, commotion, vexation, a tossing up and down, etc.

Trouillorgan's Advice. Do and do not; yes and no. When Pantagruel asked the philosopher Trouillorgan whether Panurge should marry or not, the philosopher replied, "Yes." "What say you?" asked the prince. "What you have heard," answered Trouillorgan. "What I have heard," said Pantagruel. "What I have spoken," rejoined the sage. "Good," said the prince; "but tell me plainly, shall Panurge marry or let it alone?" "Neither," answered the oracle. "How?" said the prince; "that cannot be." "Then both," said Trouillorgan. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iii. 35.)

Trout is the Latin trota, from the Greek trokes, the greedy fish (trago, to eat). The trout is very voracious, and will devour any kind of animal food.

"(Roland) was...engaged in a keen and animated discussion about Lochleven trout and sea trout, and river trout and bull trout, and eel which never rise to the fly, and perch which some suppose to be infant salmon, and herrings which frequent the Nith, and eels which are only found in the castle Loch of Lochmaben."—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, chap. xvii.

Trouveres (2 syl.) were the troubadours of the north of France, in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries. So called from trouser, the Walloon verb meaning "to invent." (See Troubadours.)

Trouvatore (1) (4 syl.) Manrico, the son of Garzia, brother of the Comte di Luna. Verdi's opera so called is taken from the drama of Gargia Gutierrez, which is laid in the fifteenth century. Trouvatore means a troubadour.

Trols. Dwarfs of Orkney and Shetland mythology, similar to the Scandinavian Trolls. There are land-trows and sea-trows. "Trow tak' thee" is a phrase still used by the island women when angry with their children.

Troxa'tas [bread-eater]. King of the mices and father of Paycar'pax, who was drowned. "Fix their counsel... Where great Troxartas crowned in glory reigns... Paycar'pax' father, father now no more!"

Troy-Novant (London). This name gave rise to the tradition that Brute, a Trojan refugee, founded London and called it New Troy; but the word is British, and compounded of Tri-nobhaut (inhabitants of the new town). Civitas Triknobantum, the city of the Triknobantes, which we might render "Newtownsmen."

"For noble Britons sprang from Trojans bold, And Troy-novant was built of old Troyan sails cold."

Nonsense: Fannie Quinns, iii. 9.

Troy-town has no connection with the Homeric "Troy," but means a maze, labyrinth, or bower. (Welsh Troy, to turn; trod, a trodden place [? street], whence the archaic trode, a path or track; Anglo-Saxon thræw-an, to twist or turn.) There are numerous Trosys and Troy-towns in Great Britain and North America. The upper garden of Kensington Palace was called "the siege of Troy."

"A Troy-town is about equivalent to "Julian's Bower," mentioned in Halliwell's Archæic Dictionary.

Troy Weight means "London weight." London used to be called Troy-novant. (See above.) The general notion that the word is from Troyes, a town of France, and that the weight was brought to Europe from Grand Cairo by crusaders, is wholly untenable, as the term Troy Weight was used in England in the reign of Edward the Confessor. Troy weight is old London weight, and Avoirdupois the weight brought over by the Normans. (See AVOIRDUPES.)

Truce of God. In 1010 the Church forbade the barons to make any attack on each other between sunset on Wednesday and sunrise on the following Monday, or upon any ecclesiastical fast or feast day. It also provided that no man was to molest a labourer working in the fields, or to lay hands on any implement of husbandry, on pain of excommunication. (See PEACE OF GOD.)

Truces. Faithless and fatal truces. The Emperor Antonius Caracalla destroyed the citizens of Alexandria, at one time, and at another cut off the attendants of Artabanus, King of Persia, under colour of marrying his daughter. Jacob's children destroyed the Shechemites to avenge the rape of Dinah. Gallienus, the Roman Emperor, put to death the military men in Constantinople. Antonius, under colour of friendship, enticed Artavasdes of Armenia; then, binding him in heavy chains, put him to death.
Truehuelga. A very small trout with which Don Quixote was regaled at the road-side inn where he was dubbed knight. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, bk. i. chap. ii.)

True Blue—that is, “Coventry blue,” noted for its fast dye. An epithet applied to a person of inflexible honesty and fidelity.

True-lovers’ Knot is the Danish trueloves knot, “a betrothment bond,” not a compound of true and lover. Thus in the Icelandic Gospel the phrase, “a virgin espoused to a man.” is, er trulofad var einum manni.

Three times a true-love’s knot I tie secure.
Call be the knot, firm may his love endure.”
Gay’s Pastorals. The Spell

True as Touch. The reference is to a gold test by the touchstone (q.v.).

If thou invest me too much
It will not prove as true as touch.”
Love me Little, Love me Long (1570).

True Thomas and the Queen of Elfland. An old romance in verse by Thomas the Rymer.

True Thomas. Thomas the Rymer was so called from his prophecies, the most noted of which was the prediction of the death of Alexander III. of Scotland, made to the Earl of March in the Castle of Dunbar the day before it occurred. It is recorded in the Scotichronicon of Fordun. (1430.) (See RYMER.)

Truempenny. Hamlet says to the Ghost, “Art thou there, Truempenny?” Then to his comrades, “You hear this fellow in the cellarage?” (1. 6.) And again, “Well said, old mole; canst work?” Truempenny means earth-borer or mole (Grec. trupanum, troplao, to bore or perforate), an excellent word to apply to a ghost “boring through the cellarage” to get to the place of purgatory before cock-crow. Miners use the word for a run of metal or metallic earth, which indicates the presence and direction of a lode.

Trulli. Female spirits noted for their kindness to men. (Randel Holms: Academy of Armory.)

Trump. To trump up. To devise or make up falsely; to concoct.

Trump Card. The French carte de triumffe (card of triumph).

Trumpet. To trumpet one’s good deeds. The allusion is to the Pharisian sect called the Almsgivers, who had a trumpet sounded before them, ostensibly to summon the poor together, but in reality to publish abroad their almsgiving and benevolence.

You sound your own trumpet. The allusion is to heralds, who used to announce with a flourish of trumpets the knights who entered a list.

Trumpeter. Your trumpet is dead—i.e. you are obliged to sound your own praises because no one will do it for you.

Trumpets (Feast of). A Jewish festival, held on the first two days of Tisri, the beginning of the ecclesiastical year.

Trundle. A military earthwork above Goodwood. The area is about two furlongs. It has a double vallum. The situations of the portals are still to be traced in the east, west, and north. The fortifications of the ancient Britons being circular, it is probable that the Trundle is British. The fortified encampments of the Romans were square; examples may be seen at the Brulye, near Chichester, and on Ditching Hill.

Truss his Points (To). To tie the points of hose. The points were the cords pointed with metal, like shoe-laces, attached to doublets and hose; being very numerous, some second person was required to “truss” them or fasten them properly.

I hear the, said (Sir Piers) clamorous for someone to truss his points. He will find himself fortunate if he pleases any here who can do him the office of groom of the chamber.”—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xvi.

Truts. The combinations called rings or corners in the commercial world. The chief merchants of an article (say sugar, salt, or flour) combine to fix the selling price of a given article and thus secure enormous profits. These enterprises are technically called “trusts,” because each of the merchants is on trust not to undersell the others, but to remain faithful to the terms agreed on.

Truth. Piatte said, “What is truth?” This was the great question of the Platonists. Plato said we could know truth if we could sublimate our minds to their original purity. Arcesilaus said that man’s understanding is not capable of knowing what truth is. Cressides maintained that not only our understanding could not comprehend it, but even our senses are wholly inadequate to help us in the investigation. Gorgias the Sophist said, “What is right but what we prove to be right? and what is truth but what we believe to be truth?”
Truth in a Well

Try'annon. Daughter of the fairy king who lived on the island of Oléron. "She was as white as lily in May," and married Sir Launfal, King Arthur's steward, whom she carried off to "Oli- roun her jolif isle," and, as the romance says—

"Since saw him in this land no man. Nor no more of him tell I can. For sooth without lie."

Thomas Chastre: Sir Launfal (15th century).

Trygon. A poisonous fish. It is said that Tele'gonus, son of Ulysses by Circe, coming to Ith'aca to see his father was denied admission by the servants; whereupon a quarrel ensued, and his father, coming out to see what was the matter, was accidentally struck with his son's arrow, pointed with the bone of a trygon, and died.

Ts'in Dynasty. The fourth Imperial Dynasty of China, founded by Tchao-siang-wang, prince of Ts'in, who conquered the "fighting kings" (q.v.). He built the Wall of China (b.c. 211).

Tsung Dynasty. The nineteenth Imperial Dynasty of China, founded by Tchao-quang-yu, the guardian and chief minister of Yung-tee. He was a descendent of Tchung-tsong, the Tartar general, and on taking the yellow robe assumed the name of T'ai-tou (great ancestor). This dynasty, which lasted 300 years, was one of the most famous in Chinese annals. (960-1276.)

Tu Ament. Come to the last clause. In the long Latin grace at St. John's College, Cambridge, the last clause used to be "Tu ament, miere're met, Domine. Amen." It was not unusual for a scholar read slowly, for the senior Fellow to whisper "Tu ament"—i.e. Skip all the rest and give us only the last sentence.

Tu 'tas Voulu, George Dandin (If's your own fault, George Dandin).
You brought this upon yourself; as you have made your bed so you must lie on it. (See Dandin.)

Tu Quoque. The tu quoque style of argument. Personal invectives; argument of personal application; argumentum ad hominem.

"We rise in this work his usual tu quoque style."—Public Opinion.

Tuck

Tu-rul-lu, the refrain of comic songs, is a corruption of the Italian turullo, and the French turuloure or soleure.

"Loure" is an old French word for a bagpipe, and "toure loure" means a refrain on the bagpipe. The refrain of a French song published in 1697 is—

Tub. A tale of a tub. A cock-and-bull story; a rigmarole, nonsensical romance. The Tale of a Tub is a religious satire by Dean Swift.

Throw a tub to the whale. To create a diversion in order to avoid a real danger; to bamboozle or mislead an enemy. In whaling, when a ship is threatened by a whole school of whales, it is usual to throw a tub into the sea to divert their attention, and to make off as fast as possible.

A tub of naked children. Emblematical of St. Nicholas, in allusion to two boys murdered and placed in a picking tub by a landlord, but raised to life again by this saint. (See Nicholas.)

Tub, Tubbing. Tubs, in rowing slang, are gig pairs of college boat clubs, who practice for the farm's races. They are pulled on one side when a pair-oar boat in uniform makes its appearance. Tubbing is taking out pairs under the supervision of a coach to train men for taking part in the races.

Tub woman (A). A drawer of beer at a country public-house.

"The common people had always a tradition that the queen's grandmother . . . had been a washerwoman, or, as Cardinal York asserted, a tub-woman—that is, a drawer of beer at a country public-house."—Hovell: History of England; Anne, p. 171.

Tuba [happiness]. A tree of Paradise; of gigantic proportions, whose branches stretched out to those who wish to gather their produce; not only all luscious fruits, but even the flesh of birds already cooked, green garments, and even horses ready saddled and bridled. From the root of this tree spring the rivers of Paradise, flowing with milk and honey, wine and water, and from the banks of which may be picked up inestimable gems.

Tuck. A long narrow sword. (Gaelic, tuca, Welsh tucca, Italian stocca, German stock, French estoc.) In Hamlet the word is erroneously printed "stuck," in Malone's edition.

"If he by chance escape your venomous tuck, Our purpose may hold there."—Act iv. 7.
A good tuck in or tuck out. A good feed. To tuck is to full, a tucker is a fuller. Hence, to cram. The fold of a dress to allow for growth is called a tuck, and a little frill on the top thereof is called a tucker. (Anglo-Saxon, tuca-tia.)

I'll tuck him up. Stab him, do for him. Tuck is a small dirk used by artillerymen. (See above.)

Tukey. Food. "A tuck in," a cram of food. (See above.)

"No," said Palliser, "we've no food."
"By Jove," said the other, "I'll search creation for tucker to-night. Give me your gun." (H. G. W. A. S. T.)

Tuffet (A). A small tuft or clump. Strange that this word, so universally known, has never been introduced into our dictionaries, to the best of my knowledge.

"Little M is Muffet Eating her curds and whey..."

Nursery Rhymes.

Tuff. A nobleman or fellow commoner. So called at Oxford because he wears a gold tuft or tassel on his college cap.

Tuff-hunter. A nobleman's toady; one who tries to curry favour with the wealthy and great for the sake of feeding on the crumbs which fall from the rich man's table. A University term. (See above.)

Tug. A name by which collegers are known at Eton. Either from tug (the gown worn in distinction to Oppidans), or from "tough mutton."

"A name in college handed down
From mutton tough or ancient gown."

The World, February 17, 1893 (p. 31).

Tug of War (The), a rural sport, in which a number of men or boys, divided into two bands, lay hold of a strong rope and pull against each other till one side has hugg'd the other over the dividing line.

Tuleries (Paris) [tile-kilns]. The palace was on the site of some old tile-kilns. (See SABOONIERE.)

Tulcan Bishops. Certain Scotch bishops appointed by James I., with the distinct understanding that they were to hand over a fixed portion of the revenue to the patron. A tulcan is a stuffed calf-skinned, placed under a cow that withholds her milk. The cow, thinking the "tulcan" to be her calf, readily yields her milk to the milk-pail.

Tulip. The turban plant; Persian, thanayb (toumayban, a turban), by which name the flower is called in Persia.

My tulip. A term of endearment to animals, as "Gee up, my tulip!" or "Kim up, my tulip!" Perhaps a pun suggested by the word tool. A donkey is a costermonger's tool.

Tulip Mania. A reckless mania for the purchase of tulip-bulbs in the seventeenth century. Beckmann says it rose to its greatest height in the years 1634-1637. A root of the species called Viceroy sold for £250; Semper Augustus, more than double that sum. The tulips were grown in Holland, but the mania which spread over Europe was a mere stock-jobbing speculation.

Tumbledown Dick. Anything that will not stand firmly. Dick is Richard, the Protector's son, who was but a tottering wall at best.

Tun. Any vessel, even a goblet or cup. (Anglo-Saxon tunne.)

"Tun, such a cup as juglers use to show divers tricks by." — Alison: Spanish Dictionary.

Tundra. A thirsting with ashen sticks given to a school-fellow by one of the monitors or "praecetxs" of Winchester school, for breach of discipline. (Latin tunda, to beat or bruise.)

Tune the Old Cow Died of (The). Advise instead of relief; remonstrance instead of help. As St. James says (ii. 13, 16), "If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say to them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled; notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body; what doth it profit?" Your words are the tune the old cow died of. The reference is to the well-known song—

"There was an old man, and he had an old cow,
But he had no fodder to give her.
So he took up his fliddle and played her the tune—"

"Consider, good cow, consider,"
"This isn't the tune for the grass to grow."
"Consider, good cow, consider;"

Tuneful Nine. The nine Muses: Calliopé (epic poetry), Clio (history), Erato (elegy and lyric poetry), Euterpe (music), Melpomene (tragedy), Polyhymnia (sacred song), Terpsichore (dancing), Thalia (comedy), Urania (astronomy).

Tunngoose. The entertainment given in Yorkshire when the corn at harvest was all safely stacked.

Tunusian. The adjective form of Tunisian.

Tunkers. A politico-religious sect of Ohio. They came from a small German village on the Eder. They believe all will be saved; are Quakers in plainness of dress and speech; and will neither fight, nor go to law. Both sexes are equally eligible for any office. Caliban is the highest honour, but not imperative. They are also called Tumblers, and incorrectly Dunkers. Tunkor means "to dip a morsel into gravy," "a sop into wine," and as they are Baptists this term has been given them; but they call themselves "the harmless people." (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, ii. 18.)

Turc'aret. One who has become rich by hook or by crook, and, having nothing else to display, makes a great display of his wealth. A chevalier in Le Sage’s comedy of the same name.

Tureen. A deep pan for holding soup. (French, terrine, a pan made of terre, earth.)

Turf (The). The racecourse; the profession of horse-racing, which is done on turf or grass. One who lives by the turf, or whose means of living is derived from running horses or betting on races.

"All men are equal on the turf and under it."—Lord George Bentinck.

Turk. Slave, villain. A term of reproach used by the Greeks of Constantinople.

You young Turk, a playful reprimand to a young mischievous child.

Turk Gregory. Gregory VII., called Hildebrand, a furious Churchman, who surmounted every obstacle to deprive the emperor of his right of investiture of bishops. He was exceedingly disliked by the early reformers.

'Turk Gregory never did such deeds in arms as I have done this day."—Henry IV., v. 2.

Turkey. The bird with a red wattle. A native of America, at one time supposed to have come from Turkey.

Turkish Spy was written by John Paul Maru'a, an Italian, who had been imprisoned for conspiracy. After his release he retired to Monza, where he wrote the History of the Plot. Subsequently he removed to Paris, and produced his Turkish Spy, in which he gives the history of the last age.

Turulupin, a punster or farceur, with turulupinade, and the verb turulupiner. It was usual in the 17th century for play-writers in Italy and France to change their names. Thus Le Grand called himself Belleville in tragedy, and Turulupin in farce; Hugues Guérêt took the name of Fléchelles; and Jean Baptiste Poquelin called himself Molière, but there was a Molière before him who wrote plays.

Turmeric, like berberry, being yellow, was supposed to cure the yellow jaundice. According to the doctrine of signatures, Nature labels every plant with a mark to show what it is good for. Red plants are good for fever, white ones for rigor. Hence the red rose is supposed to cure haemorrhage. (See Thistles.)

Turncoat. As the dominions of the duke of Saxony were bounded in part by France, one of the early dukes hit upon the device of a coat blue one side, and white the other. When he wished to be thought in the French interest he wore the white outside; otherwise the outside colour was blue. Whence a Saxon was nicknamed Emmanuel Turncoat. (Scots' Magazine, October, 1747.)

Without going to history, we have a very palpable atyon in the French tourne-cole (turn-side). (See Coat.)

Turning the Tables. (See under Tables.)

Turnip-Garden (The). So called by the Jacobites. George II. was called the "Turnip-hougher" [hoer], and his hiring of troops was spoken of as "selling the turnips," or "trying to sell his roots." Hanover at the time was eminently a pastoral country.

Turnip Townsend. The brother-in-law of Sir Robert Walpole, who, after his retirement from office in 1731, devoted himself to the improvement of agriculture.

Turnspit Dog. One who has all the work but none of the profit; he turns the spit but eats not of the roast. The allusion is to the dog used formerly to turn the spit in roasting. Tossel says, "They go into a wheel, which they turn round about with the weight of their bodies, so diligently . . . . that no drudge . . . . can do the feat more cunningly." (1697.)

Turpin. Archbishop of Rheims. A mythological contemporary of Charlemagne. His chronicle is supposed to be written at Vienne, in Dauphiny, whence it is addressed to Leoprandus, Dean of Aquigranensis (Aix-la-Chapelle). It was not really written till the end of the eleventh century, and the probable author was a canon of Barcelo'na.
The romance turns on the expedition of Charlemagne to Spain in 777, to defend one of his allies from the aggressions of some neighbouring prince. Having conquered Navarre and Aragon, he returned to France. The chronicle says he invested Pampluna for three months without being able to take it; he then tried what prayer could do, and the walls fell down of their own accord, like those of Jericho. These Saracens who consented to become Christians were spared; the rest were put to the sword. Charlemagne then visited the sarcophagus of James, and Turpin baptised most of the neighbourhood. The king crossed the Pyrenees, but the rear commanded by Roland was attacked by 50,000 Saracens, and none escaped.

Turtle Does. Rhyming slang for a pair of gloves. (See Chive.)

Tussle. A struggle, a skirmish. A corruption of tussle (German, zusen, to pull); hence a dog is named Tower (pull 'em down). In the Winter's Tale (iv. 4.), Autolycus says to the Shepherd, "I tose from thee thy business" (pump or draw out of thee). In Measure for Measure, Escalus says to the Duke, "We'll tussle thee joint by joint" (v. 1.).

Tut. A word used in Lincolnshire for a phantom, as the Spittal Hili Tut. Tom Tut will get you is a threat to frighten children. Tut-gotten is panic-struck. Our tush is derived from the word tut.

Tutivilins. The demon who collects all the words skipped over or mutilated by priests in the performance of the services. These literary scamps or shreds he deposits in that pit which is said to be paved with "good intentions" never brought to effect. (Piers Plowman, p. 547; Towneley Mysteries, pp. 310, 319; etc.)

Two Dogs of Robert Burns, perhaps suggested by the Spanish Colloquio de Dos Pervos, by Cervantes.

Twangdille, the fiddler, lost one leg and one eye by a stroke of lightning on the banks of the Ister.

"Yet still the merry ladd without regret Bearing his own lass, and with her bonning shell And çorse platt relieves his dranging friends He stickles every siring, to every pote He bonds his pulate neck, his single eye Twinticles with joy, his active stump bests mine." Somervillia: Hobbinol.

Tweed. Checked cloths for trousers, etc. The origin of this name is supposed to have been a blunder for "tweels," somewhat blotted and badly written in 1829. The Scotch manufacturer sent a consignment of these goods to James Locke, of London, who misread the word, and as they were made on the banks of the Tweed, the name was appropriated and accordingly adopted.

However, the Anglo-Saxon word (tweow), which gave rise to tweed, is a madder root, and tweed and tield are both mean cloth in which the wool crosses the warp vertically.

Tweedledum and Tweedledee. "Some say compared to Bononcini That mynheer Han del's hat is many; Others say that he to Han del Is soe good a fit to hold a candle, Strange all this difference should be Twixt Tweedledum and Tweedledee." J. Byrom.

This refers to the feud between the Bononcinists and Handelists. The Duke of Marlborough and most of the nobility took Bononcini by the hand; but the Prince of Wales, with Pope and Arbutnot, was for Handel. (See Gluckists.)

Twelfth (The), the 12th of August. The first day of grouse-shooting.

Twelfth Cake. The drawing for king and queen is a relic of the Roman Saturnalia. At the close of this festival the Roman children drew lots with beans to see who would be king. Twelfth Day is twelve days after Christmas, or the Epiphany.

Twelfth Night (Shakespeare). The serious plot is taken from Ballofast's Histoires Tragiques. The comic parts are of Shakespeare's own invention. (See Befana.)

Twelve. Each English archer carries twelve Scotchmen under his girdle. This was a common saying at one time, because the English were unerring archers, and each archer carried in his belt twelve arrows (Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, vii.).

The Twelve. All the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church. Of course the Twelve Apostles.

"The Pope identifies himself with the Master, and addresses those who pray as the Twelve."

- The Times, December 11, 1869.

Twelve Tables. The earliest code of Roman law, compiled by the Decemviri, and cut on twelve bronze tablets or tablets (Livy, iii. 37; Diodorus, xii. 66.)

Twickenham. The Bard of Twickenham. Alexander Pope, who lived there for thirty years. (1688-1744.)
Two Strings to his Bow

François II. of France was peculiarly unhappy, and after reigning less than two years, sickened and died; Napoleon II. never reigned at all, and Napoleon III., really the second emperor, was a most disastrous prince; Franz II. of Germany lost all his Rhine possessions, and in 1806 had to renounce his title of emperor.

Friedrich II., Emperor of Germany, was first anatomised, then excommunicated, then dethroned, and lastly poisoned.

Jean II. of France, being conquered at Poitiers, was brought captive to England by the Black Prince; Juan II. of Aragon had to contend for his crown with his own son Carlos.

It was Felipe II. of Spain who sent against England the "Invincible Armada"; it was Francesco II. of the Two Sicilies who was driven from his throne by Garibaldi; it was Romulus II. in whom terminated the empire of the West; Peter II. of Russia died at the age of fifteen, and he was a disgrace to the name of Menshikoff; Pietro II. de' Medici was forced to abdicate, and died of shipwreck; James II. of Scotland was shot by a cannon at the siege of Roxburgh; James II. of Majorca, after losing his dominions, was murdered. Alexander II. of Scotland had his kingdom laid under an interdict; Alexander II., the Pope, had to contend against Honorius II., the anti-pope; Alexis II., Emperor of the East, was placed under the ward of his father and mother, who so disgusted the nation by their cruelty that the boy was first dethroned and then strangled; Andronicus II., Emperor of Greece, was dethroned; Henri II. of France made the disastrous peace called La Paix Malheureuse, and was killed by Montgomery in a tournament; etc. etc. (See Jane and John.)

Two Eyes of Greece. Athens and Sparta.

Two Fridays. When two Fridays come together. Never (q.v.).

Two Gentlemen of Verona. The story of Proteus and Julia was borrowed from the pastoral romance of Diana, by George of Montemayor, a Spaniard, translated into English by Bartholomew Yonge in 1558. The love adventure of Julia resembles that of Viola, in Twelfth Night.

Two Strings to his Bow (He has). He is provided against contingencies; if one business or adventure should fail, he has another in reserve; two sweethearts; two devices, etc.

Latin: "Duabus anchoris nititur" (i.e. "He is doubly moored"), or "Duabus anchoris sia fultus."

Greek: "Ἐκ δύο οὖρων.

French: "Il a deux cordes à son arc."

Italian: "Naviga per piu venti."

"Two of a Trade never agree." The French say, "Pis contre pis n'est bon à faire doubleur—i.e. Two materials of the same nature never unite well together.

"É'en a beggar sees with Woo A beggar to the house-door go."

Greek: "Και πτόχος ποτόχο πθωνεί." (Hesiod.)

Latin: "Etiam mendieus mendieo invidit."

French: "Figitus figulo invidet, faber fabro" ("Potter envies potter, and smith smith").

Two-penny Damn. A vague impression, said to have been commonly used by the great Duke of Wellington. Some have derived it from the Hindu dain, daim = an ancient copper coin, of which 1,600 went to the rupee. Concerning this derivation Dr. Murray says that it is ingenious, but has no foundation in fact. Goldsmith, in the Citizen of the World, uses the expression, "Not that I care three dams."" Tybalt. A Capulet; a "fiery" young noble. (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.)

It is the name given to the cat in the story of Reynard the Fox. Hence Mercutio says, "Tybalt, you rat-catcher, will you walk?" (iii. 1); and again, when Tybalt asks, "What shouldst thou have with me?" Mercutio answers, "Good king of cats! nothing but one of your nine lives!" (iii. 1).

Tyburn is Tica-burne, the "two rivulets," so called because two small rivers met in this locality. Tyburn's triple tree. A gallows, which consists of two uprights and a beam resting on them. Previous to 1783 Tyburn was the chief place of execution in London, and a gallows was permanently erected there. In the reign of Henry VIII. the average number of persons executed annually in England was 2,000. The present number is under twelve.

Kings of Tyburn. Public executioners. (See Hangmen.)

Tyburn Ticket. Under a statute of William III. prosecutors who had secured a capital conviction against a criminal were exempted from all parish and ward offices within the parish in which the felony had been committed. Such persons obtained a Tyburn Ticket, which was duly enrolled and might be sold. The Stamford Mercury (March 27th, 1818) announces the sale of one of these tickets for £280. The Act was repealed by 58 Geo. III., c. 70.

Tyburnia (London). Portman and Grosvenor Squares district, described by Thackeray as "the elegant, the prosperous, the polite Tyburnia, the most respectable district of the habitable globe."

T.Years—i.e. to-year; as, to-day, to-night, to-morrow. (Anglo-Saxon, to-dage, to-gere.)

Tyke. (See Tyke.)

Tyler Insurrection. Wat Tyler's insurrection. An insurrection headed by Wat Tyler and Jack Straw, in consequence of a poll-tax of three groats to defray the expenses of a war with France. (1381.)

Tylwyth Teg (the Fair Family). A sort of Kobold family, but not of diminutive size. They lived in the lake near Brecknock. (Davies: Mythology, etc., of the British Druids.)

Type. Pica (large type), littera pica'ta; the great black letter at the beginning of some new order in the liturgy. Breviary (small type), used in printing the breviary. Primer, now called "long primer," (small type), used in printing small prayer-books called primers.

A feast of types. In an ordinary feast the proportion of the various letters is usually as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>a</th>
<th>b</th>
<th>c</th>
<th>d</th>
<th>e</th>
<th>f</th>
<th>g</th>

Typhæus. A giant with a hundred heads, fearful eyes, and a most terrible voice. He was the father of the Harpies. Zeus [Zeus] killed him with a thunderbolt, and he lies buried under Mount Etna. (Hesiod: Theogony.) (See Giants.)

Typhon. Son of Typhæus, the giant with a hundred heads. He was so tall that he touched the skies with his head. His offspring were Gorgon, Geryon, Cerberus, and the hydra of Lerne. Like his father, he lies buried under Etna. (Homer: Hymns.) (See Giants.)
Typhoon. The evil genius of Egyptian mythology; also a furious whirling wind in the Chinese seas. (Typhoon or typhoon, the whirling wind, is really the Chinese word for "the great wind").

"Beneath the radiant line that girds the globe.
The circling typhoon, whirled from point to point,
Exhausting all the race of all the sky,
And dire Ebruflia, reigns."

Thomson: Summer.

Tyr. Son of Odin, and younger brother of Thor. The wolf Fenrir bit off his hand. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Tyrant did not originally mean a despot, but an absolute prince, and especially one who made himself absolute in a free state. Napoleon III. would have been so called by the ancient Greeks. Many of the Greek tyrants were pattern rulers, as Pisis'irates and Pericles, of Athens; Periander, of Corinth; Dionysios the Younger, Geion, and his brother Hi'ero, of Syracuse; Poly'crates, of Samos; Phid'ion, of Argos, etc. etc. (Greek, tyrannos, an absolute king, like the czar of Russia.)

Tyrant of the Chersonese. Miltiades was so called, and yet was he, as Byron says, "Freedom's best and bravest friend." (See Thirty Tyrants.)

A tyrant's vow. A ranting, bullying manner. In the old moralities the tyrants were made to rant, and the loudness of their rant was proportionate to the villainy of their dispositions. Hence to out-Herod Herod is to rant more loudly than Herod; to o'erdo Termagant is to rant more loudly than Termagant. (See Pilate, Voice.)

Tyre, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, means Holland; Egypt means France.

Tyrtaeus. The Spanish Tyrtaeus, Manuel José Quinta'na, whose odes stimulated the Spaniards to vindicate their liberty at the outbreak of the War of Independence. (1772-1857.)

U

U.S. The United States of North America.

Ube'de. Orbaneia, painter of Ubeda, sometimes painted a cock so post-terribly designed that he was obliged to write under it, "This is a cock." (Cervantes; Don Quixote, pt. ii, bk. i, 3.)

Udal Tenure. The same as "allo- dial tenure," the opposite of "feudal tenure." Feudal tenure is the holding of a tenement of land under a feudal lord. Udal tenure is a sort of freehold, held by the right of long possession. (Icelandic, othal, allocidal.)

Ugly means hag-like. Mr. Dyer derives it from ouph-lie, like an ough or gooblin. The Welsh ha'ger, ugly; would rather point to hag-lie, like a hag; but we need only go to the Old English verb ugge, to feel an abhorrence of, to stand in fear of. (Icelandic, uggligr, uggr, horror.)

"For the payne are so felle and harde......
That all man may usize bothe showing and awile;"

Hampole, Ms. Bores, p. 189.

Ugly. (See Pierre du Coignet.)

Ugly as Sin.

"Sin is a creature of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen;"
Pope.

Ugo'lin. Count of Pisa, deserted his party the Ghibellines, and with the hope of usurping supreme power in Pisa formed an alliance with Giovanni Visconti, the head of the Guelph party, who promised to supply him secretly with soldiers from Sardinia. The plot was found out, and both were banished. (Giovanni died, but the latter joined the Florentines, and forced the Pisans to restore his territories. In 1284 Genoa made war against Pisa, and Count Ugolino treacherously deserted the Pi-sans, causing their total overthrow. At length a conspiracy was formed against him, and in 1288 he was cast with his two sons and two grandsons into the tower of Gualdi, where they were all starved to death. Dante, in his Inferno, has given the sad tale an undying interest.

N.B. Count Ugolino was one of the noble family of Gheradesca, and should be styled Ugolino Count of Gheradesca.

Uhl'an (German). A horse-soldier chiefly employed in reconnoitering, skirmishing, and outpost duty.

Uka'as (2 syll.). A Russian term for an edict either proceeding from the senate or direct from the emperor. (Russian, ukaza, an edict.)

Ul-Erin. "The Guide of Ireland." A star supposed to be the guardian of that island. (Ogwen: Temora, iv.)

Ula'nis, Queen of Perdura or Isinda, sent a golden shield to Charlemagne, which he was to give to his brave... paladin. Whoever could win the shield from this paladin was to claim the hand of Ulia in marriage. (Orlando Furi-Ulema. In Turkey, either a member of the college or the college itself. The Ulema consists of the imams, muftis, and cadis (ministers of religion, doctors of law, and administrators of justice). "Ulema" is the plural of ultim, a wise man.

"The Ulema is not an ecclesiastical body, except so far as law in Moslem countries is based on the Koran."—Creasy: Ottoman Turks, vi. 165.

Uler. The god of archery and the chase. No one could outstrip him in his snow-shoes. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Ullin. Fingal's aged bard. (Ossian.) Lord Ullin's Daughter. A ballad by Campbell. She eloped with the chief of Ulva's Isle, and, being pursued, induced a boatman to row them over Lochgyle during a storm. The boat was overwhelmed just as Lord Ullin and his retinue reached the lake. In an agony of distress, he now promised to forgive the fugitives, but it was too late: "the waters wild rolled o'er his child, and he was left lamenting."

Ulric. Son of Count Siegendorf. He rescues Stralenbein from the Oder, but, being informed by his father that the man he had saved is the enemy of their house, he murders him. (Byron: Werner.)

St. Ulric. Much honoured by fishermen. He died 973 on ashes strewned in the form of a cross upon the floor.

Ulster. A long loose overcoat, worn by males and females, and originally made of frieze cloth in Ulster.

Ulster. The Red Hand of Ulster. (See under HAND, The open red hand.)

Ulster Badge. A sinister hand, erect, open, and couped at the wrist (gates), sometimes borne in a canton, and sometimes on the escutcheon. (See under HAND as above.)

Ulster King of Arms. Chief heraldic officer of Ireland. Created by Edward VI. in 1552.

Ultima Thule. (See Thule.)

Ultimatum (Latin). A final proposal, which, if not accepted, will be followed by hostilities proceeding.

Ultimun Vale (Latin). A finishing stroke, a final coup.

"Aitropos, cutting off the thread of his life, gave me ultimus sine to my good fortune."—The Seven Champions of Christendom, III, 4.

Ultimus Romanorum. So Horace Walpole was posteroously called, (1717-1797.) (See Last of the Romans.)

"Carlyle's so called Dr. Johnson, but he might, with greater propriety, be termed "the last of the Caesars" (1709-

Pope called Congreve "Ultimus Romanorum." (1670-1729.) (See Last of the Romans.)

Ultra Vires. Beyond their legitimate powers. Said of a company when exceeding the licence given to it by Act of Parliament. Thus if a company, which had obtained an Act of Parliament to construct a railway from London to Nottingham were to carry its rails to York, it would be acting ultra vires. If the Bank of England were to set up a mint on their premises, it would be acting ultra vires.

Ultramontane Party. The ultra-

Ulysses. King of Ith'a, a small rocky island of Greece. He is represented in Homer's Iliad as full of artifices, and, according to Virgil, hit upon the device of the wooden horse, by which Troy was ultimately taken. (The word means The Angry or Wraithful.) After the fall of Troy, Ulysses was driven about by tempests for ten years before he reached home, and his adventures form the subject of Homer's other epic, called the Odyssey.

Ulysses. When Palaine des summomed Ulysses to the Trojan war, he found him in a field ploughing with a team of strange animals, and sowing salt instead of barley. This he did to feign insanity, that he might be excused from the expedition. The incident is employed to show what meagre shifts are sometimes resorted to to shuffle out of plain duties.

The Ulysses of the Highlands. Six
Ulysses’ Bow

Only Ulysses could draw his own bow, and he could shoot an arrow through twelve rings. By this sign Penelopé recognised her husband after an absence of twenty years.

Ulysses’ bow was prophetic. It belonged at one time to Eu’retyus of Òechal’a.

“This bow of mine sung to me of present war... I have heard but once of such a weapon, the bow of Odysseus,” said the queen.”—T. E. Hoggard: The World’s Desire, bk. ii. chap. 1.

Una, consort of Siva, famous for her defeat of the army of Chanda and Munda, two demons. She is represented as holding the head of Chanda in one of her four hands, and trampling on Munda. The heads of the army, strung into a necklace, adorn her body, and a girdle of the same surrounds her waist.

Umber. The paint so called was first made in Umbria, Italy.

Umble-pie. A pie made of umbles—i.e. the liver, kidneys, etc., of a deer. These “refuse” were the perquisites of the keeper, and umble-pie was a dish for servants and inferiors.

The keeper hath the skin, head, umble, chine, and shoulders.”—Hazlitt: Chorography, p. 264.

Umbra. Obscureous Umbra, in Garth’s Dispensary, is Dr. Gould.

Umbrage. To take umbrage. To take offence. Umbrage means shade (Latin, umbra), a gloomy view.

Umbrella. Common in London in 1710. First used in Edinburgh by Dr. Spens. First used in Glasgow in 1789. Mentioned by Dryden in his Mynheer Eliziarum (1630); but Dryden evidently refers to a sort of fan. Quarles’s Emblems (1635) also uses the word to signify the Deity hidden in the manhood of Christ. “Nature is made th’ umbrella of the Deity” (bk. iv. emblem 14).

Dryden’s lines are:

“...And like umbrellas, with their feathers,
Shield you in all sorts of weathers.”

The Egloga tells us, “An umbrella is now being made in London for an African potentate which, when unfurled, will cover a space sufficient for twelve persons. The stick is... fifteen feet long.”—March 16th, 1624, p. 270.

The Tattler, in No. 238 (October 17th, 1710), says:

“The young gentlemen belonging to the Custom House... improved the umbrella from Wilk’s coffee-house.”

So that umbrellas were kept on hire at that date.

Jonas Hanway (born 1712) used an umbrella in London to keep off the rain, and created a disturbance among the sedan porters and public coachmen. So that probably umbrellas were not commonly used in the streets at the time.

“The tucked-up semestrass walks with hasty strides,... While streams ran down her oiled umbrella’s sides.”—Swift: A City Shower (1719).

“Or underneath th’ umbrella’s oily shed Safe turn’d the wet on chinking horse’s tread.”—Gay: Trivia, bk. i. (1711).

Umbrella, as, under Gladiatus’s umbrella, means dominion, regimen, influence. The allusion is to the umbrella which, as an emblem of sovereignty, is carried over the Sultan of Morocco. In Travels of Ali Bey (Penny Magazine, December, 1835, vol. iv. 480), we are told, “The retinue of the sultan was composed of a troop of from fifteen to twenty men on horseback. About 100 steps behind them came the sultan, mounted on a mule, with an officer bearing his umbrella, who rode beside him on a mule. . . . Nobody but the sultan himself [not even] his sons and brothers, dares to make use of it.”

“...As a direct competitor for the throne—or, strictly speaking, for the sherry can umbrella—he [Miles Adams] could scarcely hope to escape.”—Nineteenth Century, August, 1892, p. 311.

In 1874 the sacred umbrella of King Koffee Kalcalli, of the Ashantees, was captured. It was placed in the South Kensington Museum.

Una: (Truth, so called because truth is one). She starts with St. George on his adventure, and being driven by a storm into “Wandering Wood,” retires for the night to Hypocrisy’s cell. St. George quits the cell, leaving Una behind. In her search for him she is harassed by a lion, who afterwards attends her. She next sleeps in the hut of Superstition, and next morning meets Hypocrisy dressed as St. George. As they journey together Sanasoy meets them, expose Hypocrisy, kills the lion, and carries off Una on his steed to a wild forest. Una fills the air with her shrieks, and is rescued by the fauna and satyrs, who attempt to worship her, but, being restrained, pay adoration to her ass. She is delivered from the satyrs and fauna by Sir Satyrane, and is told by Archimag to that St. George is dead, but subsequently hears that he is the captive of Orgoglio. She goes to King Arthur for aid, and the king both slays Orgoglio and rescues the knight. Una now takes St. George to the house of Holiness, where he is carefully nursed, and then leads him to Eden, where their union is consummated. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. i.) (See LION.)

Una Serranilla [a little mountain song], by Mendoza, Marquis of Santillana, godfather of Diego Hurtado de Mendoza. This song, of European celebrity, was composed on a little girl found by the marquis tending her father’s flocks on the hills, and is called The Charming Milk-maiden of Sweet Perijma.

Unannel’d (3 syl.). Unannoted; without extreme unction. (Saxon all means “oil,” and an-all to “anoint with oil.”)

“Unhoused” [without the last sacrament], disappointed, unanneled.”
Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

Uncas, the son of Chingachgook; called in French Le Crif Agile (Deer-foot): introduced into three of Fenimore Cooper’s novels—viz. The Last of the Mohicans, The Pathfinder, and The Pioneer.

Uncial Letters. Letters an inch in size. From the fifth to the ninth century. (Latin unius, an inch.)

Uncrowned in Heart and Ears (Acts vii. 51). Obstinately deaf and wilfully obdurate to the preaching of the apostle. Heathenish, and per-versely so.

Uncle. Don’t come the uncle over me.
In Latin, “Ne sis patrum mih” (Horace: 2 Sat., iii. 88)—i.e. do not overdo your privilege of reproving or castigating me. The Latin notion of a patruus or uncle left guardian was that of a severe castigator and reprobator. Similarly, their idea of a step-mother was a woman of sterne, unsympathetic nature, who was unjust to her step-children, and was generally disliked.

“Metuentes patruus verbena linguæ.”—Horace:
3 Odes, xii. 3.

Uncle. Gone to my uncle’s. Uncle’s is a pun on the Latin word unceus, a hook.
Pawnbrokers employed a hook to lift articles pawned before spots were adopted. "Gone to the unceus" is exactly tantamount to the more modern phrase “Up the spout.” The pronoun was inserted to carry out the pun. In French, "C’est chez ma tante." At the pawnbroker’s.

Uncle Tom. (See SAM.)

Under which King discharge of all his duties. Being sold, he has to submit to the most revolting cruelties. (Mrs. Beecher Stowe: Uncle Tom’s Cabin.)

"This tale was founded on the story of Josiah Henson (1781), told to Mrs.
Stowe by Henson himself.

Uneo has two meanings: As an adjective it means unknown, strange, unusual; but as an adverb it means very—as unco good, unco glad, etc. The "unco guid" are the pinchbeck saints, too good by half.

"The race of the ‘unco guid’ is not yet quite extinct in Scotland."—A Daily Journal.

Uncumber (St.), formerly called, St.
Wylgeforte. "Women changed her name" (says Sir Thomas More) "because they reken that for a pecke of oyts she will not faile to uncumber them of their husbandys." The tradition says that the saint was very beautiful, but, wishing to lead a single life, prayed that she might have a board, after which she was no more cumbered with lovers. "For a pecke of oys," says Sir Thomas More, "she would provide a horse for an evil housebonde to ride to the Devil upon."

"If a wife were weary of a husband, she offered oats at Poules ... to St. Uncumber."—Michael Woodes (1531).

Under-current metaphorically means something at work which has an opposite tendency to what is visible or apparent. Thus in the Puritan supra-macy there was a strong under-current of loyalty to the banished prince. Both in air and water there are frequently two currents, the upper one running in one direction, and the under one in another.

Under-spur-leather. An under-strapper; a subordinate; the leather strap which goes under the heel of the boot to assist in keeping the spur in the right place.

"Everett and Dangerfield ... were subordinate informers—a sort of under-spur-leathers, as the cant term went."—Sir W. Scott: Pocci of the Peak, chap. xii.

Under the Rose [sub rosa]. (See article ROSE.)

Under Weigh. The undertaking is already begun. A ship is said to be under weigh when it has drawn its anchors from their moorings, and started on its voyage.

Under which King, Beronian?
Which horn of the dilemma is to be taken? (See BERONIAN.)
Underwriter. An underwriter at Lloyd's. One who insures a ship or its merchandise to a stated amount. So called because he writes his name under the policy.

Undine (2 syl.). The water-nymph, who was created without a soul, like all others of her species. By marrying a mortal she obtained a soul, and with it all the pains and penalties of the human race. (La Motte Fouqué: Undine.)

[See FAIRY, SYLPHS.]

Ungrateful Guest (The). (See Guest.)

Unguern. Ad unguem. To the minutest point. To finish a statue ad unguem is to finish it so smoothly and perfectly that when the nail is run over the surface it can detect no imperfection.

Unhinged. I am quite unhinged. My nerves are shaken, my equilibrium of mind is disturbed; I am like a door which has lost one of its hinges.

Unhoused (3 syl.). Without having had the Eucharist in the hour of death. To housel is to administer the sacrament to the sick in danger of death. Housel is the Saxon hæsel (the Eucharist). Lyce derives it from the Gothic hunās (a victim).

Unicorn. According to the legends of the Middle Ages, the unicorn could be caught only by placing a virgin in his haunts; upon seeing the virgin, the creature would lose its fierceness and lie quiet at her feet. This is said to be an allegory of Jesus Christ, who willingly became man and entered the Virgin’s womb, when He was taken by the hunters of the blood. The one horn symbolises the great Gospel doctrine that Christ is one with God. (Guillaume, Clerc de Norman-die Trouvère.)

* The unicorn has the legs of a buck, the tail of a lion, the head and body of a horse, and a single horn in the middle of its forehead. The horn is white at the base, black in the middle, and red at the tip. The body of the unicorn is white, the head red, and eyes blue. The oldest author that describes it is Ctesias (p. c. 400); Aristotle calls it the Wild Ass; Pliny, the Indian Ass; Lobo also describes it in his History of Abyssinia.

Unicorn. James I. substituted a unicorn, one of the supporters of the royal arms of Scotland, for the red dragon of Wales, introduced by Henry VII. Aristotle refers to the arms of Scotland thus: “You will see two unicorns between that ram and a silver sword in front. Is the king of Scotland’s banner known.” (Boole, iii.)

Unicorn. According to a belief once popular, the unicorn by dipping its horn into a liquid could detect whether or not it contained poison. In the designs for gold and silver plate made for the Emperor Rudolph II. by Ottavio Strada is a cup on which a unicorn stands as if to essay the liquid.

Driving unicorn. Two wheelers and one leader. The leader is the one horn. (Latin, unum cornu, one horn.)

Unicorn. So whale-fishers call narwhals, from the long twisted tusks, often eight feet long.

Unigenitus (Latin, The Only-Begotten). A Papal bull, so called from its opening sentence, “Unigenitus Drus Filium.” It was issued in condemnation of Quesnel’s Réflexions Morales, which favoured Jansenism; the bull was issued in 1713 by Clement XI., and was a damnatio in globo—i.e. a condemnation of the whole book without exception. Cardinal de Noailles, Archbishop of Paris, took the side of Quesnel, and those who supported the archbishop against the pope were termed “Appellants.” In 1730 the bull was condemned by the civil authorities of Paris, and the controversy died out.

Union Jack. The national banner of Great Britain and Ireland. It consists of three united crosses—that of St. George for England, the saltire of St. Andrew for Scotland, and the cross of St. Patrick for Ireland.

In the Union Jack the white edging of St. George’s cross shows the white field. In the saltire the cross is reversed on each side, showing that the other half of the cross is covered over. The broad white band is the St. Andrew’s cross; the narrow white edge is the white field of St. Patrick’s cross.

In regard to the word “Jack,” some say it is Jacyne (James), the name of the king who united the flags, but this is not correct. Jacyne is a surcoat emblazoned with St. George’s cross. James I. added St. Andrew’s cross, and St. Patrick’s cross was added in 1801. (Jacyne, our “jacket.”)

Technically described thus:

>“The Union Flag shall be azure, the Crosses saltire of St. Andrew and St. Patrick quarterly per saltire, counterchanged, argent and gules, the latter diminated of the second, ornamented by the Cross of St. George of the third, diminated as the title."—By order of the Council.
"Jaques, de l'allemand Jacky, caspee de petite casque militaire qu' on portait au moyen age sur iapis armes et sur la cuisse."—Donati: Dictionnaire Universal.

Union Rose (The). The York and Lancaster, the petals of which are white and red; the white representing the white rose of the House of York, and the red representing the red rose of the House of Lancaster.

Unionists. A Whig and Radical party opposed to Home Rule in Ireland.
It began in 1886, and in 1895 joined the Conservative government.

Unitarians. in England, ascribe their foundation to John Biddle (1613-1692).
Milton (?), Locke, Newton, Larder, and many other men of historic note were Unitarians.

United Kingdom. The name adopted on January 1st, 1801, when Great Britain and Ireland were united.

United States. The thirty-six states of North America composing the Federal Republic. Each state is represented in the Federal Congress by two senators, and a number of representatives proportionate to the number of inhabitants. The nickname of a United States man is "a Brother Jonathan," and of the people in the aggregate "Brother Jonathan" (q.v.). Declared their independence July 4th, 1776.

Unities. (See ARISTOTELIAN.)

Universal Doctor. Alain de Lille (1114-1203).

Universe (3 syl.). According to the Peripatetics, the universe consists of eleven spheres enclosed within each other like Chinese balls. The eleventh sphere is called the empyrean or heaven of the blessed. (See HEAVEN.)

University. First applied to collegiate societies of learning in the twelfth century, because the universitas literarum (entire range of literature) was taught in them—i.e., arts, theology, law, and physic, still called the "learned" sciences. Greek, Latin, grammar, rhetoric, and poetry are called humanitas studia, or humaniores literatiae, meaning "lay" studies in contradis-tinction to divinity, which is the study of divine things. (See CAD.)

Unknown. The Great Unknown.
Sir Walter Scott. So called because the Waverley Novels were at first published anonymously. It was James Ballantyne who first applied the term to the unknown novelist.

Unlocked or Unlocked Cab. A loutish, unmanly youth. According to tradition, the bear cab is misshapen and imperfect till its dam has licked it into form.

Unlucky Gifts. (See FATAL GIFTS.)

Unnamed (2 syl.). A man reduced to tears. It is a term in falconry applied to a hawk not yet subservient to man; metaphorically, having lost the spirit,
etc., of a man.

Unmarried Men of Note. (See WIVES.)

Unmentionables. Breeches.
"Cornthians and exquisites from Bond Street, sporting an eye-glass... waiting-men in laced coats and plusps unmentionables of yellow, green, blue, red, and all the primary colours."—Nom. N. &
Wheaton: Journal (1800).

Unready (The). Ethelred II.—i.e., lacking rede (counsel). (*, 978-1016.)

Unrighteous [Adok'imos]. St.
Christopher's name before baptism. It was changed to Christ-bearer because he carried over a stream a little child, who (according to tradition) proved to be Jesus Christ.

Unwashed (2 syl.). It was Burke who first called the mob "the great unwashed," but the term "unwashed" had been applied to them before, for Gay uses it.

"The king of late drew forth his sword
(Thank God, it was not in wrath),
And made of many a squire and lord,
An unwashed knight of Bath."

A Ballad on Quadrille.

Up. The House is up. The business of the day is ended, and the members may rise up from their seats and go home.

A.B. is up. A.B. is on his legs, in for a speech.

"Up, Guards, and at them!" Creasy, in his Fifteen Decisive Battles, states that the Duke of Wellington gave this order in the final charge at the battle of Waterloo. It has been utterly denied by recent writers, but it is the fashion to deny or discredit all cherished traditions. I, for one, wish the tradition were true,
because, like Nelson's mot at Trafalgar, it gives a memorable interest to the charge; but alas! we are informed that it was not the Guards, but the 52nd light infantry which broke the column of the French Imperial Guard in the final charge, and "honour to whom honour is due,"

Up, Guards, and at them!
Up a Tree. Shelled; nowhere; done for. A 'possum up a gum-tree. (See under Tree.)

Up the Spout. In pawn. (See Spout.)

Up to Snuff. (See Snuff.)

Up to the Hub. Hub is an archaic word for the nave of a wheel, the hilt of a weapon, or the mark aimed at in quoits. If a cart sinks in the mud up to the hub, it can sink no lower; if a man is thrust through with a sword up to the hub, the entire sword has passed through him; and if a quoit strikes the hub, it is not possible to do better. Hence the phrase means fully, entirely, as far as possible. It is not American, but archaic English. (See Hub.)

"I shouldn't commune with nobody that didn't believe in election up to the hub."—Mrs. Story: Jiged, vol. i, p. 291.

Up to the Mark. In good condition of health; well skilled in proposed work. "Not up to the mark" means a cup too low, or not sufficiently skilled.

Up-turning of his Glass. He felt that the hour for the up-turning of his glass was at hand. He knew that the sand of life was nearly run out, and that death was about to turn his hour-glass upside down.

Upas-tree or Poison-tree of Macassar. Applied to anything baneful or of evil influence. The tradition is that a putrid stream rises from the tree which grows in the island of Java, and that whatever the vapour touches dies. This tale is chiefly due to Foersch, a Dutch physician, who published his narrative in 1783. "Not a tree," he says, "nor blade of grass is to be found in the valley or surrounding mountains. Not a beast or bird, reptile or living thing, lives in the vicinity." He adds that on "one occasion 1,600 refugees encamped within fourteen miles of it, and all but 300 died within two months." This fable Darwin has perpetuated in his Loves of the Plants. Bennett has shown that the Dutchman's account is a mere traveller's tale, for the tree while growing is quite innocuous, though the juice may be used for poison; the whole neighbourhood is most richly covered with vegetation; men can fearlessly walk under the tree, and birds roost on its branches. A upas tree grows in Kew Gardens, and flourishes amidst other hot-house plants.

"On the blasted heath Felt Upas site, the hydra-tree of death."
Darwin: Loves of the Plants, iii. 293.

Upper Crust. The lions or crack men of the day. The phrase was first used in Sam Stic. The upper crust was at one time the part of the loaf placed before the most honoured guests. Thus, in Wynnken de Worde's Boke of Kerywinge (carving) we have these directions: "Then take a hose in your lyfte hande, and pare ye lose rounde about; then cut the ouer-cruste to your sornysyne..." Furnivall, in Memours and Memles, etc., says the same thing—"Kutt the upper cruste for your sornysyne."

Wish you to see Peel, Stanley, Graham, Shel, Russell, Macnusy, old Joe, and so on. They are all upper crust here.

Upper Storey. The head. "Ill-furnished in the upper storey;" a head without brains.

Upper Ten Thousand or The Upper Ton. The aristocracy. The term was first used by N. P. Willis, in speaking of the fashionables of New York, who at that time were not more than ten thousand in number.

Upsee is not compounded of up and you, but is the German ans-ruhren (to stir up).

Upsee-Dutch. A heavy Dutch beer; Upsee Fross' a Friesian strong ale; Upsee English, a strong English ale. Upsee Dutch also means tipsy, stupid with drink.

"I do not like the dulness of your eye, It hath a heavy cast; 'tis upsee-Dutch, And says you are a humish whoremaster." Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, iv. 4.

"Yet whoop, Barnaby! off with thy liquor, Drink upsee out, and a flag for the victor." Sir Walter Scott: Lady of the Lake, v. 5.

"Teach me now to take the German upsee freeze, the Dawsish rupee, the Switzer's sloop of Rhenish,"—Dekker: Gull's Hornbook (1600).

Up'set Price. The price at which goods sold by auction are first offered for competition. If no advance is made they fall to the person who made the upset price. Our "reserved bid" is virtually the same thing.

Urbi et Orbi [To Rome and the rest of the world]. A form used in the publication of Papal bulls.

Urd [The Past]. Guardian of the sacred fount called Urd, where the gods sit in judgment. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Urd or Urdan Fount (The). The sacred fount of light and heat, situated over the Rainbow Bridge, Bifrost. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Urd, Verdandi, and Skuld. The three Nornir (Past, Present, and Future) who dwell in a beautiful hall below the ash-tree Yggdrasil’. Their employment is to engrave on a shield the destiny of man. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Urd (Past) takes the threads from Verdandi (Present), and Verdandi takes them from Skuld (Future).

“What is that which was to-morrow and will be yesterday?” Verdandi stands between Skuld (to-morrow) and Urd (yesterday).

Urgan. A mortal born and christened, but stolen by the king of the fairies and brought up in elf-land. He was sent to Lord Richard, the husband of Alice Brand, to lay on him the ‘curse of the sleepless eye’ for killing his wife’s brother Ethert. When Lord Richard saw the hideous dwarf he crossed himself, but the elf said, “I fear not sign made with a bloody hand.” Then forward stepped Alice and made the sign, and the dwarf said if any woman would sign his brow thrice with a cross he should recover his mortal form. Alice signed him thrice, and the elf became “the fairest knight in all Scotland, in whom she recognised her brother Ethert.” (Sir Walter Scott: Alice Brand; Lady of the Lake, iv. 12.)

Urganda la Descoeted’a. An enchantress or sort of Medea in the romances belonging to the Am'adis and Pal’men series, in the Spanish school of romance.

Urge. One of Charlemagne’s paladins, famous for his “giant strength.”

Uriel. Letter of Uriah. (2 Sam. xi. 15.) (See LETTER . . .)

Uriel. “Regent of the Sun,” and “sharpest-sighted spirit of all in heaven.” (Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 690.) Longfellow, in the Golden Legend, makes Raphael the angel of the Sun, and Uriel the minister of Mars. (See RAPHAEL.)

I am the minister of Mars, The strongest star among the stars, My song is power, my praise The march and battle of man’s life, And for the suffering and the strife I give him fortitude.”

The Miracle Play, iii.

Urim, in Garth’s Dispensary, is Dr. Atterbury.

“Urim was by all, and not void of sense, Had humour, and courteous confidence. . . . O’er-man of cause, and each decorum knew, And soon as the desert appeared, withdrew.”

Urim and Thummim consisted of three stones, which were deposited in the double lining of the high priest’s breastplate. One stone represented Yes, one No, and one No answer is to be given. When any question was brought to the high priest to be decided by “Urim,” the priest put his hand into the “pouch” and drew out one of the stones; and according to the stone drawn out the question was decided. (Lev. viii. 8; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6.)

Ursa Major. Calisto, daughter of Lyca’on, was violated by Jupiter, and Juno changed her into a bear. Jupiter placed her among the stars that she might be more under his protection. Homer calls it Aרקtos the bear, and Ηνωα the waggcn. The Romans called it Τρως the bear, and Septemberus the seven ploughing oxen; whence “Septemberalis” came to signify the north. The common names in Europe for the seven bright stars are “the plough,” “the waggcn,” “Charles’s wain,” “the Great Bear,” etc.

Boswell’s father used to call Dr. Johnson Ursa Major. (See BEAR.)

Ursa Minor. Also called Cynoṣura, or “Dog’s tail,” from its circular sweep. The pole star is α in the tail. (See CYNOΣURA.)

St. Ursula and the eleven thousand virgin martyrs. Ursula was a British princess, and, as the legend says, was going to France with her virgin train, but was driven by adverse winds to Cologne, where she and her 11,000 companions were martyred by the Huns. This extravagant legend is said to have originated in the discovery of an inscription to Ursula et Undecimilla Virgines, “the virgins Ursula and Undecimilla;” but by translating the latter name, the inscription reads “Ursula and her 11,000 virgins.” Visitors to Cologne are shown piles of skulls and human bones heaped in the wall, faced with glass, which the verger asserts are the relics of the 11,000 martyred virgins. (See VIRGINS.)

Used Up. Worn out, tired out, utterly fatigued, or exhausted. Used up alludes to articles used up. Worn out alludes to dresses and articles worn out by use. Exhausted alludes to wells, water, etc., dried up. Tired out means tired utterly.

“Being out night after night, she got kinder used up.”—Sam Slick: Human Nature, p. 302.

Usher means a porter. (Old French, huisher, a door; whence huisier, an usher; Latin, ostiarius.) One who stands at the door to usher visitors into the presence. (Scotch, Whishart.)
Usquebaugh

Us'quebaugh (3 syl.). Whisky (Irish, w'isge-beatha, water of life). Similar to the Latin aqua viva, and the French eau de vie.

Ut. • Sken out, as Utogustor, in Staffordshire; Utrecht, in Holland; "outer camp town"; the "out passage," so called by Clotaire because it was the grand passage over or out of the Rhine before that river changed its bed. Utmost is out or outer-most. (See Utgard.)

Ut Queen Lexis, etc. This hymn was composed in 770. Dr. Busby, in his Musical Dictionary, says it is ascribed to John the Baptist, but has omitted to inform us by whom. (See Do.)

Uta. Queen of Burgundy, mother of Kriemhild and Gunther. (The Nibelungen-Lied.)

Uter. Pendragon (chief) of the Britons; by an adulterous amour with Igrerna (wife of Gorlois, Duke of Cornwall) he became the father of Arthur, who succeeded him as king of the Silures.

Uterine (3 syl.). A uterine brother or sister. One born of the same mother but not of the same father. (Latin, uterus, the womb.)

Utgard (Old Norse, outer ward). The circle of rocks that hemmed in the ocean which was supposed to encompass the world. The giants dwelt among the rocks. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Utgard-Lok. The demon of the infernal regions. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Uti Posside'tis (Latin, as you at present possess them). The belligerents are to retain possession of all the places taken by them before the treaty commenced.

Utinomis. Cato the Younger was so called from Utica, the place of his death.

Utilitarians. A word first used by John Stuart Mill; but Jeremy Bentham employed the word "Utility" to signify the doctrine which makes "the happiness of man" the one and only measure of right and wrong.

"Oh, happiness, our being's end and aim. For which we bear to live, or dare to die." - Pope: Essay on Man, Epistle iv.

Utopia properly means nowhere (Greek, ou topos). It is the imaginary island of Sir Thomas More, where everything is perfect—the laws, the morals, the politics, etc. In this romance the evils of existing laws, etc., are shown by contrast. (1516.) (See Weisnichtwo.)

Utopia, the kingdom of Grangouier. When Pantagruel sailed thither from France and had got into the main ocean, he doubled the Cape of Good Hope and made for the shores of Melinda. "Parting from Medamoth, he sailed with a northerly wind, passed Medam, Geisam, and the Fairy Isles; and keeping Uti to the left and Uden to the right, ran into the port of Utopia, distant about three and a half leagues from the city of the Amaurots." (Medamoth, from no place; Medam, nowhere; Geisam, hidden land; Uti, nothing at all; Uden, nothing; Utopia, no place, distant three and a half leagues from Amaurots, the vanishing point—all Greek.) (See Queubus.)

Utopian. An impracticable scheme for the improvement of society. Any scheme of profit or pleasure which is not practicable. (See Utopia.)

Utraquists [Both-kinders]. The followers of Huss were so called, because they insisted that both the elements should be administered to all communicants in the Eucharist. (Latin, utraque specie, in both kinds.)

Utter and Inner Barristers. An utter or outer barrister means (in some cases at least) a full-fledged barrister, one licensed to practise. An inner barrister means a student. (See Nineteenth Century, No. 1892, p. 775, note.)

Uzziel. The angel next in command to Gabriel. The word means "Strength of God." Uzziel is commanded by Gabriel to "coast the south with strictest watch." (Milton: Paradyse Lost, iv. 782.)

V

V represents a hook, and is called in Hebrew vav (a hook).

V. D. M. on monuments is Vir Dei Minister, or Verbi Dei Minister.

V. D. M. I. AE. (Verbum Dei manet in eterno). The word of God endureth for ever. The inscription on the livery of the servants of the Duke of Saxony and Landgrave of Hesse, the Lutheran princes, at the Diet of Spires in 1528.

V. V. V., the letters found on the coin of the 20th Roman legion, stand for "Valeria, Viceisma, Victrix."
Vacuum now means a space from which air has been expelled. Descartes says, “If a vacuum could be effected in a vessel, the sides would be pressed into contact.” Galileo said, “Nature abhors a vacuum,” to account for the rise of water in pumps. (See Point.)

Vacuum Boyle’aum. Such a vacuum as can be produced by Boyle’s improved air-pump, the nearest approach to a vacuum practicable with human instruments.

The Guerickean vacuum is that produced by ordinary air-pumps, so called from Otto von Guericke, who devised the air-pump.

The Torricellian vacuum is the vacuum produced by a mercury-pump.

Vae Victis! Woe to the vanquished.

Vail (To). To lower; to cast down. Brutus complained that he had not lately seen in Cassius that courtesy and show of love which he used to notice; to which Cassius replies, “If I have vailed [lowered] my looks, I turn the trouble of my countenance merely on myself. Vexed I am of late... [and this may] give some soil to my behaviour.”

“His hat, which never vailed to human pride, Walker with reverence took and laid aside.”

Vails. Blackmail in the shape of fees to servants. (From the Latin verb vello, to be worth, to be of value: French, valoir.) The older form was vails.

“Vails to servants being much in fashion.”

Valentine. A corruption of galantin (a lover, a dangler), a gallant. St. Valentine was selected for the sweet-hearts’ saint because of his name. Similar changes are seen in gallant and valiant.

Valentine. One of the Two Gentlemen of Verona; his serving-man is Speed. The other gentleman is Proteus, whose serving-man is Lance. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Valentinian. The southern part of Scotland was so called from the Emperor Valens.

Valentine. A corruption of galantin (a lover, a dangler), a gallant. St. Valentine was selected for the sweet-hearts’ saint because of his name. Similar changes are seen in gallant and valiant.

Valentine. One of the Two Gentlemen of Verona; his serving-man is Speed. The other gentleman is Proteus, whose serving-man is Lance. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Valentinian. An ancient sect of Gnostics. So called from Valentinus, their leader.

Valerian or Valerian. Husband of St. Cecilia. Cecilia told him she was beloved by an angel who frequently visited her, and Valerian requested he might be allowed to see this constant visitor. Cecilia told him he should do so provided he went to Pope Urban and got baptised. On returning home, he saw the angel in his wife’s chamber, who gave to Cecilia a crown of roses, and to himself a crown of lilies, both of which he brought from Paradise. The angel then asked Valerian what would please him best, and he answered that his brother might be brought “to saving faith” by God’s grace. The angel approved of the petition, and said both should be holy martyrs. Valerian being brought before Alma-chius, the prefect, was commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, and, refusing to do so, was led forth to execution. (Chaucer: Second Nun’s Tale.)

Valentia or Vala’mus. Mercury was the son of Valens and Phoeb’nis. This Mercury is called Trophon’ius in the regions under the earth. (Cicero: De Nat. Deorum, iii. 22.)

“Ciciliumius (Mercury) riding in his Erosbee Pro Venus Vitanus might this valais sce.”

Valentia. The southern part of Scotland was so called from the Emperor Valens.

Valentine. A corruption of galantin (a lover, a dangler), a gallant. St. Valentine was selected for the sweet-hearts’ saint because of his name. Similar changes are seen in gallant and valiant.

Valentine. One of the Two Gentlemen of Verona; his serving-man is Speed. The other gentleman is Proteus, whose serving-man is Lance. (Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona.)

Valentinian. In Congreve’s Love for Lore. betterton’s great character.

Valentine (The Brave). Brother of Orson and the son of Bellissant, sister of King Pepin and wife of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. The twin brothers were born in a wood, near Orleans, and while their mother went in search of Orson, who had been carried off by a bear, Pepin happened to see Valentine and took him under his charge. He married Clerimond, niece of the Green Knight. (Valentine and Orson.)

Valentinian. An ancient sect of Gnostics. So called from Valentinus, their leader.

Valerian or Valerian. Husband of St. Cecilia. Cecilia told him she was beloved by an angel who frequently visited her, and Valerian requested he might be allowed to see this constant visitor. Valerian being brought before Alma-chius, the prefect, was commanded to worship the image of Jupiter, and, refusing to do so, was led forth to execution. (Chaucer: Second Nun’s Tale.)
Valérian (the herb). An irresistible attraction to cats. (The word is from the Latin valére, to be well, and hence to make well and keep well.) It is an exciting, antispasmodic, tonic, and emmenagogue. The “Father of Botany” says:

Valhalla, in Scandinavian mythology, is the great hall or refectory of Gladsheim, the palace of the Æsir or Asgard. The Times, speaking of Westminster Abbey, says “The Abbey is our Valhalla.”

“...We both must pass from earth away,
Valhalla’s joys to see;
And if I wander there to-day,
To-morrow may fetch thee.”

Fritschof-saga, lay xi.

Valiant (Thè). Joan IV. of Brittany.
(1389-1442.)

Valis’e (2 syl.). A small leather portmanteau. (French, valise.)

Valkyriu or Valkyries. The twelve nymphs of Valhalla. They were mounted on swift horses, and held drawn swords in their hands. In the melée of battle they selected those destined to death, and conducted them to Valhalla, where they waited upon them, and served them with mead and ale in cups of horn called skulls. The chief were Mista, Sia’gríða, and Hilda. Valkyriu means “chooser of the slain.”

“Mista black, terrific maid, Sia’gríða and Hilda wea.”

Gray: Total notes.

Valia (Laurentius). One of the first scholars of the Renaissance, noted for his Latin sermons, and his admirable Latin translations of Herodotus and Thucydides.

Valiary Crown. A crown bestowed by the ancient Romans on the soldier who first surmounted the vallum of an enemy’s camp.

Valley of Humiliation. The place where Christian encountered Apolloyn, just before he came to the “Valley of the Shadow of Death.” (Bunyan: Pilgrim’s Progress, pt. i.)

Valley of the Shadow of Death, through which Christian had to pass in order to get to the Celestial City. The prophet Jeremiah describes it as a “wilderness, a land of deserts and of pits, a land of drought and of the shadow of death” (ii. 6); and the Psalmist says, “Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me; Thy rod and Thy staff they comfort me” (xxiii. 4).

“...The light there is darkness, and the way full of traps and snares to catch the unwary.”—Bunyan: Pilgrim’s Progress, pt. i.

Vallombrosa. Milton says, “Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks in Vallombrosa” (Paradise Lost, i. 302); but as the trees of Vallombrosa are chiefly pines, they do not strew the brooks with autumnal leaves. The beech and chestnut trees are by no means numerous.

Valorem. Ad valorem. A sliding scale of duty on excisable articles, regulated according to their market value.

Thus, tea at 4s. per pound would pay more duty than tea at 2s. per pound.

Vamp. To vamp up an old story. To vamp is to put newippers to old boots. Vampires were short hose covering the feet and ankles. (Perhaps the French avant-pied, the fore-part of the foot.)

Vampire. An extortioner. According to Dom Calmet, the vampire is a dead man who returns in body and soul from the other world, and wanders about the earth doing mischief to the living. He sucks the blood of persons asleep, and these persons become vampires in turn.

The vampire lies as a corpse during the day, but by night, especially at full moon, wanders about. Sir W. Scott, in his Rob Roy (part iii. chap. ii. s. 3) alludes to the superstition, and Lord Byron in his Georveys says,

“But rest on earth, as vampire went,
Thy curse shall from the tomb be rent,
Then glansly haunt thy native place,
And suck the blood of all thy race.”

Van of an army is the French avant; but van, a winning machine, is the Latin vanna, our fan.

The Spirit of the Van. A sort of fairy which haunts the Van Pools in the mountains of Carmarthen on New Year’s Eve. She is dressed in white, girded with a golden girdle; her golden hair is very long, and she sits in a golden boat, which she urges along with a golden oar. A young farmer fell in love with her and married her, but she told him if he struck her thrice she would quit him for ever. After a time they were invited to a christening, and in the midst of the ceremony she burst into tears. Her husband struck her, and asked why she made such a fool of herself. “I weep,” she said, “to see the poor babe brought into a vale of misery and tears.” They were next invited to the funeral of the same child, and she could not resist laughing. Her husband struck her again, and asked the same question. "I laugh," she said, "to think how joyous a thing it is that the child has left a world of sin for a world of joy and innocence." They were next invited to a wedding, where the bride was young and the man advanced in years. Again she wept, and said aloud, "It is the devil's compact. The bride has sold herself for gold." Her husband bade her hold her peace, struck her, and she vanished for ever from his sight. (Welsh mythology.)

Vandal. One who destroys beautiful objects to make way for what he terms "improvements," or to indulge his own caprice. When Germanic with his Vandals captured Rome in A.D. 455, he mutilated the public monuments regardless of their worth or beauty.

"The word 'vandalism' was invented by the Abbe Gregoire, a propo of the destruction of works of art by revolutionary fanatics."—Nineteenth Century (Aug., 1863, p. 272).

Vandyke. The Vandyke of sculpture. Antoine Coysevox (1640-1720).

Vandyke (2 syl.). To scollop an edge after the fashion of the collars painted by Vandyck in the reign of Charles I. The scolloped edges are said to be vandyked.

Vanessa. Miss Esther Vanhomrigh, and Cade'nus is Dean Swift. While he was still married to Stella [Miss Hester Johnson, whose tutor he had been] Miss Vanhomrigh fell in love with him, and requested him to marry her, but the dean refused. The proposal became known to his wife (?), and both the ladies died soon afterwards. Hester Johnson was called Stella by a pun upon the Greek aster, which resembles Hester in sound, and means a "star." Miss Vanhomrigh was called Vanessa by compounding Van, the first syllable of her name, with Essa, the pet form of Esther. Cade'nus is simply decad'num (dean) slightly transposed.

Vanity Fair. A fair established by Beelzebub, Apollon, and Legion, for the sale of all sorts of vanities. It was held in the town of Vanity, and lasted all the year round. Here were sold houses, lasts, trades, places, honours, preferments, titles, countries, kingdoms, lusts, pleasures, and delights of all sorts. (Bunyan: Pilgrim's Progress, pt. I.)

Vane. Son of Merlin, one of Arthur's Round-Table Knights.

"A son of much records and face" (Fame sajke the youth of Merlin's face), Overpowere at Gwythe's footone, blest.

His heart's blood dyed her sandals red.

Sir Walter Scott: Bridal of Triermain, II. 25.

Vantage Loaf. The thirteenth loaf of a baker's dozen.

Varina. Swift, in his early life, professed to have an attachment to Miss Jane Waryng, and Latinised her name into Varina. (See Vanessa.)

Varnish, from the French vernis; Italian, vernice. Sir G. C. Lewis says the word is a corruption of Bereni'ce, famed for her amber hair, which was dedicated in the temple of Arsin'oë, and became a constellation. (See Berenice.)

Varro, called "the most learned of the Romans." (B.C. 116-28.)

Varuna. The Hindu Neptune. He is represented as an old man riding on a sea-monster, with a club in one hand and a rope in the other. In the Vedic hymns he is the night-sky, and Mitra the day-sky. Varuna is said to set free the "waters of the clouds."

Vassal. A youth. In feudal times it meant a feudatory, or one who held lands under a "lord." In law it means a bondservant or political slave, as "England shall never be the vassal of a foreign prince." Christian says, in his Notes on Blackstone, that the corruption of the meaning of vassal into slave "is an incontrovertible proof of the horror of feudalism in England." (Welsh, gwras, a boy or servant; gwavas, a page; like the French garçon, and Latin puer; Italian, vassallo, a servant.)

Vath'ek. The hero of Beckford's fairy romance. He is a haughty, effeminate monarch, induced by a malignant genius to commit all sorts of crimes. He abjures his faith, and offers allegiance to Ebis, under the hope of obtaining the throne of the pre-Adamite sultans.

Vatican. The palace of the Pope; so called because it stands on the Vatic'can Hill. Strictly speaking, the Vatican consists of the Papal palace, the court and garden of Belvidere, the library, and the museum.

"The sun of the Vatican sheds glory over the Catholic world."—The Times.

The Thunders of the Vatic'an. The anathemas of the Pope, which are issued from the Vatican.
The Council of the Vatican. The twenty-first General or Ecumenical Council. It commenced in 1669, Pius IX. being Pope. (See Councils.)

Vau'deville (2 syl.). A corruption of Val de Vire, or in Old French, l'aus de Vire, the native valley of Oliver Baselin, a Norman poet, the founder of a certain class of convivial songs, which he called after the name of his own valley. These songs are the basis of modern vaudeville.

Father of the Vaudeville. Oliver Baselin, a Norman poet. (Fifteenth century.)

Vau'girard. The deputes of Vaugirard. Only one individual. This applies to all the false companies in which the promoter represents the directors, chairman, committee, and entire staff. The expression is founded on an incident in the reign of Charles VIII. of France: The usher announced to the king “The deputies of Vaugirard.” “How many are there?” asked the king. “Only one, and please your majesty,” was the answer. (See Tailors.)

Vau'hall or Fauxhall (2 syl.). Called after Jane Vaux, who held the copyshold tenement in 1615, and was the widow of John Vaux, the vintner. Chambers says it was the manor of Fulke de Breauté, the mercenary follower of King John, and that the word should be Fulke’s Hall. Pepys calls it Fox Hall, and says the entertainments there are “mighty divertising.” (Book of Days.)

Thackeray, in Vanity Fair (chap. vi.), sketches the loose character of these “divertising” amusements.

Ve. Brother of Odin and Vili. He was one of the three deities who took part in the creation of the world. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Veal, Calf. The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. (See Beef, Porc.)

“Mr Blew Calf becomes Monsieur de Ven in the like manner. He is Saxon when he requires tendance, but takes a Norman name when he becomes matter of enjoyment.”—Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.

Ve'das or Ve'dams. The generic name of the four sacred books of the Hindus. It comprises (1) the Rig or Rish Veda; (2) Yajur or Yaj̣ātha- Veda; (3) the Sama or Saman Veda; and (4) the Atharvâna or Ezour Veda. (Sanskrit, vid, know; Chaldee, yed-a; Hebrew, id-o; Greek, vid-o; Latin, video, etc.)

Vehm'gerichte or Holy Vehme Tribunal. A secret tribunal of Westphalia, said to have been founded by Charlemagne. (See Flemish.)

Veil. At one time men wore veils, as St. Ambrose testifies. He speaks of the “silken garments and the veils interwoven with gold, with which the bodies of rich men are encompassed.” (St. Ambrose lived 340-397.)

Veiled Prophet of Khorassan. The first poetical tale in Thomas Moore’s Lalla Rookh.

The Veiled Prophet of Khorassan was Hakim ben Allah, surnamed the Veiled (Mokanne), founder of an Arabic sect in the eighth century. Having lost an eye, and being otherwise disfigured in battle, he wore a veil to conceal his face, but his followers said it was done to screen his dazzling brightness. He assumed to be a god, and maintained that he had been Adam, Noah, and other representative men. When encompassed by Sultan Mahadi, he first poisoned all his followers at a banquet, and then threw himself into a burning acid, which wholly destroyed his body.

Vendémiaire (4 syl.), in the French Republican calendar, was from September 22 to October 21. The word means “Vintage.”

Vendetta. The blood-feud, or duty of the nearest kin of a murdered man to kill the murderer. It prevails in Corsica, and exists in Sicily, Sardinia, and Calabria. It is preserved among the Druses, Circassians, Arabs, etc. (Latin, vinidicta.)

Vendredi (French), Friday. (Latin, Veneris dies. Here Vener is metamorphosed into Vendre. The Italian is Venerdi.)

Venerable. The Venerable, Bede, the ecclesiastical historian. (672-735.)

The Venerable Doctor. William de Champeaux, founder of realism. (Twelfth century.)

Peter, Abbot of Clugay. (1093-1156.)

Vengeur (Le). A man-of-war commanded by Cambrone. The tale is this: June 1, 1794, Lord Howe encountered the French fleet off Ushant. Six ships were taken by the English admiral, and the victory was decisive: but Le Vengeur, although reduced to a mere hulk, refused to surrender, and, discharging a last broadside, sank in the waves, while the crew shouted “Vive la République!” The Convention ordered a medal to be struck with this legend—Le Triomphe.

Ventilate a Subject (To). To throw it out for discussion that it may be winnowed or sifted. To ventilate a room is to let air and light into it, to drive away bad gases, etc. So in ventilating a subject, light is thrown on it, and all that is false, extraneous, or doubtful is blown away.

Ventre-saint-Gris! The usual oath of Henri IV. About equal to "Corpus Christi!" A similar juron is "Par le ventre de Dieu" (Ventre-dieu! or Ventreblu!). Ours for Christ is familiarised by our common phrase "the cross-o'er or cross-row"; and if saint refers to Christ we have a similar phrase in St. Saviour's. Rabelais has "Par saint gir's!"; and William Price, "the Arch-Druid," who died in 1893, describes himself in the Medical Directory as "Decipherer of the Pedigree of Jesus Crist." Chaucer writes the word "Crist."

Mr. F. Adams has sent me two quotations from the Romance of Huy de Boredun, from a MS. dated 1250—

"Aise, dist Karles, tort ayes, par saint Crist!" (Line 1473)
"Aise, dist Hues, tort ayes, par saint Crist!" (Line 2218)

But a correspondent of Notes and Queries sends this quotation—

"Ce prince [Henri IV.] avoit pris l'habitude d'employer cette expression, 'Ventre-saint-Gris,' comme une espèce de juramento, lorsqu'il était encore enfant, ses gouverneurs criant qu'il ne s'habituiât à jurer. ... Il avoit permis de dire 'Ventre-saint-Gris,' qui estoit un terme dérisif qu'il appiquoit aux Franciscains ... de la concur de leurs habillementes."—Feb. 10th, 1884, p. 113.

Ventriloquism, "speaking from the belly." From the erroneous notion that the voice of the ventriloquist proceeded from his stomach. The best that ever lived was Brabant, the "engastrimist" of François I. (Latin, ventri-logus.)

Venus. Love; the goddess of love; courtship. Copper was called Venus by the alchemists. (See APhRODITE.)

"Venus smiles not in a house of tears." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iv. 1.

Venus is the name of the second planet from the sun, and the nearest heavenly body to the earth except the moon.

Statues of Venus. The most celebrated statues of this goddess are the Venus de Medici, the Aphrodite of Praxiteles, the Venus of Milo, the Venus Victorious of Canova, and the Venus of Gibson.

Capitoline Venus (The). In the Capitoline Museum of Rome.
Venus

- Canova's Venus is the most noted of modern sculpture. (1757-1822.)

Uranian Venus of the Lusiad is the impersonation of heavenly love. She pleads to Destiny for the Lusiad, and appears to them in the form of "the silver star of love." Plato says she was the daughter of Heaven (Uranos), and Xenophon adds that "she presided over the love of wisdom and virtue, the pleasures of the soul." Nigidius says that this "heavenly Venus" was not born from the sea-foam, but from an egg which two fishes conveyed to the seashore. This egg was hatched by two pigeons whiter than snow, and gave birth to the Assyrian Venus, who instructed mankind in religion, virtue, and equity. (See Apophthegm.)

Venus in astrology "signifieth the white men or browne...joyfull, laughter, liberal, pleasures, dancers, entertayners of women, players, perfumers, musitions, messengers of love."

"Venus lovest ynot and dispense." (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 6:52.)

My Venus turns out a wold (Latin).

All my swans are changed to geese; my cake is dough. In dice the best cast (three sixes) was called "Venus," and the worst (three aces) was called "Camis." My win-all turns out to be a lose-all.

The Island of Venus in the Lusiad is a paradisaclal island raised by "Divine Love," as a reward for the heroes of the poem. Here Venus, the ocean-goddess, gave her hand to Giano, and committed to him the empire of the sea. It was situate "near where the bowers of Paradise are placed," not far from the mountains of Imaus, whence the Ganges and Indus derive their source. This paradise of Love is described in the ninth book.

"We have several parallel Edens, as the "gardens of Alc innocent," in the Odyssey, bk. viii.; the "island of Circe," Odyssey, x.; the "Elysium" of Virgil, Æneid, vi.; the "island and palace of Alcina" or Vice, in Orlando Furioso, vii.; the "country of Logistilla" or Virtue, in the same epic, bk. x.; the description of "Paradise," visited by Astolfo, the English duke, in bk. xxxiv.; the "island of Armida," in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered; the "bower of Arcadia," in Spenser's Faerie Queene; the "palace with forty doors," the keys of which were entrusted to prince Agib, whose adventures form the tale of the "Third Calendar," in The Arabian Nights' Entertainments, etc. E. A. Poe calls Eden "Aiden," which he rhymes with "laden." (The Raven, 16.) (See Venusberg.)

Venus Anadyomene (6 syl.), Venus rising from the sea, accompanied by dolphins.

Venus Genetrix. Worshipped at Rome, especially on April day, as the mother of Æneas, and patroness of the Julian race.

Venus Victrix. Venus, as goddess of victory, represented on numerous Roman coins.

Venus de Medicis, supposed to be the production of Cleoménês of Athens, who lived in the second century before the Christian era. In the seventeenth century it was dug up in the villa of Hadrian, near Tivoli, in eleven pieces; but it is all ancient except the right arm. It was removed in 1890, by Cosmo III., to the Imperial Gallery at Florence, from the Medici Palace at Rome.

"So stands the statue that enchanteth the world, so bending trees to veil the matchless boast, the munificent beauty of existing Greece." (Thomson: Summer.)

Venus of Cnidius. The undraped statue of Praxitelles (4 syl.) purchased by the ancient Cnidians, who refused to part with it, although Nicomèdes, King of Bithynia, offered to pay off their national debt as a price for it. The statue was subsequently removed to Constantinople, and perished in the great fire during the reign of Justinian. (A.D. 80.)

Praxiteles made also a draped statue of the same goddess, called the "Venus of Cnoss." (A.D. 433.)

Venus of Milo or Melos. The statue, with three of Hermès, was discovered in 1820 by Admiral Dumont in Milo or Melos, one of the Greek islands, whence its name. It now stands in the Louvre.

Ve'nsberg. The mountain of delight and love, where Lady Venus holds her court. Human beings occasionally are permitted to visit her, as Heinrich von Limburg did, and the noble Tannhäuser (q.t.); but as such persons run the risk of eternal perdition, Eckhardt the Faithful, who sat before the gate, failed not to warn them against entering. (German Legend: Children of Limbury, a poem. (1837.) (See The Island of Venus.)

Vera Causa. A cause in harmony with other causes already known. A fairy godmother may be assigned in story as the cause of certain marvellous effects, but is not a vera causa. The revolution of the earth round the sun may be assigned as the cause of the four seasons, and is a vera causa.

Verbatim et Literatim. Accurately rendered, word for word and letter for letter.

Verb in Sap. [A word to the wise.] A hint is sufficient to any wise man; a threat implying if the hint is not taken
I will expose you. (Latin, Verb s sapiens.)

Verb in Sat. [A word is enough.] Similar to the above. (Latin, Verb sat [sapiens]. A word to the wise is enough.)

Vere Adeptus. One admitted to the fraternity of the Rosicrucians.

"In Rosicrucian lore as learned,
As he the Vere-adptus earned,"

Butler: Hudibras.

Verger. The officer in a church who carries the rod or mace. (Latin, verga, a wand.)

Vernon, mentioned by Thomson in his Summer, was Admiral Edward Vernon, who attacked Carthage in 1741;
but the malaria reached the crew, and,
as the poet says—

"To infant weakness sink the warrior’s arms."

Diana Vernon. An enthusiastic Royalist of great beauty and talent. (Sir Walter Scott: Rob Roy.)

Veronesa (3 sylls.). A native of Verona, pertaining to Verona, etc.: a Paul Veronese, Paul a native of Verona;
a Veronese fashion, and so on.

Veronica. It is said that a maiden handed her handkerchief to our Lord on His way to Calvary. He wiped the sweat from His brow, returned the handkerchief to the owner, and went on. The hand-kercchef was found to bear a perfect likeness of the Saviour, and was called Ver-Iconica (true likeness), and the maiden was ever after called St. Veronica. One of these handkerchiefs is preserved at St. Peter’s church in Rome, and another in Milan cathedral.

Versailles of Poland. The palace of the Counts of Braniaki, which now belongs to the municipality of Bialystok.

Versailles (The). The government troops, in the presidency of M. Thiers.
The Communist troops were called the Federals, short for the “Federated National Guards.”

Vernon Bernasconi. Joose poetry.

Vesper Hour. So called from Francesco Berni, the Italian poet. (1490-1538.)

Vert (green), in heraldry, signifies love, joy, and abundance. It is represented on the shields of noblemen by the emerald, and on those of kings by the planet Venus.

In heraldry vert is symbolically expressed by diagonal lines running from right to left of the shield. Lines run-
right—mean purpure.

N.B. English heralds vary escut-cheon by only seven colours, but foreign heralds employ nine colours. (See Heraldry.)

Vertumnus. The god of the seasons, who married Pomona. August 12th was his festival. (Roman mythology.)

Verulam Buildings (London). So damed in compliment to Lord Bacon, who was Baron Verulam and Viscount St. Albans.

Vervain. Called “holy herb,” from its use in ancient sacred rites. Also called “pigeons’ grass,” “Juno’s tears,” and “simpler’s joy.” Supposed to cure scrofula, the bite of rabid animals, to arrest the diffusion of poison, to avert antipathies, to conciliate friendships, and to be a pledge of mutual good faith;
hence it was anciently worn by herals and ambassadors. (See Hoogezen.)

Verbena is the botanical name.

“The term Verbena (quasi herba) originally denoted all those herbs that were held sacred on account of their being employed in the rites of Vesica Piscis (Latin, fish-bladder). The ovoid frame or glory which, in the twelfth century, was much used, especially in painted windows, to surround pictures of the Virgin Mary and of our Lord. It is meant to represent a fish, from the anagram ichthus. (See Note-rica.)

Vesper Hour is said to be between the dog and the wolf; “betwixt and between,” neither day nor night; a breed between the dog and wolf; too much day to be night, and too much night to be day. Probably the phrase was suggested by the terms “dog watch” (which begins at four), and “dark as a wolf’s mouth.”

Sicilian Vespers. Easter Monday,
March 30, 1282. So called because John of Pro’cida on that day led a band of conspirators against Charles d’Anjou and his French countrymen in Sicily. These Frenchmen greatly oppressed the Sicilians, and the conspirators, at the sound of the vesper bell, put them all to the sword without regard to age or sex.

The Fatal Vespers. October 26th, 1823. A congregation of some 300 persons had assembled in a small gallery over the gateway of the French ambassador, in Blackfriars, to hear Father Drury, a Jesuit, preach. The gallery gave way, and about 100 of the congregation were precipitated into the street and killed. Drury and a priest named Redman were also killed. This accident was, according to the bigotry of the times, attributed to God’s judgment against the Jesuits. (See St. Luke xiii. 4.)

Vesta, in Roman mythology, was the Home-goddess, called by the Greeks "Hestia." She was custodian of the sacred fire brought by Αἴας from Troy. This fire was lighted afresh annually on March day, and to let it go out would have been regarded as a national calamity.

Vestal Virgin. A nun, a religieuse; properly a maiden dedicated to the service of the goddess Vesta. The duty of these virgins was to keep the fire of the temple always burning, both day and night. They were required to be of spotless chastity. (See IMMORALITY.)

Veto (Monsieur and Madame). Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. So called by the Republicans, because the Constituent Assembly allowed the king to have the power of putting his veto upon any decree submitted to him. (1791.)

Monsieur Veto swore he’d ride To the constitution true; But if he cast his oath aside Teaching us the like to do. Madame Veto swore one day All the Paris rout to stay; But we snapped the tyrant’s yoke. Turning all her threats to smoke.

E. C. B.

Vetturino [Vettu-re co] in Italy, is one who for hire conveys persons about in a rettura or four-wheeled carriage; the owner of a livery stable; a guide for travellers. The two latter are, of course, subsidiary meanings.

"We were accosted in the steamer by a well-dressed man, who represented himself to be a vetturino."—The Times (One of the Alpine Club).

Via Dolorosa. The way our Lord went to the Hall of Judgment, from the Mount of Olives to Golgotha, about a mile in length.

Vial. Vials of wrath. Vengeance, the execution of wrath on the wicked.

The allusion is to the seven angels who pour out upon the earth their vials full of wrath. (Rev. xvi.)

Viat’icum (Latin). The Eucharist administered to the dying. The word means “money allowed for a journey,” and the notion is that this sacrament will be the spirit’s passport to Paradise.

Vicar. Rector, one who receives both great and small tithes. Vicer receives only the small tithes. At the Reformation many livings which belonged to monasteries passed into the hands of noblemen, who, not being in holy orders, had to perform the sacred offices vicariously. The clergyman who officiated for them was called their vicar, or representative, and the law enjoined that the lord should allow him to receive the use of the glebe and all tithes except those accruing from grain (such as corn, barley, oats, rye, etc.), hay, and wood.

The term Vicar is now applied to the minister of a district church, though he receives neither great nor small tithes; his stipend arising partly from endowment, partly from pew-rents, and in part from fees, voluntary contributions, offerings, and so on. The vicar of a pope is a Vicar-apostolic, and the vicar of a bishop is a curate or vicar in charge.

A lay vicar is a cathedral officer who sings certain portions of the service. The Pope is called the "Vicar of Christ."

Vicar of Bray (The). Let who will be king, I will be vicar of Bray still. Brome says of Simon Alleyn that he "lived in the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth. In the first two reigns he was Protestant, in Mary’s reign he turned Papist, and in the next reign recanted—being resolved, whoever was king, to die Vicar of Bray." (1540-1588.) Others say it is Pendleton.

Ray refers to Simon Symonds, a vicar who was Independent in the Protectorate, Churchman in the reign of Charles II., Papist under James II., and Moderate Protestant under William and Mary.

The well-known song, "I will be Vicar of Bray," was written by an officer in Colonel Fuller’s regiment. This vicar lived in the reigns of Charles II., James II., William III., Anne, and George I.

Vicar of Wakefield (The). Dr. Primrose.

Vice (1 syl.), in Old English moralities, was a peron who wore a cap with ear’s ears.
Vice Versa (Latin). The reverse; the terms of the case being reversed.

Vicient de la Rosa. The son of a poor labourer who had served as a soldier. According to his own account, "he had slain more Moors than ever Tunis or Morocco produced; and as for duels, he had fought a greater number than ever Gante had, or Luna either, or Diego Garcia de Paredes, always coming off victorious, and without losing a drop of blood." He dressed "superbly," and though he had but three suits, the villagers thought he had ten or a dozen, and more than twenty plumes of feathers. This gay young spark soon caught the age, and could not have had a grown-up daughter who sang in the village choir.

Villain means simply one attached to a villa or farm. In feudal times the lord was the great landowner, and under him were a host of tenants called villagers. The highest class of villagers were called regardant, and were annexed to the manor; then came the Coliberti or Bures, who were privileged vassals; then the Bordari or cottagers (Saxon, bord, a cottage), who rendered certain menial offices to their lord for rent; then the Cocets, Cotari, and Cotumnari, who paid partly in produce and partly in monial service; and, lastly, the villagers in gross, who were annexed to the person of the lord, and might be sold or transferred as chattels. The notion of wickedness and worthlessness associated with the word is simply the effect of aristocratic pride and exclusiveness—not, as Christian says in his Notes on Blackstone, "a proof of the horror in which our forefathers held all service to feudal lords." The French vilain seems to connect the word with vile, but it is probable that vile is the Latin vulisse vile (of no value), and that the noun vilin is independent of vilin, except by way of pun. (See CHEATER.)

"I am no villain [base-born]; I am the youngest son of Sir Rowland de Boys; he was my father, and he is twice a villain [raucous] that says such a father begot villains [hastards]."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, 1. 1.

Villiers. Second Duke of Buckingham. (1627-1688.)

Villener. (French.) To cheat. Villon was a poet in the reign of Louis XI., but more famous for his cheats and villainies than for his verses. Hence the word villener, "to cheat, to play a rogue's trick." (Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 17; note by Molieure.)

Vincent (St.). Patron saint of drunkards. This is from the proverb—"If on St. Vincent's Day (Jan. 23) the sky is clear, more wine than water will crown the ear."

Vincent de la Rosa. The son of a poor labourer who had served as a soldier. According to his own account, "he had slain more Moors than ever Tunis or Morocco produced; and as for duels, he had fought a greater number than ever Gante had, or Luna either, or Diego Garcia de Paredes, always coming off victorious, and without losing a drop of blood." He dressed "superbly," and though he had but three suits, the villagers thought he had ten or a dozen, and more than twenty plumes of feathers. This gay young spark soon caught the Vindicatae, only child of an opulent farmer. The giddy girl eloped with him; but he robbed her of all her money and jewels, and left her in a cave to make the best of her way home again. (Cervantes; Don Quixote, pt. i. iv. 20.)

Vin'dicate (3 syl.), to justify, to avenge, has a remarkable etymology. Vindicatus was a slave of the Vitelli, who informed the Senate of the conspiracy of the sons of Junius Brutus to restore Tarquin, for which service he was rewarded with liberty (Livy, ii. 5); hence the rod with which a slave was struck in manumission was called vindicta, a Vindicatus rod (see Manumit); and to set free was in Latin vindicavit in libertatem. One way of settling disputes was to give the litigants two rods, which they crossed as if in fight, and the person whom the prior vindicato broke the rod of his opponent. These rods were called vindicati, and hence vindicate, meaning to "justify." To avenge is simply to justify oneself by punishing the wrong-doer.

V'ine (1 syl.). The Rabbins say that the flend buried a lion, a lamb, and a hog at the foot of the first vine planted by Noah; and that hence men receive from wine feculency, mildness, or wallowing in the mire. (See Midrash.)

Vinegar (Hannibal's). Livy tells us that when Hannibal led his army over the Alps to enter Rome he used vinegar to dissolve the snow, and make the march less slippery. Of course this tradition is fabulous. Where did the vinegar come from? Nepos has left a short memoir of Hannibal, but says nothing about the vinegar. (Livy, b.c. 59 to A.D. 17; Nepos about the same time; Hannibal, b.c. 247-183.)

Vineyard Controversy. A paper war provoked by the Hon. Daines Barrington, who entered the lists to overthrow all chroniclers and antiquaries from William of Malmsbury to Samuel Pegge, respecting the vineyards of Domeday Book. He maintained that the vines were currants, and the vineyards currant-gardens.

Vino. In vino veritas. In wine is truth, meaning when persons are more or less intoxicated they utter many things they would at other times conceal or disguise. (Latin.)

Vin'try Ward (London). So called from the Vinerary, or part occupied by the Vintners or wine-merchants from Bordeaux, who anciently settled on this part of the Thames' bank. They landed their wines here, and, till the 28th Edw. I., were obliged to sell what they landed within forty days.

V'ium Theolog'cum. The best wine in the nation. Holinshed says it was so called because religious men would be sure "neither to drink nor be served of the worst, or such as was anie waies vined by the vintner; naie, the merchant would have thought that his soule would have gone strightwaie to the devil if he would have served them with other than the best." (i. 282.)

Violet, said to have sprung from the blood of Ajax; but how the blood of the mad bluster could produce this modest flower is past understanding. (Latin, viola; Greek, Iou.)

"As when stern Ajax poured a purple flood, The violet tree, fair daughter of his blood," Dr. Young: The Judgement.

Chemical test paper is steeped in syrup of violets; used to detect acids and alkalis. If an acid is present, it will change the violet paper into red; an alkali will turn the paper green. Sips of white paper stained with the juice of violets (kept from the air) will serve the same purpose. Lapis and turmeric are also used for similar purposes. The paper should be unused.

Violet. The colour indicates the love of truth and the truth of love. Pugin says it is used for black in mourning and fasting.

The violet on the tyrant's grave. (Tennyson: Aymer's Field.) The reference is to Nero's grave. It is said that some unknown hand went by night and strewn violets over his grave. Even Nero had one who loved him. Lempiere states that the statues of Nero, at death, "were crowned with garlands of flowers."

"I would give you some violets, but they withered all when my father died."
So says Ophelia to the Queen. The violet in flower-language is emblematical of innocence, and Ophelia says the King, the Queen, and even Hamlet himself now he has killed Polonius, are unworthy of this symbol. Now my father is dead all the violets are withered, all the court family are stained with blood-guiltiness.

This entire poesy may be thus paraphrased: Both you and I are under a spell, and there is "herb of grace" to disenchant us; there's a "daisy" to Violet

Virgil

caution you against expecting that such wanton love as yours will endure long;
I would have given you a "violet" if I could, but now that my father is killed all of you are blood-guilty. (Shakespeare: Hamlet, iv. 5.)

Violet (Corporeal). Napoleon Bonaparte. When Bonaparte was banished to Elba he told his friends he would return with the violets, and "Corporal Violet" was the favourite toast of his partisans. When he broke his parole and reached Frejus, a gang of women assembled with violets, which were freely sold. The shibboleth was, "Do you like violets?" If the answer given was "Oui," the person was known not to be a confederate; but if the answer was "Eh bien," the respondent was recognised as an adherent.

Violet-crowned City. Aristophanes calls Athens λοτήφωνος (Lcithèn, 1232 and 1292), and again in the Acharnians, 637. Macaulay uses the phrase, "city of the violet crown." Ion (a violet) was a representative king of Athens, whose four sons gave names to the four Athenian classes; and Greece in Asia Minor was called "Ion-ia." Athens was the city of Ion, crowned king, and hence the "Ion crowned" or violet-crowned.

Similarly Paris is called the "City of Lilies," by a pun on the word Louis (lis, a lily).

Violin. The following musicians are very celebrated: Arcangelo Corelli, noted for the melodious tones he produced (1653-1713); Pierre Gaviniés, native of Bordeaux, founder of the French school of violinists, noted for the sweetness of his tones (1722-1800);
Nicolo Paganini, whose mastery over the instrument has never been equalled, especially known for his musical feats on one string (1784-1840); Gaetan Pugnani, of Turin, founder of the Italian school of violinists; his playing was "wild, noble, and sublime" (1727-1803); Giuseppe Tartini, of Padua, whose performance was plaintive but full of grace (1699-1770); G. B. Viotti, of Piedmont, whose playing was noted for grandeur and audacity, fire and excitement (1755-1824). (See CREMONA.)

The best makers of violins. Gaspar di
Salo (1600-1610); Nicholas Amati, of Cremona (1596-1684); Antonio Stradivari, his pupil (1670-1728); Joseph A.
Joseph Steiner (1820-1867); Matthias
Klotz (1850-1896). (See FIDDLE.)

V'olon. A temporary prison. Galignauz says: "In the time of Louis XI., the Salle-de-Perdus was so full of turbulent clerks and students that the bailiff of the palace shut many up in the lower room of the conciergerie (prison) while the courts were sitting; but as they were guilty of no punishable offence, he allowed them a violon to wile away the tedium of their temporary captivity."

M. Guin says the seven penitential psalms were called in the Middle Ages the psalterion, and to put gos to penance was in French expressed by mettre au psalterion. As the psaltery was an instrument of music, some witty Frenchman changed psalterion to violon, and in lieu of mettre au psalterion wrote mettre au violon.

"A prisonnier et lique mire au saliterion."
Antiquités Nationales de Millin, iv. p. 6.

Viper and File. The biter bit.
Æsop says a viper found a file, and tried and supposition that it was good food; but the file said that its province was to bite others, and not to be bitten. (See SERPENT.) The viper of real life does not bite or masticate its food, but swallowed it whole.

"I fawned and smiled to plunder and betray;
Myself betrayed and plundered all the while;
So grazed the viper the corrugating file."
Beau: Minstrel.

Thus he realised the moral of the fable: the viper sought to bite the file, but broke his own teeth."—The Times.

Virgil. In the Gest Romamorum
Virgil is represented as a mighty but benevolent enchanter. This is the character that Italian tradition always gives him, and it is this traditional character that furnishes Dante with his conception of making Virgil his guide through the infernal regions. From the Æneid grammarians illustrated their rules, rhetoricians selected the subjects of their declamations, and Christians looked on the poet as half-inspired; hence the use of his poems in divination. (See Sortes VIRGILIANAE.)

Dante makes Virgil the personification of human wisdom, Beatrice of that wisdom which comes of faith, and St. Bernard of spiritual wisdom. Virgil conducts Dante through the Inferno, Beatrice through Purgatory, and St.
Bernard through Paradise.

Virgil was wise, and as craft was considered a part of wisdom, especially over-reaching the spirits of evil, so he is represented by medieval writers as outwhelming the demon. On one occasion, it is said, he saw an imp in a hole of a mountain, and the imp promised to teach the poet the black art if he released him. Virgil did so, and after learning all the imp could teach him, expressed amazement that one of such imposing stature could be squeezed into so small a rift. The imp said, "Oh, that is not wonderful," and crept into the hole to show Virgil how it was done, whereupon Virgil closed up the hole and kept the imp there. (Een Schone Historie Van Virgilinus, 1552.)

This tale is almost identical with that of the Fisherman and the Genie in the Arabian Nights. The fisherman trapped in his net a small copper vessel, from which, when opened, an evil genius came out, who told the fisherman he had vowed to kill the person who released him. The fisherman began to mock the genius, and declared it was quite impossible for such a monster to squeeze himself into so small a vessel. The genius, to convince the fisherman, metamorphosed himself into smoke and got into the vessel, whereupon the fisherman clapped down the lid and flung the vessel back into the sea.

The Swiss tale of Theophrastus and the Devil is another analogous story. Theophrastus liberates the devil from a hollow tree, and the sequel is like those given above. (Gorres: Volksbücher, p. 226.)

There are numerous tales of the devil outwitted.

The Christian Virgil. Marco Giroldi (1490-1566) wrote the Latin hymns and religious poems. (348-*)

Virgil and Horace of the Christians. So Bentley calls Aurelius Clemens Prudentius, a native of Spain, who wrote Latin hymns and religious poems. (348-*)

Le Virgile au Rabot. (Au Rabot is difficult to render into English. "Virgil with a Plane" is far from conveying the idea. "The Virgil of Planes," or "The Virgil of the Plane," is somewhat nearer the meaning.) Adam Billaut, the poetical carpenter and joiner, was so called by M. Tisot, both because he used the plane and because one of his chief recusals is entitled Le Rabot. He is generally called Maitre Adam. His roaring Bacchanalian songs seem very unlike the Eclogues of Virgil, and the only reason for the title seems to be that Virgil was a husbandman and wrote on husbandry, while Billaut was a carpenter and wrote on carpentry. (*-1662.)

Virgilius, Bishop of Salzburg, an Irishman, whose native name was Feargil or Feargal. He was denounced as a heretic for asserting the existence of antipodes. (Died 784.) (See Science.)

Virgin. One of the constellations. (August 23rd to September 23rd.)

Astraea, goddess of justice, was the last of the deities to quit our earth, and when she returned to heaven became the constellation Virgo.

"When the bright Virgin gives the beneficent days" (Thomson: Autumn.)

Virgin Mary's Guard (The). The Scotch guard of France, organised in 1448 by Charles VII. Louis XI. made the Virgin Mary their colonel. Disbanded in 1830.

Virgin Mary's Peas (The). Near Bethlehem are certain crystallisations in limestone so called.

Virgin Queen (The). Queen Elizabeth (1533, 1558-1603).

Virgins. The eleven thousand virgins of Cologne, according to the legend, were born at Banza in Spain, which contained only 12,000 families. The bones exhibited were taken from an old Roman cemetery, across which the wall of Cologne ran, and which were exposed to view after the siege in 1106. (See Ursula.)

Virginal. An instrument used in convents to lead the virginals or hymns to the Virgin. It was a quilled keyboard instrument of two or three octaves, common in the reign of Elizabeth.

Virtuoso. A man fond of virtu or skilled therein; a dilettante.

Vis Inerte. That property of matter which makes it resist any change. Thus it is hard to set in motion what is still, or to stop what is in motion. Figuratively, it applies to that unwillingness of change which makes men "rather bear the ills they have than fly to others they know not of."

Vishnu [Indian]. The Preserver, who forms with Brahma and Siva the divine triad of the system of Hinduism.

Vishnu rides on an eagle; Brahma on a goose.

Vital Spark of Heavenly Flame. (Popes.) Heraclitus held the soul to be a spark of the stellar essence. (Macrobius: In Somnium Scipionis, f. 14.)

Vittellius. A glutton. So named from Vittellius the Roman emperor, who took emetics after a meal that he might have power to swallow another.

Vitex. Called Abraham’s balm. Agnus Castus, and the chaste-tree. “In the language of flowers it means “inescapability to love.” Dioscorides, Pliny, and Galen mention the plant, and say that the Athenian ladies, at the feast of Ceres, used to strew their couches with vitex leaves as a palladium of chastity. In France a beverage is made of the leaves by distillation, and is (or was at one time) given to novitiates to weaken their hearts from earthly affections. Vitex, from rico, to bind with twigs; so called from the flexible nature of the twigs.

Vitruvius. There were two Roman architects of this name. The one best known was Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, who wrote a book on architecture.

The English Vitruvius. Inigo Jones (1572-1655).

Vitulea. The scourgings which the monks inflicted on themselves during the chanting of the psalms.

Vitus (St.). St. Vitus’s dance, once widely prevalent in Germany and the Low Countries, was a “dancing mania.” So called from the supposed power of St. Vitus over nervous and hysterical affections.

“At Strasburg hundreds of folk began
To dance and leap, both maid and man;
In open market, lane, or street,
They skipped along, nor cared to eat,
Until their plague had ceased to trouble us.”

“Twas called the dance of holy Vitus.”

Jan of Konigshausen (an old German chronicler).

St. Vitus’s Dance. A description of the jumping procession on Whit-Tuesday to a chapel in Ulm dedicated to St. Vitus, is given in Notes and Queries, September, 1856. (See TARANTISM.)

Viva Voce. Orally; by word of mouth. A viva voce examination is one in which the respondent answers by word of mouth. (Latin, “with the living voice.”)

Vivien. A wily wanton in Arthur’s court “who hated all the knights.” She tried to seduce “the blameless king,” and succeeded in seducing Merlin, who, “overtalked and overworn, told her his secret charm” —

“The which if any wrought on anyone
With woven paces and with waving arms,
The man he wrought on even seemed to lie
Close in the four walls of a hollow tower,
From which there was no escape for evermore.”

Having obtained this secret, the wanton “put forth the charm,” and in the hollow oak lay Merlin as one dead, “lost to life, and use, and name, and fame.” (Tennyson: Style of the King’s Vivien.)

Vixen. A female fox. Metaphorically, a woman of villainous and ungovernable temper. (Anglo-Saxon, fēxen.)

Vixere. “Vixere fortes ante Agamemnon” (Horace). You are not the first great man that ever lived, though you boast so mightily. Our own age does not monopolise the right of merit.

Vix. A contraction of videlicet. The is a corruption of 3, a common mark of contraction in the Middle Ages; as habb—i.e. habet; omniibus—i.e. omnibus; vix—i.e. videlicet.

Vogue (1 syl.). A French word. “In vogue” means in repute, in the fashion. The verb voguer means to sail or move forwards. Hence the idea of sailing with the tide.

“Vogue la Galère. Let the world go how it will; ‘arrive qui pourra.’”

Vole. He has gone the vole—i.e. been everything by turns. Vole is a deal at cards that draws the whole tricks. The verb vole means to win all the tricks. Vole is a French word Faire la vole—i.e. “Faire seul toutes les lettres,” de vole—i.e. enlever.

“Who is he [Edie Oriltree]? Why, he has gone the vole—has been soldier, ballad-singer, travelling tinkler, and now a beggar.”—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. Iv.

Voltaic Battery. An apparatus for accumulating electricity. So called from Volta, the Italian, who first contrived it.

Voltaire. His proper name was François Marie Arouet. The word Voltaire is simply an anagram of Arouet I. I. (le jeune). Thus have we Stella, Astrophiel (g.r.), Vanessa and Cadenus (g.r.), and a host of other names in anagrams.

Voltarre, the infidel, built the church at Ferney, which has this inscription: “Deo erexit Voltarre.” Cowper alludes to this anomaly in the following lines:

“Nor he who, for the sake of thousands born,
 Built God’s church, and laughed His Word to scorn.”

Voltaire. Dr. Young said of him—

“Thou art so witty, prodigate and thin,
 Thou seem’st a Milton, with his Death and Sin.”

An excellent comparison between Voltaire and Gibbon is given by Byron in Childe Harold, cantos iii., 106, 107.

Christoph Martin Wieland (1733-1813).

The Polish Voltaire. Ignatius Krasicki (1774-1801).

Volum 2 (syl.). A roll. Anciently books were written on sheets fastened together lengthwise and rolled; some were rolled on a pin or roller. The rolls were placed erect on shelves. Each one was labelled in red letters or rubrics. Rolls of great value were packed in cases or boxes. (Latin, volume, to roll up.)

Vox et Pratera Nihil. Echo; a threat not followed out. When the Lacondomian plucked the nightingale, on seeing so little substance he exclaimed, "Vox tu es, et nihil pratera." (κοινά το τις ἱερός, καὶ οὐδεν ἄλλο. Plut. 1172. Mor. Apophthegmata Laconica.)

Vox Populi Vox Dei. This does not mean that the voice of the many is wise and good, but only that it is irresistible. You might as well try to stop the tide of the Atlantic as to resist the vox populi. As God's laws cannot be withstood, neither can the popular will. After Edward II. had been de-throned by the people in favour of his son (Edward III.), Simon Mepham, Archbishop of Canterbury, preached from these words as his text.

Vulcan. The divine blacksmith, whose workshop was on Mount Etna, where the Cyclops assisted him in forging thunderbolts for Jove. He was also called Mulober.

Vulcan's Badge. That of cuck-ooldom. Venus was Vulcan's wife, but her amour with Mars gave Vulcan the badge referred to.

Vulcanised India-rubber. India-rubber combined with sulphur by vulcanic agency or heat, by which means the caoutchouc absorbs the sulphur and becomes carbo-nised.

Vulcanist. One who supports the Vulcanian or Plutonian theory, which ascribes the changes on the earth's surface to the agency of fire. These theorists say the earth was once in a state of igneous fusion, and that the crust has gradually cooled down to its present temperature.

Vulgar Errors.

Aristotle taught that women have more teeth than men.

From an account given in Genesis ii. 21 it was once generally believed that a woman has one rib more than a man.

It is a vulgar error to suppose that beetles and moles are blind.

It is a vulgar error to suppose that lowly-organised animals are as sensible of pain as the highly-organised are.

To exhaust the subject of vulgar errors would require many pages of this Dictionary. Every reader will be able to add to the few examples given above. (See UPAS TREE.)

VXL, a monogram on lockets, etc., stands for U XL (you excel).

W

Wabun. Son of Mudjeekeewis (North-American Indian), East-Wind, the Indian Apollo. Young and beautiful, he chases Darkness with his arrows over hill and valley, wakes the villager, calls the Thunder, and brings the Morning. He married Wabun-Annung (q.v.), and transplanted her to heaven, where she became the Morning Star. (Longfellow: Hiawatha.)

Wabung An'nung, in North American Indian mythology, is the Morning Star. She was a country maiden wooed and won by Wabun, the Indian Apollo, who transplanted her to the skies. (Longfellow: Hiawatha.)

Wade (1 syl.), to go through watery places, is the Anglo-Saxon wad (a ford), wadun (to ford or go [through a meadow]). (See WAD-ONAT.)

General Wade, famous for his military highways in the Highlands, which proceed in a straight line up and down hill like a Roman road, and were made with a crown, instead of being lowest in the middle.

"Had you seen but these roads before they were made,
You would hold up your hands and bless General Wade." (Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 9.296.)

Wade's Boat, named Guign'elot. Wade was a hero of medieval romance, whose adventures were a favourite theme in the sixteenth century. Mons. F. Michel has brought together all he could find about this story, but nevertheless, the tale is very imperfectly known.

"They can be made craft of Wade's boat,
So more he broken harm than wast he list,
That with him schuld I never ly in rest."

(Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 9.296.)

Wadham College (Oxford) was founded by Nicholas Wadham in 1613.

Wad'man (Widow). A comely widow who tries to secure Uncle Toby for her second husband. Amongst other Wag Beards (70). "’Tis merry in hall when beards wag all"—i.e. when feasting goes on.

"Then was the minstrel’s harp with rapture heard;
The songs of ancient days gave bume delight;
With pleasure too did wag the minstrel’s beard,
For Piety courted him to drink and dote."

Peter Piadur: Alegro to Scotland.

Wages. Giles Moore, in 1659, paid his mowers sixteenpence an acre. In 1711 Timothy Burrell, Esq., paid twentypence an acre; in 1656 he paid Mary his cook fifty shillings a year; in 1715 he had raised the sum to fifty-five shillings. (Sussex Archaeological Collections, iii, pp. 163, 170.)

Wages of Sin (The). To earn the wages of sin. To be hanged, or condemned to death.

"I believe some of you will be hanged unless you change a good deal. It's cold blood and bad blood that runs in your veins, and you'll come to earn the wages of sin."—Bulwer: R retreat under arms, Ii.

"The wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi. 23.

Wagoner. (See Bootes.)

Wahb’bites (3 syl.). A Mahometan sect, whose object is to bring back the doctrines and observances of Islam to the literal precepts of the Koran; so called from the founder, Ibn-abd-ul-Wahab.

Waifs and Strays. "Waifs" are stolen goods, which have been waived or abandoned by the thief. "Strays" are domestic animals which have wandered from their owners and are lost temporarily or permanently.

Waifs and strays of London streets. The homeless poor.

Waistcoat. The M. B. waistcoat. The clerical waistcoat. (See M.B.)

Waiters upon Providence. Those who cling to the prosperous, but fall away from decaying fortunes.

"The side of the Puritans was deserted at this period by a numerous class of prudent persons, who took a formal rest from their undertakings for a time. These sagacious personages were called... waiters upon Providence, and deemed it a high delinquency towards heaven to afford countenance to any cause longer than it was favoured by fortune."—Sir W. Scott: Fawd of the Pea, chap. iv.

Waldemar’s Way. Street musicians, who serenade the principal inhabitants at Christmas-time, especially on Christmas Eve. From Rymer’s Fideles we learn it was the duty of musical watchmen to pipe the watch nightly in the king’s court four times from Michaelmas to Shrove-Thursday, and three times in the summer; and they had also to make the bon gate at every door, to secure them against pockera and pillers. They form a distinct class from both the watch and the minstrels. Obeso were at one time called waits.

"Dr. Busby says the word is a corruption of wyngha, hauing, transferred from the instruments to the performers."—Dictionary of Music.

Wake (1 syl.). To keep vigils. (Anglo-Saxon, woececan.) A vigil celebrated with junketing and dancing.

"It may, therefore, be permitted them [the Irish] on the dedication day, or other solemn days of martyr, to make them bowers about the churches, and refresh themselves, feasting together after a good religious sort; killing their oxen now to the praise of God and increase of charity, which they were wont before to sacrifice to the devil."—Gregory the Great to Melitus (Melitus was an abbot who came over with St. Augustine.

"Waking a Witch." If a "witch" was obdurate, the most effectual way of obtaining a confession was by what was termed "waking her." For this purpose an iron bridle or hoop was bound across her face with four prongs thrust into her mouth. The "bride" was fastened behind to the wall by a chain in such a manner that the victim was unable to lie down; and in this position she was kept sometimes for several days, while men were constantly by to keep her awake. In Scotland some of these bridles are still preserved.

Walbrook Ward (London) is so called from a brook which once ran along the west wall of Walbrook Street.

Walcheren Expedition. A well-devised scheme, ruined by the stupidity of the agent chosen to carry it out. Lord Castlereagh’s instructions were "to advance instantly in full force against Antwerp," but Lord Chatham wasted his time and strength in reducing Flushing. Ultimately, the red-tape "incapable" got possession of the island of Walcheren, but 7,000 men died of malaria, and as many more were permanently disabled.

Waldermar’s Way. So the Milky Way is called in Denmark. This was Waldemar or Valdemar the Victorious, who substituted the Danebrog for the national banner of Denmark.
Waldenses. So called from Peter Valdo, a citizen of Lyons, who founded a preaching society in 1176.

Valdo, a cove between Levant and Goodwood (Sussex). Same as weald, wold, wald, walt, "a wood." (Anglo-Saxon.) The final o is about equivalent to "the," as helo, the whole, i.e. health; manyo, the many—i.e. multitude, etc.

Wales. The older form in Wealhas (plural of Wealth), an Anglo-Saxon word denoting foreigners, and applied by them to the ancient Britons; hence also, Corn-wall, the horn occupied by the same "refugees." Walschland is a German name for Italy; Valais are the non-German districts of Switzerland; the parts about Liège constitute the Walloon country. The Welsh proper are Cimbri, and those driven thither by the Teutonic invaders were refugees or strangers. (See Walnuts.)

Walk (in Huidras) is Colonel Hewson, so called from Gayton’s tract.
To walk. This is a remarkable word. It comes from the Anglo-Saxon wealdan (to roll); whence wealdere, a fuller of cloth. In Percy’s Reliques we read—

I cursed the weaver and the walker,
The cloth that they had wrought.

To walk, therefore, is to roll along, as the machine in felting hats or fulling cloth.

Walk Chalks. An ordeal used on board ship as a test of drunkenness. Two parallel lines being chalked on the deck, the supposed delinquent must walk between them without stepping on either.

Walk Spanish. To make a man walk Spanish is to give him the sack; to give him his discharge. In 1868 one of the retired captains in the Trinity House Establishment said, "If I had to deal with the fellow, I would soon make him walk Spanish, I warrant you."

Walk not in the Public Ways. The fifth symbol of the Proverbs of Iamblichus, meaning follow not the multitude in their evil ways; or, wide is the path of sin and narrow the path of virtue, few being those who find it. The "public way" is the way of the public or multitude, but the way of virtue is narrow and separate. The arcana of Pythagoras were not for the common people, but only for his chosen or elect disciples.

"Bread is the way that leadeth to destruction, but narrow is the path of truth and holiness."

Walk the Plank (7b). (See Plank.)

Walk through One’s Part (7b). A theatrical phrase, meaning to repeat one’s part at rehearsal verbally, but without dressing for it or acting it. To do anything appointed you in a listless indifferent manner.

"A fit of dulleth, such as will at times creep over all the professors of the fine arts, arising either from fatigue or contempt of the present audience, or that caprice which tempts painters, musicians, and great actors . . . to walk through their parts, instead of exerting themselves with the energy which acquired their fame."—Sir W. Scott's BedGRANT, chap. X.

Walker, a proper name, is generally supposed to be wealdere, a fuller, but the derivation of ancient names from trades is to be received with great caution. It is far more probable that Walker is derived from the old High German walich, Anglo-Saxon walth, a foreigner or borderer: whence Wallack, Walk, Walkey, Walliker, and many others. (See Brewer.)

Helen Walker. The prototype of Jennie Dean. Sir Walter Scott caused a tombstone to be erected over her grave in the churchyard of Ironnog, stewartry of Kirkcudbright. In 1869 Messrs. A. and C. Black caused a headstone of red freestone to be erected in Carlaveroock churchyard to the memory of Robert Paterson, the Old Mortality of the same novelist, buried there in 1801.

Hookey Walker. John Walker was an outdoor clerk at Longman, Clementi, and Co.’s, Cheapside, and was noted for his eagle nose, which gained him the nickname of Old Hookey. Walker’s office was to keep the workmen to their work, or report them to the principals. Of course it was the interest of the employés to throw discredit on Walker’s reports, and the poor old man was so badgered and ridiculed that the firm found it politic to abolish the office; but Hookey Walker still means a tale not to be trusted. (John Ber.)

Walker’s Bus. To go by Walker’s bus, to walk. Similarly, "To go by the Marrowbone stage," "To ride Shank’s pony."

Walking Gentleman (4), in theatrical parlance, means one who has little or nothing to say, but is expected to deport himself as a gentleman when before the lights.

Walking Sword (4). A short, light sword, when long swords wielded by two hands were in use. (See Sir W. Scott’s Abbot, chap. xx.)
WALKYRIES (The). (See VALKYRIE.)

Wall (The), from the Tyne to Boulness, on the Solway Firth, a distance of eighty miles. Called—

The Roman Wall, because it was the work of the Romans.

Agricola’s Wall, because Agricola made the south bank and ditch.

Hadrian’s Wall, because Hadrian added another vaultum and mound parallel to Agricola’s.

The Wall of Severus, because Severus followed in the same line with a stone wall, having castles and turrets.

The Picts’ Wall, because its object was to prevent the incursions of the Picts.

The wall of Antoninus, now called Greens Dyke, from Dunglass Castle on the Clyde to Blackness Castle on the Forth, was made by Lollius Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140. It was a turf wall.

Wall. To give the wall. Nathaniel Bailey’s explanation of this phrase is worth perpetuating. He says it “is a compliment paid to the female sex, or those to whom one would show respect, by letting them go nearest the wall or houses, upon a supposition of its being the cleanest. This custom,” he adds, “is chiefly peculiar to England, for in most parts abroad they will give them the right hand, though at the same time they thrust them into the kennel.”

To take the wall. To take the place of honour, the same as to choose “the uppermost rooms at feasts.” (Matt. xxiii. 6.) At one time pedestrians gave the wall to persons of a higher grade in society than themselves.

“I will take the wall of any man or maid of Montague’s.”—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 1.

To go to the wall. To be put on one side; to be shelved. This is in allusion to another phrase, “Laid by the wall”—i.e. dead but not buried; put out of the way.

To hang by the wall. To hang up neglected; hence, not to be made use of. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii. 4.)

Wall-eyed properly means “withered-eyed.” Persons are wall-eyed when the white is unusually large, and the sight defective; hence Shakespeare has wall-eyed wrath, wall-eyed slave, etc. When King John says, “My rage was blind,” he virtually says his “wrath was wall-eyed.” (Saxon, hwulan, to wither. The word is often written wall-eyed, or whallied, from the verb whall.)

WALLACE’S JARDER. (See JARDER.)

Wallflower. So called because it grows on old walls and ruined buildings. It is a native plant. Similarly, wall-eyes, wall-creepers, etc., are plants which grow on dry, stony places, or on walls. Wall-fruit is fruit trained against a wall. (See WALNUT.)

Herrick has a pretty fancy on the origin of this flower. A fair damsel was long kept in durance vile from her lover; but at last

“Up she got upon a wall,
Tempting down to slide withal;
But the silken twist untied,
So she fell, and, bruised, she died.”

“Love, in pity of the deed,
And her loving luckless speed,
Turned her to this plant we call
Now the ‘Flower of the wall’.”

Young ladies who sit out against the wall, not having partners during a dance, are called “wallflowers.”

WALLON. Part of the great Roman stock. They occupied the low track along the frontiers of the German-speaking territory, as Artois, Hainault, Namur, Liège, Luxemburg, with parts of Flanders and Brabant. (See WALL.)

WALLOP. To thrash. Sir John Wallop, in the reign of Henry VIII., was sent to Normandy to make reprisals, because the French fleet had burnt Brighton. Sir John burnt twenty-one towns and villages, demolished several harbours, and “walloped” the foe to his heart’s content.

WALLSEND COALS. Originally from Wallsend, on the Tyne, but now from any part of a large district about Newcastle.

WALNUT [foreign nuf]. It comes from Persia, and is so called to distinguish it from those native to Europe, as Walnut Tree. It is said that the walnut tree thrives best if the nuts are beaten off with sticks, and not gathered. Hence Fuller says, "Who, like a nut tree, must be manured by beating, or else would not bear fruit" (bk. ii. ch. 11). The saying is well known that—

"A woman, a spaniel, and a walnut tree,
The more you beat them the better they be."

Taylor, the Water-POet.

Walpurgis Night. The eve of May Day, when the old pagan witch-world was supposed to hold high revelry under its charm on certain high places. The Brecon of Germany was a favourite spot for these revelries.

Walpurgis was a female saint concerned in the introduction of Christianity into Germany. She died February 25th, 779.

"He changed hands, and whisked and rioted like a dance of Walpurgis in his lonely brain."—J. K. Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard, p. 100.

Walton (St.). A Briton who gave up all his wealth, and supported himself by manual husbandry; Patron saint of husbandmen; usually depicted with a scythe in his hand, and cattle in the background. Died mowing, 1016.

Walter Multon. Abbot of Thornton-upon-Humber in Lincolnshire, was immersed in 1443. In 1722, an old wall being taken down, his remains were found with a candlestick, table, and book. Stukeley mentions the fact. In 1846 another instance of the same kind was discovered at Temple Bruer, in Lincolnshire.

Wal'tham Blacks. (See Black Act.)

WALTON. An Isaac Walton. One devoted to "the gentle craft" of angling. Isaac Walton wrote a book called The Complete Angler, or Contemplative Man's Reservation. (1655.)

"Gentle" is a pun. Gentles are the larvae of fish-flies used as bait in angling.

Walton Bridle (The). The "gossip's or scold's bridle." One of these bridles is preserved in the vestry of the church of Walton-on-Thames. Iron bars pass round the head, and are fastened by a padlock. In front, a flat piece of iron projects, and this piece of iron being thrust into the mouth, effectually prevents the utterance of words. The relic at Walton is dated 1633, and the donor was a person named Chester, as appears from the inscription:

"Chester presents Walton with a bridle
To curb women's tongues that talk too idle."

It is also called a "brank." (Tetronic, pranque, "a bridle").

Wam'be. Son of Witless, and jester of Cedric "the Saxon," of Rotherwood. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Wan means thin. (Anglo-Saxon, wian, "deficient"); our wane, as the "waning moon." As wasting of the flesh is generally accompanied with a grey pallor, the idea of leanness has yielded to that of the sickly hue which attends it. (Verb wanan, to wane.)

Wand. The footman's wand. (See under Running Footmen.)

Wandering Jew.

(1) Of Greek tradition. Aristaeas, a poet who continued to appear and disappear alternately for above 400 years, and who visited all the mythical nations of the earth.

(2) Of Jewish story. Tradition says that Kartaphilos, the door-keeper of the Judgment Hall, in the service of Pontius Pilate, struck our Lord as he led Him forth, saying, "Go on faster, Jesus"; whereupon the Man of Sorrows replied, "I am going, but thou shalt tarry till I come again." (Chronicle of St. Alban's Abbey; 1228.)

The same Chronicle, continued by Matthew Paris, tells us that Kartaphilos was punished by Annias, and received the name of Joesph at the end of every hundred years he falls into a trance, and wakes up a young man about thirty.

Another legend is that Jesus, pressed down with the weight of His cross, stopped to rest at the door of one Ahasuerus, a cobbler. The craftsman pushed him away, saying, "Get off! Away with you, away!" Our Lord replied, "Truly I go away, and that quickly, but tarry thou till I come." Schubert has a poem entitled Abasuer (The Wandering Jew). (Paul von Bülow; 1847.)

A third legend says that it was Ananias, the cobbler, who haled Jesus before the judgment seat of Pilate, saying to Him, "Faster, Jesus, faster!"

(3) In Germany the Wandering Jew is associated with John Buttadzen, seen at Antwerp in the thirteenth century, again in the fifteenth, and a third time in the sixteenth. His last appearance was in 1774 at Brussels. Signor Guaiti about the same time made his appearance at Venice, and had a portrait of himself by Titian, who had been dead at the time 130 years. One day he disappeared as mysteriously as he had come. (Turkish Spy, vol. ii.)

(4) The French call the Wandering Jew Ismael Lagnedem, a corruption of Laque-""n, from (Mitternacht Dru. in Jus. xxi. 19; 1640.)

Wandering Jew. Salathiel ben Sadi, who appeared and disappeared towards the close of the sixteenth century, at Venice, in so sudden a manner as to attract the notice of all Europe. Croly in his novel called Salathiel, and Southey in his Curse of Kehama, trace the course of the Wandering Jew, but in utter violation of the general legends. In Eugène Sue’s Le Jui FErrant, the Jew makes no figure of the slightest importance to the tale.

Halévy has an opera on the same subject, words by Scribe.

Doré has illustrated the legend.

Wandering Willie or Willie Steenson. The blind fiddler who tells the tale of Redgauntlet. (Sir Walter Scott: Redgauntlet.

Wandering Wood, in book i. of Spenor’s Faerie Queene, is where St. George and Una encounter Error, who is slain by the knight. Una tries to persuade the Red Cross knight to leave the wood, but he is self-willed. Error, in the form of a serpent, attacks him, but the knight severs her head from her body. The idea is that when Piety will not listen to Una or Truth, it is sure to get into “Wandering Wood,” where Error will attack it; but if it listens then to Truth it will slay Error.

Wans Dyke, Sir Richard Colt Hoare tells us, was a barrier erected by the Belges against the Celts, and served as a boundary between those tribes Dr. Stukeley says the original mound was added to by the Anglo-Saxons when they made it the boundary-line of the two kingdoms of Mercia and Wessex. It was also used by the Britons as a defence against the Romans, who attacked them from the side of Gloucestershire and Oxfordshire.

In its most perfect state it began at Andover, in Hampshire, ran through the counties of Berkshire, Wiltshire, and Somersetshire, and terminated in the “Severn Sea” or Bristol Channel. It was called Wodenes Dyke by the Saxons, contracted into Wondes-dyke, and corrupted to Wans-dyke, as Wodenes-deg is into Wednes-deg. (See War’s Dyke.)

Want or Went. A road. Thus “the four-want way,” the spot where four roads meet. Chaucer uses the expression “a privit way” (private road), etc.

Wants, meaning “gloves.” According to the best Dutch authorities, the word is a corruption of the French gant, Italian guanto, our “gauntlet.”

“Wanten are worn by peasants and working people when the weather is cold. They are shaped somewhat like boxing-gloves, having only a thumb and five fingers. They are made of coarse woolen stuff.”—Festing von Berkhout: Letter from Drede.

Wantley. (See Dragon.)

Wapentake. A division of Yorkshire, similar to that better known as a hundred. The word means “touch-arms,” it being the custom of each vassal, when he attended the assemblies of the district, “to touch the spear of his over-lord in token of homage.” Victor Hugo, in his novel of L’Homme qui Rit, calls a tipstaff a “wapentake.” (Anglo-Saxon, wapen, arms; sacan, to touch.)

Wapping Great means astonishingly great. (Anglo-Saxon, wafan, to be astonished; wafting, amazement.) A “wapper” is a great falsehood.

War of the Meal-sacks. After the battle of Beder, Abu Sofian summoned two hundred fleet horsemen, each with a sack of meal at his saddle-bow (the scanty provision of an Arab for a foray), and sallied forth to Madi’na. Mahomet went forth at the head of a superior force to meet him, and Abu Sofian with his horsemen, throwing off their meal-sacks, fled with precipitation.

War of the Roses. (See Roses.)

Ward. A district under the charge of a warden. The word is applied to the subdivisions of Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham, which, being contiguous to Scotland, were placed under the charge of lord wardens of the marches, whose duty it was to protect these counties from inroads. (See Hundred.)
Ward

Ward (Artemus). (See Artemis, Wnd.)

Ward Money, Ward-penny, or Wardage. Money paid for watch and warp. (Somerset.)

Warden-pie. Pie made of the Warden pear. Warden pears are so called from Warden Abbey, Berks, where they are grown in great profusion.

Myself with denial I mortify
With a dainty bit of a Warden-pie.

The Prior of Orders Grey.

Ward. (See Bed.)

Warlock. A wandering evil spirit; a wizard. (Anglo-Saxon, war-logy, a deceiver, one who breaks his word. Satan is called in Scripture "the father of lies," the arch-warlock.)

Warm Reception (A). A hot opposition. Also, a hearty welcome.

"The Home Rule members are prepared to give the coercion bill a warm reception; Mr. Parnell's followers will oppose it tooth and nail."—Newspaper paragraph, May 19th, 1885.

Warm as a Bat. Hot as burning coal. In South Staffordshire that slaty coal which will not burn, but which lies in the fire till it becomes red-hot, is called "bat."

Warming-pan (A). One who keeps a place warm for another, i.e., holds it temporarily for another. The allusion is to the custom in public schools of making a fag warm his "superior's" bed by lying in it till the proper occupant was ready to turn him out.

"If Mr. Mellor took a judgeship, Grantham might object to become a warming-pan for ambitious lawyers."—Newspaper paragraph, March 6th, 1885.

Warming-pan. (See Jacobite.)

Warning Stone. Anything that gives notice of danger. Bakers in Wiltshire and some other counties used to put a "certain pebble" in their ovens, and when the stone turned white it gave the baker warning that the oven was hot enough for his bakings.

Warp (Tb). A ses tera, meaning to shift the position of a vessel. This is done by means of a rope called a warp. Kedging is when the warp is bent to a kedge, which is let go, and the vessel is hove ahead by the capstan.

"The potent rod
Of Amram's son [Moses], in Egypt's evil day,
Waved round the cozen, up-called a pitchy cloud
Of moths, warring (shifting about) in the eastern wind."

Milton: Paradise Lost, l. 386.

In Lancashire, warping means laying eggs; and boys, on finding a bird's nest, will ask—"And how many eggs has she warped?"

Ward and Weft, or Weof. The "warp" of a fabric are the longitudinal threads; the "weft" or "woof" are threads which run from selvage to selvage.

"Weave the warp and weave the woof,
The winding-sheet of Edward's race;
Give ample room and verge enough
The characters of hell to true."

Gray: The Bard.

Warrior Queen (The). Boudicca, Queen of the Iceni.

"When the British warrior queen,
Bleeding from the Roman rods,
Sought, with an indignant mien,
Counsel of her country's gods..."

Cowper: Boudicca.

The Iceni were the faithful allies of Rome; but, on the death of Prasutagus, king of that tribe, the Roman procurator took possession of the kingdom of Prasutagus; and when the widow Boudicca complained thereof, the procurator had her beaten with rods like a slave.

Warwick. (Anglo-Saxon, war-wic, contracted from waring-wic (the fortified or garrisoned town). A translation of the ancient British name Cæsar Leon.

Warwick Lane (City). The site of a magnificent house belonging to the famed Beauchamps, Earls of Warwick.

Warwolf. (See Werewolf.)

Washed Out (I am thoroughly). I am thoroughly exhausted or done up; I have no strength or spirit left in me.

Washing. Wash your dirty linen at home (French). The French say the English do not follow the advice of washing their dirty linen en famille—meaning that they talk openly and freely of the faults committed by ministers, corporations, and individuals. All may see their dirty linen; and as for its washing, let it be but washed, and the English care not who has the doing of it. Horace, (2 Ep., i, 220) says, "Vinea egomet oedam nee" (I do my own washing at home). Though the French assert that we disregard this advice, we have the familiar proverb, "It is an ill bird that fouls its own nest."

Was'sall (2 syl.). A salutation used on New Year's Eve and New Year's Day over the spiced-ale cup, hence called the "wassail bowl." (Anglo-Saxon, Was hel, be whole, be well.)

Wassailers. Those who join a was'sall; revellers, drunkards.

"I should be loath
To meet the rudeness and swilled insolence
Of such late wassailers."

Milton: Comus (The Lady).
Wastlers. Wandering musicians; from wastle, to wander. The carolesingers in Sussex are called wastlers.

Wast. A familiar name for a hare.

"By this, poor Wast, far off upon a hill, Stands on his hinder legs, with listening ear."
Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

Wato’s Dyke (Flintshire). A corruption of Wato’s Dyke. Wato was the father of Weland, the Vaulcan of Northern mythology, and the son of King Vilkiner by a mermaid. This dyke extends from the vicinity of Basingwerk Abbey, in a south-easterly direction, into Denbighshire. The space between it and Offa’s Dyke, which in some parts is three miles, and in others not above 500 yards, is neutral ground, where Britons, Danes, and Saxons met for commercial purposes. (See WAT’S DYKE.)

"There is a famous thing
Called Offa’s Dyke, that reaches far in length.
All the Dyke of the Danes might neither bring.
It was free ground, and called the Briton’s strength.
Wato’s Dyke, likewise, about the same was set,
Between which two both Danes and Britons met.
And traffic still.
Churchyard: Worthiness of Wales (1557)."

Watch Night. December 31st, to see the Old Year out and the New Year in by a religious service. John Wesley granted it on the religious system, but it has been followed by most Christian communities.

"Southey in his biography of the evangelist (Wesley) announces watch-night as another of Wesley’s objectionable institutions." — Nottingham Guardian, January 1, 1888, p. 3.

Watch on Board Ship. There are two sorts of watch—the long watch of four hours, and the dog watch of two, from 4 to 6; but strictly speaking a watch means four hours. The dog watches are introduced to prevent one party always watching at the same time. (See Wolf, Between dog and wolf, Don-Watch.)

12 to 4 p.m. Afternoon watch. 4 to 6 First dog-watch. 6 to 8 Second dog-watch. 8 to 12 First night watch. 12 to 4 a.m. Midday watch. 4 to 8 Morning watch. 8 to 12 Forenoon watch.

There are two divisions which perform duty alternately—the starboard watch and the port watch. The former is called the captain’s watch in the merchant service, often under the command of the second mate; the port watch is under the command of the first mate.

The Black Watch. The gallant 42nd, linked with the 73rd, now called the Royal Highlanders. The 42nd was the first corps raised for the royal service in the Highlands. Their tartan (1729) consisted of dark blue and dark green, and was called black from the contrast which their dark tartans furnished to the scarlet and white of the other regiments.

Watchet. Sky-blue. (Anglo-Saxon, wacdecht, probably dye of the wood plant.)

Water. (See Dancing Water.)

The Father of Waters. The Mississippi (Indian, Miske Senp), the chief river of North America. The Missouri is its child. The Irawaddy is so called also.

Water. Blood thicker than water. (See under Blood.)

Courl holy water. Fair but empty words. In French, “Eau bénite de coux.”

In deep water. In difficulties; in great perplexity.

It makes my mouth water. It is very alluring; it makes me long for it. Saliva is excited in the mouth by strong desire. The French have the same phrase: “Cela fait renif l’eau à la bouche.”

More water glideth by the mill than runs the miller of (Titus Andronicus, ii. 1). The Scotch say, “Mickle water goes by the miller when he sleeps.” (See under Miller.)

Per smackle water drowned the miller. (See Brown the Miller.) The weaver, in fact, is hanged in his own yarn. The French say, “L’embarras de riches.”

Of the first water. Of the highest type; very excellent. (See under Diamond.)

Smooth water runs deep. Deep thinkers are persons of few words; barking dogs do not bite. There are two or three French proverbs of somewhat similar meaning. For example: “En eau endormie point ne se fe,” again, “L’eau qui dort est plus que celle qui coule.” A calm exterior is far more to be feared than a tongue-doughty Bobadil.

The modest water saw its God and blushed. The allusion is to Christ’s turning water into wine at the marriage feast. Richard Crashaw (1670) wrote the Latin epigram in pentameter verse.

“Nympha pudica Deum vidit et erubuit.”

To back water. To row backwards in order to reverse the forward motion of a boat in rowing.

To carry water to the river. To carry coals to Newcastle. In French, “Porter de l’eau à la rivière.”

To fish in troubled water. The French saying is, “Pêcher en eau trouble,” i.e. “Profiter des époques de trouble et de révolution pour faire ses affaires et sa fortune.” (Hilaire Le Gai.)
To hold water. That won't hold water. That is not correct; it is not tenable. It is a vessel which leaks.

To keep one's head above water. To remain out of debt. When immersed in water, while the head is out of water, one is not drowned.

To throw cold water on a scheme. To discourage the proposal; to speak of it slightly.

Water. The coldest water known. Colder than the water of Nomacris (Pliny, xii. 2).

Colder than the water of Dirce. "Direus et Nem. fontes sunt frigidissimi aestate. inter Bilbium et Segobregem, in ripa ferre Salamin annus." (Martial.)

Colder than the water of Dirceella. (Martial, l. 61.)

Colder than the Conthopin Spring of Corinth, that froze up the gastric juices of those that sipped it.

Water-gall. The dark rim round the eyes after much weeping. A peculiar appearance in a rainbow which indicates more rain at hand. "Gall" is the Anglo-Saxon geolaw (yellow).

"And round about her tear-distained eye Blue circles streamed, like rainbows in the sky; These water-galls ... foretell new storms." Shakespeare: Rape of Lucrece.

Water-hole. The big water-hole. The bed of the sea; the ocean.

"We've got to the big water-hole at last ... 'Tis a long way afloat."—Boldwood: Robbery under Arms, chap. xii.

Water-logged. Rendered immovable by too much water in the hold. When a ship leaks and is water-logged, it will not make any progress, but is like a log on the sea, tossed and stationary.

Water-Post. John Taylor, the Thames waterman. (1680-1654).

"I must confess I do want eloquence, And never scarce did learn my address, For having got from 'possum to 'posset, I there was gravelled, nor could farther get." Taylor the Water-Post.

Water-sky (A), in Arctic navigation, is a dark or brown sky, indicating an open sea. An ice-sky is a white one, or a sky tinted with orange or rose-colour, indicative of a frozen sea. (See Ice-Blink.)

Water Stock (7b). To add extra shares. Suppose a "trust" (g.v.) consists of 1,000 shares of £50 each, and the profit available for dividend is 40 per cent., the managers "water the stock," that is, add another 1,000 fully paid-up shares to the original 1,000. There are now 2,000 shares, and the dividend, instead of £40 per cent., is reduced to £20; but the shares are more easily sold, and the shareholders are increased in number.

Water of Jealousy (The). If a woman was known to commit adultery she was to be stoned to death, according to the Mosaic law. (Deut. xxxii. 22.) It, however, the husband had no proof, but only suspected his wife of infidelity, he might take her before the Sanhedrin to be examined, and if she denied it, she was given the "water of jealousy" to drink (Numb. v. 11-22). In this water some of the dust of the sanctuary was mixed, and the priest said to the woman, "If thou hast gone aside may Jehovah make this water bitter to thee, and bring on thee all the curses written in this law." The priest then wrote on a roll the curses, blotted the writing with the water, gave it to the woman, and then handed to her the "water of jealousy" to drink.

Water Tasting like Wine. Pliny (ii. 103) tells us of a fountain in the Isle of Andros, in the temple of Bacchus, which every year, on January 5th, tasted like wine.

Baccius de Thermis (vi. 22) gives numerous examples of similar vinous springs.

In Lanternland there was a fountain in the middle of the temple, the water of which had the flavour of the wine which the drinker most liked. (Rebélais: Pantagruel, v. 42.)

Waters (Sanitary).

For amenia, Schwabach, St. Moritz.

"articular rheumatism, Aix les Bains." neumatic, Mont Dore.

"articular gout. Royat.

"biliary obstructions, Carlsbad.

"calculous disorders, Vichy and Contrexeville.

"diabetes, Neunmähr and Carlsbad.

"gout, Aix les Bains.

"gouty and catarreal dyspepsia, Hamburg and Rüssingen.

"obesity, Marienbad.

"plethoric gout, Carlsbad.

"scrofulous glandular affections, Kreuznach.

"skin diseases, Aix in Chaussie and Constantia.

"throat affections, La Bourboule, Aix les Bains, Uriage, Autereis, Raux Boues.

Waterloo Cup (The). A dog prize. Waterloo is on the banks of the Mersey, about three miles north of Liverpool.

Waterworks (The). The shedding of tears. Many other meanings also.

"Oh, miss, I never thought to have seen this day, and the waterworks began to play."—Thackeray.

Watering Street. A road extending east and west across South Britain. Beginning at Dover, it ran through Canterbury to London, and thence to Cardigan. The word is a corruption of.
Watteau, the paved road of Vitellius, called by the Britons Guet'alain. Poetically the "Milky Way" has been called the Watling Street of the sky. "Secunda via principalis dictur Wateling-stretea, tendens ab euro-austro in sepemibem septemionalem recipit...a Dovaria...usque Cardigan."—Leland.

Watteau. "Peintre de fêtes galantes du roi." (1684-1721.)

Wave. The ninth wave. A notion prevails that the waves keep increasing in regular series till the maximum arrives, and then the series begins again. No doubt when two waves coalesce they form a large one, but this does not occur at fixed intervals. The most common theory is that the tenth wave is the largest, but Tennyson says the ninth.

"And then the two
Drop to the cove, and watch'd the great sea fall
Wave after wave, each mightier than the last,
Till last, a ninth one, gathering half the deep
And fill of yeces, slowly, rose and plunged,
Roaring, and all the wave was in a flame."
Tennyson: The Holy Grail.

Wax-bond End (A). A thread waxed with cobbler's wax and used for binding whips, fishing-rods, ropes, etc., for sewing boots and shoes, etc. It is waxed and used for a bond.

Way-bit. A Yorkshire way-bit. A large overplus. Ask a Yorkshireman the distance of any place, and he will reply so many miles and a way-bit (wee-bit): but the way-bit will prove a frightful length to the traveller who imagines it means only a little bit over. The Highlanders say, "A mile and a bitcock," which means about two miles.

Ways and Means. A parliamentary term, meaning the method of raising the supply of money for the current requirements of the state.

Wayfaring Tree (The). The Guelder rose (g.b.).

"Wayfaring Tree! What ancient claim
Has thou to that right pleasant name?
Was it that some saint pilgrim came Unhopedly to thee,
In the brown desert's weary way,
'Midst thirst and toil's consuming sway,
And there, as 'neath thy shade he lay Blessed the Wayfaring Tree?"
W. B.

Wayland, the Scandinavian Vulcan, was son of the sea-giant Wate, and the sea-nymph Wac-hilt. He was bound apprentice to Mimi the smith. King Nidung cut the sinews of his feet, and cast him into prison, but he escaped in a feather-boat. (Anglo-Saxon weallan, to fabricate.)

Wayland Smith's Cave. A crom-lecht near Lambourn, Berkshire. Scott, in his Kenilworth (chap. xiii.), says, "Here lived a supernatural smith, who would shoe a traveller's horse for a consideration." His fee was sixpence, and if more was offered him he was offended."

Wayland Wood (near Watton, Norfolk), said to be the scene of the Babes in the Wood, and a corruption of "Wailing Wood."

Wayleaves. Right of way through private property for the laying of water-pipes and making of sewers, etc., provided that only the surface-soil is utilised by the proprietor.

"Mr. Woods made an attempt to get the House of Commons to commit itself to the proposition, that the present system of royalty rents and wayleaves is injurious to the great industries."—Liberty Review, April 14th, 1894, p. 507.

Waysgoose. An entertainment given to journeymen, or provided by the journeymen themselves. It is mainly a printers' affair, which literary men and commercial staffs may attend by invitation or sufferance. The word ways means a "bundle of straw," and waysgose a "stubble goose," properly the crowning dish of the entertainment. The Dutch wassen means "to wax fat." The Latin anser sagittum. (See Beafest, Harvest Goose.)

"In the midlands and north of England, every newspaper has its waysgoose."—The Pall Mall Gazette, June 29th, 1892.

We, Coke, in the Institutes, says the first king that wrote we in his grants was King John. All the kings before him wrote ego (I). This is not correct, as Richard Lion-heart adopted the royal we. (See Rymer's Fideles.)

We Three. Did you never see the picture of "We Three"? asks Sir Andrew Agacheek—not meaning himself, Sir Toby Belch, and the clown, but referring to a public-house sign of Two Loggerheads, with the inscription, "We three loggerheads be," the third being the spectator.

We Left Our Country for Our Country's Good. We are transported convicts. The line occurs in a prologue written by George Barrington (a notorious pickpocket) for the opening of the first playhouse at Sydney, in Australia, 16th January, 1798.

"True patriots we, for be it understood,
We left our country for our country's good."

Weak as Water. (See Similes.)
Weak-kneed Christian or Politician. (A.) Irresolute; not thorough; a Laodicean, neither hot nor cold.

"If any weak-kneed Churchman, now hesitating between his (political) party and his Church, is trying to persuade himself that no mischief is in the air, let him take warning."—Newspaper paragraph, October 10th, 1885.

Weapon Salve. A salve said to cure wounds by sympathy. The salve is not applied to the wound, but to the instrument which gave the wound. The direction "Bind the wound and grease the nail" is still common when a wound has been given by a rusty nail. Sir Kenelm Digby says the salve is sympathetic, and quotes several instances to prove that "as the sword is treated the wound inflicted by it feels. Thus, if the instrument is kept wet, the wound will feel cool; if held to the fire, it will feel hot;" etc.

"But she has ta'en the broken lance,
And washed it from the dinted gore,
And splintered it with a spear and an e,"
Sir Walter Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, iii. 23.

If grease must be used to satisfy the ignorant, it can do no harm on the rusty nail, but would certainly be harmful on the wound itself.

Wear. Never wear the image of Deity in a ring. So Pythagoras taught his disciples, and Moses directed that the Jews should make no image of God. Both meant to teach their disciples that God is incorporeal, and not to be likened to any created form. (See Iamblichus: Protreptics, symbol xxiv.)

Never wear a brown hat in Friesland. (See Hat.)

To wear the wooden sword. (See Wood.)

To wear the willow. (See Willow.)

To wear one's heart upon one's sleeve. (See under Heart.)

Wesel. Weesels suck eggs. Hence Shakespeare—

"The weasel scot
Comes sneaking, and so sucks the wincey egg."—Henry V, i. 2.

"I can suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs."—As You Like It, ii. 5.

To catch a wesel asleep. To expect to find a very vigilant person nodding off his guard; to suppose that one who has his weather-eye open cannot see what is passing before him. The French say, Croir avoir trouvé la pie au nid (To expect to find the pie on its nest). The vigilant habits of these animals explain the allusions.

Weather Breeder. (A.) A day of unusual fineness coming suddenly after a series of damp dull ones, especially at the time of the year when such a genial day is not looked for. Such a day is generally followed by foul weather.

Weather-cock. By a Papal enactment made in the middle of the ninth century, the figure of a cock was set up on every church-steeple as the emblem of St. Peter. The emblem is in allusion to his denial of our Lord thrice before the cock crew twice. On the second crowing of the cock the warning of his Master flashed across his memory, and the repentant apostle "went out and wept bitterly."

Weather-eye. I have my weather-eye open. I have my wits about me; I know what I am after. The weather-eye is towards the wind to forecast the weather.

Weather-gage. To get the weather-gage of a person. To get the advantage over him. A ship is said to have the weather-gage of another when it has got to the windward thereof.

"We were the line
Of Rekeby once combined with mine,
I gain the weather-gage of fate."
Sir Walter Scott: Rekeby.

Weather-glass (The Peasant's) or "Poor man’s warning." The scarlet pimpernel, which closes its petals at the approach of rain.

"Closed is the pink-eyed pimpernel;
’Twill surely rain; I see with sorrow.
Our jaunt must be put off to-morrow."
Dr. Jenner.

Web of Life. The destiny of an individual from the cradle to the grave. The allusion is to the three Fates who, according to Roman mythology, spin the thread of life, the pattern being the events which are to occur.

Wed is Anglo-Saxon, and means a pledge. The ring is the pledge given by the man to avouch that he will perform his part of the contract.

Wedding Anniversaries.
The 5th anniversary is called the Wooden wedding.
The 10th anniversary is called the Tin wedding.
The 15th anniversary is called the Crystal wedding.
The 20th anniversary is called the China wedding.
The 25th anniversary is called the Silver wedding.
The 50th anniversary is called the Golden wedding.
The 60th anniversary is called the Diamond wedding. From the nature of the gifts suitable for each respective anniversary.
Wedding Finger. Macrobius says the thumb is too busy to be set apart, the forefinger and little finger are only half protected, the middle finger is called meckius, and is too opprobrious for the purpose of honour, so the only finger left is the praemus or wedding finger. (See RING, FINGERS.)

Wedding Knives. Undoubtedly, one knife or more than one was in Chaucer's time part of a bride's paraphernalia. Allusions to this custom are very numerous.

"See, at my girdle hang my wedding knives." Dekker: Match Me in London (1611).

Wednesday. Woden-es or Odin-es Day, called by the French "Mercredi" (Mercury's Day). The Persians regard it as a "red-letter day," because the moon was created on the fourth day. (Genesis iv. 14-19.)

"But the last Wednesday of November is called "Black Wednesday.""

Weed of Worcester (The). The elm, which is very common indeed in the county.

Weeds. Widow's weeds. (Anglo-Saxon, wead, a garment.) There are the compounds wead-bréé (breaches or garment for the breech), weadless (naked or without clothing), and so on. Spenser speaks of "A goodly lady clad in hunter's weed."

Weeping Brides. A notion long prevailed in this country that it augured ill for a matrimonial alliance if the bride did not weep profusely at the wedding.

As no witch could shed more than three tears, and those from her left eye only, a copious flow of tears gave assurance to the husband that the lady had not "plighted her troth" to Satan, and was no witch.

Weeping Cross. To go by Weeping Cross. To repent, to grieve. In ancient times weeping crosses were crosses where penitents offered their devotions. In Stafford there is a weeping cross.

"Few men have wedded... their paramours... but have come home by Weeping Cross." — Florio: Montaigne.

Weeping Philosopher. Heraclitus. So called because he grieved at the folly of man. (Flourished B.C. 500.)

Weeping Saint (The). St. Swithin. So called from the tradition of forty days' rain, if it rains on July 16th.

Weigh Anchor. Be off, get you gone. To weigh anchor is to lift it from its moorings, so that the ship may start on her voyage. As soon as this is done the ship is under weigh — i.e. in movement. (Saxon, wegan, to lift up, carry.)

"Get off with you; come, come! I weigh anchor." — Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary.

Weighed in the Balance, and found Wanting. The custom of weighing the Maharajah of Travancore in a scale against gold coin is still in use, and is called Thirunnarum. The gold is heaped up till the Maharajah rises well in the air. The priests chant their Vedic hymns, the Maharajah is adored, and the gold is distributed among some 15,000 Brahmins, more or less.

Weight. A dead weight. (See DEAD.)

Weight-for-age Race (A). A sort of handicap (q.v.), but the weights are apportioned according to certain conditions, and not according to the dictum of a "capper." Horses of the same age carry similar weights vesstitis parvibus. (See SELLING-RACE, PLATE, SWEEPSTAKES.)

Weissnichtwo (vice-neeckt-vo). I know not where; Utopia; Kennaquhair; an imaginary place in Carlyle's Sartor Resartus. (See UTOPIA.)

Welcher. (See WELLSHER.)

Weld or Wold. The dyer's-weed (resedâ luteola), which yields a beautiful yellow dye. (Anglo-Saxon, geld or gold, our yellow, etc.)

Well Began is Half Done. "The beginning is half the whole." (Pythagoras.)

French: "Heureux commencement est la moitié de l'oeuvre." "Ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte.""(){

Latin: "Incipere dimidium facti est corpisse." (Austros.)

"Dimidium facti, qui cepit, habet." — Horace.

"Facilius est incitare currentem, quam commovere languentem." ( Cicero.)

Well-beloved. Charles VI. of France, le Bien-aime, (1380, 1380-1422.)

Well-founded Doctor. Egidîus de Columba. (*-1318.)

Well of English Undecked. So Geoffrey Chaucer is spoken of by Spenser in the Faerie Queene, iv. 2. (1328-1400.)

Well of St. Keynes [Cornwall]: The reputed virtue of this well is that which ever of a married pair first drinks its waters will be the paramount power of the house. Southey has a ballad on the subject. The gentleman left the bride at the church door, but the lady took a bottle of the water to church.

Well of Samaria, now called Nebud, is seventy-five feet deep.

Well of Wisdom. This was the well under the protection of the god Mimir (q.v.). Odin, by drinking thereof, became the wisest of all beings. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Wells (Somersetshire). So called from St. Andrew's Well.

Weller (Sam). Pickwick's factotum. His wit, fidelity, archness, and wide-awakeness are inimitable. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Tony Weller. Father of Sam. Type of the old stage-coachman; portly in size, and dressed in a broad-brimmed hat, great-coat of many capes, and top-boots. His stage-coach was his castle, and elsewhere he was as green as a sailor on terra firma. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Wellington's horse, Copenhagen. (Died at the age of twenty-seven.) (See Horse.)

Le Wellington des Joueurs. Lord Rivers was so called in Paris.

"Le Wellington des Joueurs lost £2,000 at a sitting, beginning at twelve at night, and ending at seven the following morning."—Edinburgh Review, July, 1814.

Welsh Ambassador (Thr). The cuckoo. Logan, in his poem To the Cuckoo calls it the "messenger of Spring"; but the Welsh ambassador means that the bird announces the migration of Welsh labourers into England for summer employment.

"Why, thou rogue of universality, do I not know thee? This sound is like the cuckoo, the Welsh ambassador."—Bampf : A Trick to Catch the Old One, iv, 5.

Welsh Main. Same as a "battle royal." (See Battle.)

Welsh Mortgage (4). A pledge of land in which no day is fixed for redemption.

Welsh Rabbit. Cheese melted and spread over buttered toast. The word rabbit is a corruption of rare-bit.

"The Welshman he loved toasted cheese, Which made his mouth like a mouse-trap."—When Good King Arthur Ruled the Land.

Welsh'er. One who lays a bet, but absconds if he loses. It means a Welshman, and is based upon the nursery rhyme, "Taffy was a Welshman, Taffy was a thief."

Wench (A) is the Anglo-Saxon word wenec, a child. It is now chiefly used derogatorily, and the word wenching is quite offensive. In the Midland counties, when a peasant addresses his wife as "my wench," he expresses endearment.

Wench, like girl, was at one time applied to either sex. Chaucer has "yonge-girls" for youngsters of both sexes. We find the phrase "knave-girl" used for boys; and Isaac, in the Ormulum, is called a wench or wenchel, similarly, "maid" is applied to both sexes, hence the compound maiden-servant, a female child or maiden.

Wer'ner, alias Kruitzner, alias Count Siegendorf. Being driven from the dominion of his father, he wandered about as a beggar for twelve years. Count Stral'enheim, being the next heir, hunted him from place to place. At length Stral'enheim, travelling through Silesia, was rescued from the Oder by Ulric, and lodged in an old palace where Werner had been lodging for some few days. V. erner robbed Stral'enheim of a roselieu of gold, but scarcely had he done so when he recognised in Ulric his lost son, and chid him for saving the count. Ulric murdered Stral'enheim, and provided for his father's escape to Siegendorf castle near Prague. Werner recovered his dominion, but found that his son was a murderer, and imagination is left to fill up the future fate of both father and son. (Byron: Werner.)

Wer'thor. The sentimental hero of Goethe's romance called The Sorrows of Werther.

Werewolf (French, loup-garou). A bogie who roams about devouring infants, sometimes under the form of a man, sometimes as a wolf followed by dogs, sometimes as a white dog, sometimes as a black goat, and occasionally invisible. Its skin is bullet-proof, unless the bullet has been blessed in a chapel dedicated to St. Hubert. This superstition was once common to almost all Europe, and still lingers in Brittany, Limousin, Auvergne, Savoy, Wallachia, and White Russia. In the fifteenth century a council of theologians, convoked by the Emperor Sigismund, gravely decided that the loup-garou was a reality. It is somewhat curious that we say a "bug-bear," and the French a "bug-wolf." ("Werewolf" is Anglo-Saxon wer, a man, and wolf—a man in the semblance of a wolf. "Gar" of garou is wer or war, a man; and "ou," a corruption of oor, an ogre.)

Ovid tells the story of Lycaon, King of Arcadia, turned into a wolf because he tested the divinity of Jupiter by serving up to him a "hash of human flesh."

Herodotus describes the Neuri as sorcerers, who had the power of assuming once a year the shape of wolves.

Pliny relates that one of the family of Antius was chosen annually, by lot, to be transformed into a wolf, in which shape he continued for nine years.

St. Patrick, we are told, converted Veretua, King of Wales, into a wolf.

Wesleyan. A follower of John Wesley (1703-1791), founder of the Wesleyan Methodists.

Wessex, or West Saxon Kingdom, included Hants, Dorset, Wilts, Somerset, Surrey, Gloucestershire, and Bucks.

Westmoreland (Land of the West Moors). Geoffrey of Monmouth says (iv. 17) that Mar or Marius, son of Arviragus, one of the descendants of Brutus the Trojan wanderer, killed Rodric, a Pict, and set up a monument of his victory in a place which he called "Westmar-land," and the chronicler adds that the "inscription of this stone remains to this day." (Saxon, West-mor-ing-land.)

Wet. To have a wet. To have a drink.

Wet-bob and Dry-bob. At Eton a wet-bob is a boy who goes in for boating, but a dry-bob is one who goes in for cricket.

Wet Finger (With a), easily, directly. "D'en tour de main." The allusion is to the old custom of spinning, in which the spinner constantly wetted the forefinger with the mouth.

"I can bring myself round with a wet finger."—Stir W. Scott: Roderiques, chap. xxiii. (and in many other places).

"The spirit being grieved and provoked, will not return again with a wet finger."—Grose: Whole Armour of God, p. 456 (1816).

"I can find One with a wet finger that is stark blind."—Tivd of Love and Fortune (1833).

"Canst thou bring me thither?"—Poe's. "With a wet finger."—Wisdom of Dr. Dodgson (1300).

Wetherall (Elizabeth). A pseudonym adopted by Miss Susan Warner, an American writer, author of The Wide Wide World, and other works.

Wexford Bridge Massacre. In the great Irish Rebellion of 1798, May 26th, some 14,000 Irish insurgents attacked Wexford, defeated the garrison, put to death all those taken prisoners, and on the 30th frightened the town into a surrender. They treated the Protestants with the utmost barbarity, and, after taking Ennisworth, encamped on Vinegar Hill (q.v.). When informed that Wexford was retaken by the English, the insurgents massacred about a thousand Protestant prisoners in cold blood.

Weyd-monat. The Anglo-Saxon name for June, "because the beasts did then weyd in the meadow, that is to say, go and feed there." (Versteagan.)

Whale. Not a fish, but a cetaceous mammal.

A group of whales is called a school. The sail is called a blubber. The female is called a cow. The fore-flukes are called paddles. The whale is called a bull-whale. The spear used in whale-fishing is called a harpoon. The young of whales is a cub or calf.

Toothed-whales include sperm-whales and dolphins.

Whale-bone whales include orquals and humpbacks.

Whale. Very like a whale. Very much like a cock-and-bull story; a fudge. Hamlet chaffs Polonius by comparing a cloud to a camel, and then to a weasel, and when the courtier assents Hamlet adds, "Or like a whale"; to which Polonius answers, "Very like a whale." (Act iii. 2.)

Whalebone (2 syl.). White as whalebone. Our forefathers seemed to confuse the walrus with the whale; ivory was made from the teeth of the walrus, and "white as whalebone" is really a blunder for "white as walrus-ivory."

Wharncliffe (2 syl.). A Wharncliffe meeting is a meeting of the shareholders of a railway company, called for the purpose of obtaining their assent to a bill in Parliament bearing on the company's railway. So called from Lord Wharncliffe, its originator.

Wharton. Philip Wharton, Duke of Northumberland, described by Pope in the Moral Essays in the lines beginning—

"Wharton, the scorn and wonder of our days."

A most brilliant orator, but so licentious that he wasted his patrimony in drunkenness and self-indulgence. He was outlawed for treason, and died in a wretched condition at a Bernardine convent in Catalonia. (1698-1731.)
What we Gave

What we Gave we Have, What we Spent we Had, What we Had we Lost. Epitaph of the Good Earl of Courtenay. (Gibbon: History of the Courtenay Family.)

The epitaph in St. George's church, Doncaster, runs thus:

"How now, who is here? I, Robin of Doncaster And Margaret, my love. That I spent, that I had; That I gave, that I have; That I left, that I lost."

This is a free translation of Martial’s distich—

"Extra fortunam est quidquid donatur amicitia Quas dederis, solus senper habeas opes."

What’s What. He knows what’s what. He is a shrewd fellow not to be imposed on. One of the senseless questions of logic was "Quid est quid?"

"He knew what’s what, and that’s as high As monstrous wit can rise."—Butler: Hudibras, part I, canto I.

Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, nicknamed at Oxford "the White Bear" (White from his white overcoat, and Bear from the rude, unceremonious way in which he would trample upon an adversary in argument). (1757-1833.)

Wheel or Ruel means a tin-mine. (Cornwall.)

Wheat (the bird) has no connection with either wheat or ear, but it is the Anglo-Saxon hweat (white), ear (rump). Sometimes called the White-rump, and in French blanquét (the little blancon), so called from its white rump.

Wheel. Emblematical of St. Catharine, who was put to death on a wheel somewhat resembling a chaff-cutter. St. Donatus bears a wheel set round with lights.

St. Euphemia and St. Willigis both carry wheels.

St. Quintin is sometimes represented with a broken wheel at his feet.

To put one’s spoke into another man’s wheel. (See under SPOKE.)

Wheel of Fortune (The). Fortuna, the goddess, is represented on ancient monuments with a wheel in her hand, emblematical of her inconstancy.

"Though Fortune’s malice or enmity throw my state, My mind excels the compass of her wheel."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, iv. 3.

Whelps. Fifth-rate men of war. Thus, in Howell’s letters we read, "At the return of this fleet two of the whelps were cast away"; and in the Travels of Sir W. Brevetton we read, "I went aboard one of the king’s ships, called the ninth whelp, which is... 216 ton and... tonnaage in king’s books." In Queen Elizabeth’s navy was a ship called Lion’s Whelp, and her navy was distinguished as first, second, ... tenth whelp.

Whetstone. (See Acquis Navigius.)

Whetstone of Witte (The) (1550), by Robert Recorde, a treatise on algebra. The old name for algebra was the "Cosmic Art," and Cos Imenius rendered into English is "the Whetstone of Wit." It will be remembered that the maid told the belated traveller in the Fortunes of Nigel that her master had "no other books but her young mistress’s Bible... and her master’s Whetstone of Witte, by Robert Recorde."

Whig is from Whiggamore, a corruption of Ugham more (pack-saddle thieves), from the Celtic ugham (a pack-saddle). The Scotch insurgent Covenanters were called pack-saddle thieves, from the pack-saddles which they used to employ for the stowage of plunder. The Marquis of Argyle collected a band of these vagabonds, and instigated them to a war on opposing certain government measures in the reign of James I., and in the reign of Charles II., all who opposed government were called the Argyll Whigmanns, contracted into whigs. (See TORY.)

"The north-west counties of Scotland have seldom seen enough to serve them all the year round, and the northern parts producing more than they need, those in the west went in summer to buy at Leith the stores that came from the north. From the word whigmann, used in driving their horses, all that drove were called the whigmanns, contracted into whigs. Now, in the year before the news came down of Duke Hamilton’s defeat, the ministers animated their people to rise and march to Edinburgh; and they came up, marching on the head of their parishes, with an unheard-of far, praying and preaching all the way as they came. The Marquis of Argyle and his party came and headed them, being about 600. They was called the "Whigmanns" indeed; and ever after that, all who opposed the court came in contempt to be called whigs. From Scotland the word was brought into England, where it is now one of our unhappy terms of disunion."—Bishop Burnet: Own Times.

Whigism. The political tenets of the Whigs, which may be broadly stated to be political and religious liberty. Certainly Bishop Burnet’s assertion that they are "opposed to the court" may or may not be true. In the reigns of Charles II. and his brother James, no doubt they were opposed to the court, but it was far otherwise in the reign of William III., George I., etc., when the Tories were the anti-court party.

Whip (4), in the Legislative Assemblies, is a person employed to whip up members on either side. The Whips give notice to members that a motion is expected when their individual vote may be desirable. The circular runs: "A motion is expected when your vote is ‘earnestly required.’" If the word "earnest" has only one red-ink dash under it the receiver is expected to come, if it has two dashes it means that he "ought" to come, if it has three dashes it means that he "must" come, if it has four dashes it means to stay away at your peril." These notices are technically called "Red Whips." (Annual Register, 1877, p. 86.)

A whip. A notice sent to a member of Parliament by a "whip" (see above) to be in his place at the time stated when a "division" is expected.

Whip. He whipped round the corner—ran round it quickly. (Dutch, wiipen; Welsh, chwipwio, to whip; chwip, a flick or flirt.)

He whipped it up in a minute. The allusion is to the hoisting machine called a whip. A single whip is a rope passing over one pulley; a double whip is a rope passed over two single pulleys attached to a yard-arm.

Whip-dog Day. October 18 (St. Luke’s Day). Brand tells us that a priest about to celebrate mass on St. Luke’s Day, happened to drop the pyx, which was matched up by a dog, and this was the origin of Whip-dog Day. (Popular Antiquities, ii. 273.)

Whip with Six Strings (The). Called "the Bloody Statute." The religious code of six articles enacted by Convocation and Parliament in the reign of Henry VIII. (1539).

Whipping Boy. A boy kept to be whipped when a prince deserved chastisement. Mungo Murray stood for Charles I., Barnaby Fitzpatrick for Edward VI. (Fuller: Church History, ii. 342.) D’Oseat and Du Perron, afterwards cardinals, were whipped by Clement VIII. for Henri IV. of France. Also called a whip-boy.

Whisker. A security for money. John de Castro of Portugal, having captured the castle of Diu, in India, borrowed of the inhabitants of Goa 1,000 pistoles for the maintenance of his fleet, and gave one of his whiskers as security of payment, saying, "All the gold in the world cannot equal the value of this natural ornament, which I deposit in your hands."

Whisky. Contracted from the Gaelic ochh-‘a-gai (water of health), Usquebaugh, Irish uisce-‘a-bhach (water of life); eau de vie, French - (water of life).

I...L. whisky. (See L.L. Whiskey.) Whisky, drink divine (the song) was by O’Leary, not by John Sheehan. As a pretty general rule the Scotch word is whiskey, and the Irish word whisky, without the s.

Whist. Cotton says that "the game is so called from the silence that is to be observed in the play." Dr. Johnson has adopted this derivation; but Taylor the Water-poet (1650), Swift (1728), and Barrington (1787) called the game Whisk, to the great discomfiture of this etymology. Pope (1715) called it whist.

The first known mention of whist in print was in a book called The Motto, published in 1621, where it is called whisk. The earliest known use of the present spelling is in Butler’s Hudibras (1663).

Let nioe Viquette the boast of France remain, And staudus Ombre be the pride of Spain; Invention’s praise shall England yield to none, While she can call delightful Whist her own.

Alexander Thomson: A poem in eight cantos on Whist. (Second edition, 1793.)

Whistle (noun). Champion of the whistle. The person who can hold out longest in a drinking bout. A Dane, in the train of Anne of Denmark, had an ebony whistle placed on the table, and whoever of his guests was able to blow it when the rest of the company were too far gone for the purpose was called the champion. Sir Robert Laurie of Maxwelon, after a house lasting three nights and three days, left the Dane under the table and blew his requiem on the whistle.

To wet one’s whistle. To take a drink. Whistle means a pipe (Latin, flautula; Saxon, hwistle), hence the wind-pipe.

So was his joy whistal well y-wet. Chaucer: Canterbury Tales.

You paid too dearly for your whistle. You paid dearly for something you fancied, but found that it did not answer your expectation. The allusion is to a story told by Dr. Franklin of his nephew, who set his mind on a common whistle, which he bought of a boy for four times its value. Franklin says the ambitious who dance attendance on court, the miser who gives this world and the next for gold, the libertine who ruins his health for pleasure, the girl who marries a brute for money, all p
Whist

"too much for their whistle."

Worth the whistle. Worth calling worth inviting; worth notice. The hr is worth the pains of whistling for. Th Haywood, in one of his dialogues con sisting entirely of proverbs, says, " is a poor dog that is not worth ti whistling."' Gorleri says to Albany—

"I have been worth the whistle."
Shakespeare: King Lear, iv. 2

Whistle (verb). You may whistle f that. You must not expect it. The r ference is to sailors whistling in th wind. "They call the winds, but w they come when they do call them?"

"Only a little hour ago
I was whistling to St. Antonio
For a capital of wind to fill our sail.
And instead of a breeze he has sent a gale

Longfellows: Golden Legend, v

You must whistle more. In the o whistle-tankards, the whistle comes in play when the tankard is empty, to an nounce to the drawer that more liquor is wanted. Hence the expression, If a man wants liquor, he must whistle for it.

Whistle Down the Wind (T). To defame a person. The cognate phrase "blown upon" is more familiar. The idea is to whistle down the wind that the reputation of the person may be blown upon.

Whistle for the Wind. (See CapfuI)'

"What gales are sold on Lapland's shore?
How whistle rash bids tempests roar!"
Sir Walter Scott: Rob Roy, ii. 11

White denotes purity, simplicity, and candour; innocence, truth, and hope.
The ancient Druids, and indeed the priests generally of antiquity, used to wear white vestments, as did the clergy of the Established Church of England when they officiate in any sacred service.
The magi also wore white robes.
The head of Osiris, in Egypt, was adorned with a white tiara; all her ornaments were white; and her priests were clad in white.
The priests of Jupiter, and the Flan-men Dialis of Rome, were clothed in white, and wore white hats. The victims offered to Jupiter were white. The Roman festivals were marked with white chalk, and at the death of a Caesar the national mourning was white; white horses were sacrificed to the sun, white oxen were selected for sacrifice by the Draids, and white elephants are held sacred in Siam.
The Persians affirm that the divinities are habituated in white.

White Bird (The). Conscience, or the soul of man. The Mahometans have preserved the old Roman idea in the doctrine that the souls of the just lie under the throne of God, like white birds, till the resurrection morn.

"A white bird, she told him once . . . he must carry on his bosom across a crowded public place —his own soul was like that."—Peter: Martin the Epicurean, chap. ii.

White Brethren or White-caled Brethren. A sect in the beginning of the fifteenth century. Moehaim says
(bk. ii. p. 2, chap. v) a certain priest came from the Alps, clad in white, with an immense concourse of followers all dressed in white linen also. They marched through several provinces, following a cross borne by their leader.
Boniface X. ordered their leader to be burnt, and the multitude dispersed.

White Caps. A rebellious party of zealous Mahometans, put down by Kien-ling the Chinese emperor, in 1758. So called from their head-dress.

White Caps. An influential family in Kerry (Ireland), who acted a similar part as Judge Lynch in America. When neighbours became unruly, the white caps visited them during the night and beat them soundly. Their example was followed about a hundred years ago in other parts of Ireland.

White Caps (1891). A party in North America opposed to the strict Sabbatarian observance. So called because they wear white caps. First heard of at Okayville, Illinois.

White-coat (A). An Austrian soldier. So called because he wears a white cost. Similarly, an English soldier is called a red-coat. In old Rome, ad saga ire meant to "become a soldier," and tumere sagum to enlist, from the dagum or military cloak worn by the soldier, in contradistinction to the toga worn by the citizen in times of peace.

White Cockade. The badge worn by the followers of Charles Edward, the Pretender.

White Company (The). "Le Blanche Compagnie." A band of French cut-throats organised by Bertrand du Guesclin and led against Pedro the Cruel.

"Se faisaient appelier 'Le Blanche Compagnie,' pour qu'ils marcheroient dans la croix blanche sur l'île de, comme vouloir témoinant qu'ils n'avoient pris les armes que pour abolir le ju-daisme en Espagne, et combattre le Prince qui le protégeait."—Memoires Historiques.

White Czar (The). Strictly speaking means the Czar of Muscovy: the King of Muscovy was called the White King from the white robes which he wore. The King of Poland was called the Black King.

"Sunt qui principem Moscoviae Album Regem nominant. Ego quidem causam diligenter querimus; cur regis ab imperio appellatur, cum nemo principem Moscoviae so titulo antea (Ivan III.) esset usus. Credo autem ut Persam anns propus rubes teguments capit; 'Kisht-pasu' (i.e. rubum caput) vocant: its reges Moscoviae proprius abe tegumenta Albos Regus' appelant."—Septimund.

"The marriage of the Czarvitch with the Princess Alex of Russia (2 syl.) will impress the Oriental mind with the expectation that the Empress of India and the White One will henceforth...labour to avoid the...mischief of disagreement."—The Standard, April 21st, 1894.

White Elephant. King of the White Elephant. The proudest title borne by the kings of Ava and Siam. In Ava the white elephant bears the title of "lord," and has a minister of high rank to superintend his household.

The land of the White Elephant, Siam. To have a white elephant to keep. To have an expensive and unprofitable dignity to support, or a pet article to take care of. For example, a person moving is determined to keep a pet carpet, and therefore hires his house to fit his carpet. The King of Siam makes a present of a white elephant to such of his courtiers as he wishes to ruin.

White Feather. To show the white feather. To show cowardice. No gamecock has a white feather. A white feather indicates a cross-breed in birds.

Showing the white feather. Some years ago a bloody war was raging between the Indians and settlers of the backwoods of North America. A Quaker, who refused to fly, saw one day a horde of savages rushing down towards his house. When he set food before them, and when they had eaten the chief fastened a white feather over the door as a badge of friendship and peace. Though many bands passed that house, none ever violated the covenant by injuring its inmates or property.

White Friars. The Carmelites. So called because they dressed in white.

Whitefriars, London. So called from a monastery of White Friars which formerly stood in Water Lane.

White Harvest (4). A late harvest, when the ground is white of a morning with hoarfrost. The harvest of 1891 was a white harvest.

White Hat. (See under Hat.)

White Horse of Wantage (Berkshire), cut in the chalk hills. This horse commemorates a great victory gained by Alfred over the Danes, in the reign of his brother Ethelred I. The battle is called the battle of Beecesdon (Asthreehill). The horse is 37½ feet long, and may be seen at the distance of fifteen miles. (Dr. Wise.)

An annual ceremony was once held, called "Scouring the White Horse."

White Horses. Foam-crested waves.

"The resemblance...has commonly been drawn between the horse (and the wave), in regard to his mane, and the foam-tipped waves, which are still called white horses."—W. E. Gladstone: Nineteenth Century, November, 1885.

White House. The presidential mansion in the United States. It is a building of freestone, painted white, at Washington. Figuratively, it means the Presidency; as, "He has his eye on the White House." (See WHITEHALL.)

White Ladies [Les Dames Blanches]. A species of fée in Normandy. They lurk in ravines, fords, bridges, and other narrow passes, and ask the passenger to dance. If they receive a courteous answer, well; but if a refusal, they seize the churl and fling him into a ditch, where thorns and briars may serve to teach him gentleness of manner.

"The most famous of these ladies is La Dame d’Aprigny, who used to occupy the site of the present Rue St. Quentin, at Bayeux, and La Dame Abonde. "Vocant dominam Abundiam pro eo quod donibus, quas frequentant, abundantiam bonorum temporum praestare putantur non a aliter tibi sitendum est neque aliter quam quemadmodum de illis audistis." (William of Auvergne, 1248.) (See BERCITIA.)

"One kind of these the Italian: Fata name: The French call Fée; we Syntas: and the same Others White Dames, and those that them have seen.

Night Ladies some, of which Habundia’s queen," Hierarchia, viii. p. 507.

The White Lady. The legend says that Bertha promised the workmen of Neubau a sweet soup and carp on the completion of the castle. In remembrance thereof, these dainties were given to the poor of Bohemia on Maundy Thursday, but have been discontinued.

The most celebrated in Britain is the White Lady of Avenel, the creation of Sir Walter Scott.

White Lady of German legend. A being dressed in white, who appears at the castle of German princes to forebode a death. She last appeared, it is said, in White Lies

1879, just prior to the death of Prince Waldemar. She carries a bunch of keys at her side, and is always dressed in white. The first instance of this apparition occurred in the sixteenth century, and the name given to the lady is Bertha von Rosenberg (in Bohemia).

---

White Sheep [Ak-koën-loo]. A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. The Sophive'an dynasty of Persia was founded by one of this tribe.

White Squall. One which produces no diminution of light, in contradistinction to a black squall, in which the clouds are black and heavy.

White Stone. Days marked with a white stone. Days of pleasure; days to be remembered with gratification. The Romans used a white stone or piece of chalk to mark their lucky days with on the calendar. Those that were unlucky they marked with black charcoal. (See AND-LETTER DAY.)

White Stone (Rev. ii. 17). To him that overcometh will I give . . . a white stone; and in the stone a new name [is] written which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it [i.e. the stone]. In primitive times, when travelling was difficult for want of places of public accommodation, hospitality was exercised by private individuals to a great extent. When the guest left, the host gave him a small white stone cut in two; on one half the host wrote his name, and on the other the guest; the host gave the guest the half containing his [host's] name, and vice versa. This was done that the guest at some future time might return the favour, if needed. Our text says, "I will give him to eat of the hidden manna"—i.e., I will feed or entertain him well, and I will keep my friendship, sacred, inviolable, and known only to himself.

White Surrey. The horse of Richard III. (See HORSÉ.)

"Saddle white Surrey for the field."
Shakespeare: Richard III, v. 3.

White Tincture. That preparation which the alchemists believed would convert any baser metal into silver. It is also called the Stone of the Second Order, the Little Elixir, and the Little Magisterium. (See RED TINCTURE.)

White Water-lotus [Pe-ien-kou]. A secret society which greatly disturbed the empire of China in the reign of Kea-King. (1796-1820.)
White Widow. The Duchess of Tyrconnell, wife of Richard Talbot, Lord-deputy of Ireland under James II, created Duke of Tyrconnell a little before the king's abdication. After the death of Talbot, a female, supposed to be his duchess, supported herself for a few days by her needle. She wore a white mask, and dressed in white. (Pennant: London, p. 147.)

White Witch (A). A cunning fellow; one knowing in white art in contradistinction to black art.

"Two or three years past there came to these parts one . . . what the vulgar calls a white witch, a cunning man, and such like."—Sir W. Scott: Kentworth, chap. ix.

White as Driven Snow. (See SIMILES.)

White in the Eye. It is said that the devil has no white in his eyes, and hence the French locution, "Celui qui n'a point de blanc en l'œil." "Do you see any white in my eye?" is asked by one who means to insinuate he is no fool or no knave—that is, he is not like the devil with no white in the eye.

Whitbait Dinner. The ministerial dinner that announces the near close of the parliamentary session. Sir Robert Preston, M.P. for Dover, first invited his friend George Rose (Secretary of the Treasury) and an elder brother of the Trinity House to dine with him at his fishing cottage on the banks of Dagenham Lake. This was at the close of the session. Rose on one occasion proposed that Mr. Pitt, their mutual friend, should be asked to join them; this was done, and Pitt promised to repeat his visit the year following, when other members swelled the party. This went on for several years, when Pitt suggested that the master should be in future nearer town, and Greenwich was selected. Lord Camden next advised that each man should pay his quota. The dinner became an annual feast, and was until lately (1892) a matter of course. The time of meeting was Trinity Monday, or as near Trinity Monday as circumstances would allow, and therefore was near the close of the session.

Whitboys. A secret agrarian association organised in Ireland about the year 1759. So called because they wore white shirts in their nightly expeditions. In 1787 a new association appeared, the members of which called themselves "Right-boys." The Whiteboys were originally called "Levellers," from their throwing down fences and levelling enclosures. (See LEVELLERS.)

Whitehall (London) obtained its name from the white and fresh appearance of the front, compared with the ancient buildings in York Place. (Brayley: Londoniana.) (See WHITE HOUSE.)

Whitesashed. Said of a person who has taken the benefit of the Insolvent Act. He went to prison covered with debts and soiled with "dirty ways:" he comes out with a clean bill to begin the contest of life afresh.

Whit-leather. The skin of a horse cured and whitened for whip-thongs, hedging-gloves, and so on.

"Thy serdill made of whitleather whanse . . . is turned now to velvet."—MS. Long. 241.

Whitsunday. White Sunday. The seventh Sunday after Easter, to commemorate the "Descent of the Holy Ghost" on the day of Pentecost. In the Primitive Church the newly-baptised wore white from Easter to Pentecost, and were called abbatii (white-robed).

The last of the Sundays, which was also the chief festival, was called emphatically Dominica in Albis (Sunday in White).

Another etymology is Wit or Wisdom Sunday, the day when the Apostles were filled with wisdom by the Holy Ghost.

"This day Wit-sunday is cald. For wisdom and wit serene fald. Was zomen to the Apostles as this day."—Combr. Univers. MS. Dd. i. 1, p. 234.

(Compare Witten-agenote.)

"We ought to keep this our Wit-Sunday because the law of God was then of the Holy Wyght or Ghost delivered goostly unto vs."—Tuynerm (1640). "This day is called Wytsunday because the Holy Ghost brought wyse and wydom into Christia disciples . . . and fylled them ful of gostli wyste."—In die Pentecostis (printed by Wynken de Worde).

Whittington. (See under CAT; also WHITTINGTON.)

Riley in his Monumenta Gildhallae Londinensis (p. xvii) says achat was used at the time for "trading" (i.e. buying and selling), and that Whittington made his money by achat, called acat. We have the word in cater, caterer.

"As much error exists respecting Dick Whittington, the following account will be useful. He was born in Gloucestershire, in the middle of the fourteenth century, and was the son of a knight of good property. He went to London to learn how to become a merchant. His master was a relative, and took a great interest in the boy, who subsequently married Alice, his master's daughter. He became very rich, and was two times Mayor of London, but the first time was before the office was created. Lord Mayor Richard II died in 1398, and in his year of office, about sixty-three years of age.
Widow's Piano

Whittle (A). A knife. (Anglo-Saxon hwytel, a knife; hwaet, sharp or keen.)

"Walser de Audeham holds land of the king in the forest, in the county of Salop, by the service of paying to the king yearly at his exchequer two knives (whistles), whereof one ought to be of that value or goodness that at the first stroke it would cut asunder in the middle a hazel rod of a year's growth, and of the length of a cubit, which service ought to be ... on the morrow of St. Michael. ... The said knives (whistles) to be delivered to the chamberlain to keep for the king's use."—Ancient Tenures.

Whittle Down. To cut away with a knife or whittle; to reduce; to encroach. In Cumberland, underpaid schoolmasters used to be allowed Whittle-gait—i.e., the privilege of knife and fork at the table of those who employ them.

The Americans "whittled down the royal throne;" "whittled out a commonwealth;" "whittle down the forest trees;" "whittle out a railroad;" "whittle down to the thin end of nothing." (Saxon, hwytel, a large knife.)

"We have whittled down our loss extremely, and will not allow a man more than 150 English slain out of 4,000."—Walpole.

Whitworth Gun. (See Gun.)

Whole Duty of Man. Tenison, Bishop of Lincoln, says the author was Dr. Chaplin, of University College, Oxford. (Econyn: Diary.)

Thomas Hearne ascribes the authorship to Archbishop Sancroft.

Some think Dr. Hawkins, who wrote the introduction, was the author.

The following names have also been suggested:—Lady Packington (assisted by Dr. Fell), Archbishop Sterne, Archbishops Woodhead, William Fulham, Archbishop Frewen (President of Magdalen College, Oxford), and others.

Whole Gale (A). A very heavy wind. The three degrees are a fresh gale, a strong gale, and a heavy or whole gale.

Whom the Gods Love Die Young [Herodotus]. Cited in Don Juan, canto iv. 12 (death of Haidei).

Wick, Wicked, and in French Méche, Méchant. That the two English words and the two French words should have similar resemblances and similar meanings is a remarkable coincidence, especially as the two adjectives are quite independent of the nouns in their etymology. "Wick" is the Anglo-Saxon weace, a rush or reed, but "wicked" is the Anglo-Saxon weac or wac, vile. So "méche" is the Latin musa, a wick, but "méchant" is the old French mestant, unlucky.

Wicked Bible. (See Bible.)

Wicked Prayer Book (The). Printed 1636, octavo. The Fourteenth Sunday after Trinity reads:—

"Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these: adultery, fornication, uncleanness, idolatry ... they who do these things shall inherit the kingdom of God." (Of course, "shall inherit" should be "shall not inherit").

Wicked Weed (The). Hops.

"After the introduction into England of the wicked weed called hops."—Return to Edward VI's Parliament, 1554.

Wicket-gate. The entrance to the road that leadeth to the Celestial City. Over the portal is the inscription—"KNOCK, AND IT SHALL BE OPENED UNTO YOU." (Butyn: Pilgrim's Progress.)

Wiclife (John), called "The Morning Star of the Reformation." (1324-1384.)

Wide-awake. Felt hats are so called by a pun, because they never have a nap at any time; they are always wide awake.

Wid'e nostrils (3 syl.). (French, Brinquantaires.) A huge giant, who subsisted on windmills, and lived in the island of Tohu. When Pantagruel and his fleet reached this island no food could be cooked because Widenostrils had swallowed "every individual pan, skilet, kettle, frying-pan, dripping-pan, boiler, and saucepan in the land," and died from eating a lump of butter. Tohu and Bohu, two contiguous islands (in Hebrew, toil and confusion), mean lands laid waste by war. The giant had eaten everything, so that there was "nothing to fry with," as the French say—i.e., nothing left to live upon.

Widow. (See Grass Widow.)

Widow (in Hudibras). The relict of Aminadab Wilmer or Willmot, an Independent, slain at Edgehill. She had 2920 left her. Sir Hudibras fell in love with her.

Widow Bird. A corruption of Whydaw bird. So called from the country of Whydaw, in Western Africa. The blunder is perpetuated in the scientific name given to the genus, which is the Latin Vid'va, a widow.

Widow's Cap. This was a Roman custom. Widows were obliged to wear "weeds" for ten months. (Senecen Escriptes, lxxv.)

Widow's Piano. Inferior instruments sold as bargains; so called from the ordinary advertisement announcing that a widow lady is compelled to sell... her piano, for which she will take half-price.

Widow’s Port. A wine sold for port, but of quite a different family. As a widow retains her husband’s name after her husband is taken away, so this mixture of potato spirit and some inferior wine retains the name of port, though every drop of port is taken from it.

“We have all heard of widow’s port, and of the instinctive dread all persons who have any respect for their health have for it.” —The Times.

Wieland (2 syl.). The famous smith of Scandinavian fable. He and Amilias had a contest of skill in their handicraft. Wieland’s sword clef his rival down to the thighs; but so sharp was the sword, that Amilias was not aware of the cut till he attempted to stir, when he divided into two pieces. This sword was named Balmung.

Wife is from the verb to weave. (Saxon wereon, Danish vær, German weben, whence wif, a woman, one who works at the distaff.) Woman is called the distaff. Hence Dryden calls Anne “a distaff on the throne.” While a girl was spinning her wedding clothes she was simply a spinner; but when this task was done, and she was married, she became a wife, or one who had already woven her allotted task.

Alfred, in his will, speaks of his male and female descendants as those of the spear-side and those of the spindle-side, a distinction still observed by the Germans; and hence the effigies on graves of spears and spindles.

Wig. A variation of the French perruque, Latin pilus, our periwig cut short. In the middle of the eighteenth century we meet with thirty or forty different names for wigs: as the artichoke, bag, barrister’s, bishop’s, brush, bush [buzz], buckle, busby, chain, chancellor’s, corded wolf’s paw, Count Saxe’s mode, the crutch, the cut-bob, the detached buckle, the Dalmahoy (a bob-wig worn by tradesmen), the drop, the Dutch, the full, the half-natural, the Jansenist bob, the judge’s, the ladder, the long boar, the Louis, the periwig, the pigeon’s wing, the rhinoceros, the rose, the scratch, the she-dragon, the small back, the spinach seed, the staircase, the Welsh, and the wild boar’s back.

A bigwig. A magnate. Louis XIV. had long flowing hair, and the courtiers, out of compliment to the young king, wore perukes. When Louis grew older he adopted the wig, which very soon encumbered the head and shoulders of the aristocracy of England and France. Lord Chancellors, judges, and barristers still wear big wigs. Bishops used to wear them in the House of Lords till 1880.

“An ye fii’ over the Thumb, there’ll be but an wig left in the parish, and that’s the minister’s.” —Sir Walter Scott: The Antiquary.

Make wigs. A perruquier, who fancied himself “married to immortal verse,” sent his epic to Voltaire, asking him to examine it and give his “candid opinion” of its merits. The witty patriarch of Ferney simply wrote on the MS, “Make wigs, make wigs, make wigs,” and returned it to the barber-poet. (See Satur, Stick to the core.)

Wig (A). A head. Similarly, the French call a head a biret. As “Quelle biret?” or “Est-ce une droite de biret?” M. Binet was the court wig-maker in the reign of Louis XIV. “M. Binet, qui fait les perruques du roy, demeure Rue des Petits-Champs.” (Almanack des adresses sous Louis XIV.)

“Fleas are not lobsters, dash my wig.” —S. Butler: Hudibras.

Wig. War (Anglo-Saxon). The word enters into many names of places, as Wigan in Lancashire, where Arthur is said to have routed the Saxons.

Wight (Isle of) means probably channel island. (Celtic guy, water; guth, the channel.) The inhabitants used to be called Uhtui or Gwythii, the inhabitants of the channel isle.

* According to the famous Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, the island is so called from Whitgar, great grandson of King Cerdic, who conquered it. All eponymic names—that is, names of persons, like the names of places, are more fit for fable than history: as Cissa, to account for Cissans (Chichester); Horsa to account for Horsted; Hengist to account for Hengistbury; Britus to account for Britain; and so on.

Wig’wan. An Indian hut (America). The Knisteneaux word is wigwam, and the Algonquin wēkon-on-nē, contracted into wēkonom (ou = w, as in French), whence wēk'wan.

Wild (Jonathan), the detective, born at Wolverhampton, in Staffordshire. He brought to the gallows thirty-five highwaymen, twenty-two housebreakers, and ten returned convicts. He himself hanged at Tyburn for housebreaking “amidst the executions of an enraged populace, who pelted him with stones to the last moment of his Wild Boar. An emblem of warlike fury and merciless brutality.

Wild Boy of Hamelin or Man of Nature, found in the forest of Hertswold, Hamelin. He walked on all fours, climbed trees like a monkey, fed on grass and leaves, and could never be taught to articulate a single word. Dr. Arbutnott and Lord Monboddo sanctioned the notion that this poor boy was really an unsophisticated specimen of the genus homo; but Blumenbach showed most conclusively that he was born dumb, of weak intellect, and was driven from his home by a stepmother. He was discovered in 1725, was called Peter the Wild Boy, and died at Broadway Farm, near Berkhampstead, in 1785, at the supposed age of seventy-three.

Wild Children.
(1) Peter the Wild Boy. (See above.)
(2) Mlle. Lablanc, found by the villagers of Soigny, near Chalons, in 1731: she died at Paris in 1785, at the supposed age of sixty-two.
(3) A child captured by three sportsmen in the woods of Cannes (France) in 1798. (See World of Wonders, p. 61, Correspondence.)

Wild-goose Chase. A hunt after a mate's nest. This chase has two defects: first, it is very hard to catch the goose; and, secondly, it is of very little worth when it is caught.

To lead one a wild-goose chase. To beguile one with false hopes, or put one on the pursuit of something not practicable, or at any rate not worth the chase.

Wild Huntsman.
The German tradition is that a spectral hunter with dogs frequents the Black Forest to chase the wild animals. (Sir Walter Scott: Wild Huntsman.)
The French story of Le Grand Venner is laid in Fontainebleau Forest, and is considered to be "St. Hubert." (Father Matthiessen.)
The English name is "Horne the Hunter," who was once a keeper in Windsor Forest. In winter time, at midnight, he walks about Herne's Oak, and blasts trees and cattle. He wears horns, and rattles a chain in a "most hideous manner." (Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 4.)

Another legend is that a certain Jew would not suffer Jesus to drink out of a horse-trough, but pointed to some water in a hoof-fruit as good enough for "such an enemy of Moses," and that this man is the "Wild Huntsman." (Kuhn-von Schwarz: Nord. Sagen, p. 499.)

Wild Oats. He is sowing his wild oats—indulging the buoyant folly of youth; living in youthful dissipation. The idea is that the mind is a field of good oats, but these pranks are wild oats or weeds sown amongst the good seed, choking it for a time, and about to die out and give place to genuine corn. The corresponding French phrase is "Poter ses premiers faons," which reminds us of Cicero's expression, "Nondum tili deferenbut adolescencia." (See Oats.)

Wild Women. Those who go in for "women's rights" and general tosey-turvyism. Some smoke cigars in the streets, some wear knickerbockers, some stomp the country as "screaming orators," all try to be as much like men as possible.

"Let anyone commend to these female runagates quietness, duty, home-staying, and the whole cohort of wild women is like an angry bee-hive, which a rough hand has disturbed." —Nineteenth Century, March, 1883, p. 403.

Wild as a March Hare. The hare in spring, after one or two rings, will often run straight on end for several miles. This is especially the case with the buck, which therefore affords the best sport.

Wilde. A John or Johnny Wilde is one who wears himself to skin and bone to add house to house and barn to barn. The tale is that John Wilde, of Rodenkichen, in the isle of Rügen, found one day a glass slipper belonging to one of the hill-folks. Next day the little brownie, in the character of a merchant, came to redeem it, and John asked as the price "that he should find a gold ducat in every furrow he ploughed." The bargain was concluded, and the avaricious hunks never ceased ploughing morning, noon, nor night, but died within twelve months from over-work. (Rügen tradition.)

Wife away Time (not Whiled). It is the same word as "guile," to "beguile the time" (faller颇为 tempus).

"To wife each moment with a fresh delight." (Lowell: Legend of Brittany, part i. stanza 6.)

Wilfrid. Patron saint of bakers, being himself of the craft. (684-709.)
St. Wilfrid's Needle is a narrow passage in the crypt of Ripon cathedral, built by Odo, Archbishop of Canterbury, and used to try whether virgins deserve the name or not. It is said that none but virgins can pass this ordeal.

Wilhelm Meister (2 syl.). The first true German novel. It was by Goethe, who died 1832, aged eighty-three.

Will not when They may. Those who will not when they may, when will they shall have way.

"Qui ne prend le bien quand il peut, il ne l'a pas quand il veut."

"Quand je bien vient, on le doit prendre."

"Saisir en tout l'occasion et l'apropos est un grand élément de bouhier et de succès."

William (2 syl.; in Jerusalem Delivered), Archbishop of Orange. An ecclesiastical warrior, who besought Pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent in the crusade. He took 400 armed men in his train from his own diocese.

William, youngest son of William Rufus. He wore a casque of gold, and was the leader of a large army of British bow-men and Irish volunteers in the crusading army. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, bk. iii.)

* English history teaches that William Rufus was never married. (See Orlando Furioso.)

Belved Will. William, Lord Howard, warden of the Western Marches. (1563-1640).

"His Dibben blade, by Merleman felt; Hung in a broad and studied belt; Hence, in rude phrase, the borderers still Calledable to all time."

Sir Walter Scott: Lay of the Last Minstrel, v. 16.

St. William of Aquitaine was one of the soldiers of Charlemagne, and helped to chase the Saracens from Languedoc. In 808 he renounced the world, and died 812. He is usually represented as a mailed soldier.

St. William of Malvalle or Malval. A French nobleman of very abandoned life; but, being converted, he went as pilgrim to Jerusalem, and on his return retired to the desert of Malvalle. He is depicted in a Benedictine habit, with armour lying beside him. (Died 1157.)

St. William of Montpelier is represented with a lily growing from his mouth, with the words Ave Maria in gold letters on it.

St. William of Monte Virgine is drawn with a wolf by his side. (Died 1142.)

St. William of Norwich was the celebrated child said to have been crucified by the Jews in 1137. He is represented as a child crowned with thorns, or crucified, or holding a hammer and nails in his hand, or wounded in his side with a knife. (See Polydorion; song xxiv.)

* In Percy's Reliques (bk. i. 9) there is a tale of a lad named Hew, son of Lady Helen of Merryland town (Milan), who was allured by a Jew's daughter with an apple. She stuck him with a penknife, rolled him in lead, and cast him into a well. Lady Helen went in search of her boy, and the child's ghost cried out from the bottom of the well—

"The lead is wondrous heavy, mither, The well is wondrous deep; A keen penknife sticks in my heart, mither: A word I dnanne spake." (See Hug.

St. William of Roschild is represented with a torch flaming on his grave. (Died 1203.)

St. William of York is depicted in pontificals, and bearing his archiepiscopal cross. (Died 1154.)

William II. The body of this king was picked up by Purkess, a charcoalsmoker of Minstead, and conveyed in a cart to Winchester. The name of Purkess is still to be seen in the same village.

"A Minstead churl, whose wonted trade Was burning charcoal in the glade, Outstretched amid the glace The monarch found; and in his wake He raised, and to St. Swithin's ham Conveyed the bleeding corpse." W. S. Rose.

William III. It was not known till the discovery of the correspondence of Cardonell, secretary of Marlborough, by the Historical MS. Commission in 1869, that our Dutch king was a great eater. Cardonell, writing from The Hague, October, 1701, to Under-Secretary Ellis, says—"It is a pity his majesty will not be more temperate in his diet. Should I eat so much, and of the same kinds, I dare say I should scarce have survived it so long, and yet I reckon myself none of the weakest constitutions." William of Croydon (2 syl.). A noted outlaw and famous archer of the "north country." (See Clym of the Crouch.)

William of Newburgh (Guilelmuus Neugrensis), monk of Newburgh in Yorkshire, surnamed Little, and sometimes called Guilelmuus Parvus, wrote a history in five books, from the Conquest to 1197, edited by Thomas Hearne, in three volumes, octavo, Oxford, 1719. The Latin is good, and the work ranks with that of Malmesbury. William of Newburgh is the first writer who rejects Geoffrey of Monmouth's Trojan descent. of the old Britons, which he calls a "figment made more absurd by Geoffrey's impudent and impertinent lies." He is, however, quite as fabulous an historian as the "impudent." Geoffrey. (1196-1208.)

William L, King of Prussia and Emperor of Germany, was called by his detractors Kaiser Tartuffe.

Willy-Wastle (the child's game). Willie Wastle was governor of Hume Castle, Haddington. When Cromwell sent a summons to him to surrender, he replied—

"Here I, Willie Wastle,
Stand firm in my castle,
And all the dogs in the town
Shan't pull Willie Wastle down."

Willow. To handle the willow—i.e. the cricket bat. To wear the willow. To go into mourning, especially for a sweetheart or bride. Fuller says, "The willow is a sad tree, whereof such as have lost their love make their mourning garlands." The psalmist tells us that the Jews in captivity "hanged their harps upon the willows" in sign of mourning. (xxxvii.)

Willow Garland. An emblem of being forsaken. "All round my hat I wear a green willow." So Shakespeare: "I offered him my company to a willow-tree . . . to make him a garland, as being forsaken." (Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 1.) The very term weeping willow will suffice to account for its emblematical character.

Willow Pattern. To the right is a lordly mandarin's country seat. It is two storeys high to show the rank and wealth of the possessor; in the foreground is a pavilion, in the background an orange-tree and to the right of the pavilion a peach-tree in full bearing. The estate is enclosed by an elegant wooden fence. At one end of the bridge is the famous willow-tree, and at the other the gardener's cottage, one storey high, and so humble that the grounds are wholly uncultivated, the only green thing being a small fir-tree at the back. At the top of the pattern (left-hand side) is an island, with a cottage; the grounds are highly cultivated, and much has been reclaimed from the water. The two birds are turtle-doves. The three figures on the bridge are the mandarin's daughter with a distaff nearest the cottage, the lovers with a boat in the middle, and nearest the willow-tree the mandarin with a whip.

The tradition. The mandarin had an only daughter named Li-chi, who fell in love with Chang, a young man who lived in the island home represented at the top of the pattern, and who had been her father's secretary. The father overheard them one day making vows of love under the orange-tree, and sternly forbade the unequal match; but the lovers contrived to elope, lay concealed for a while in the gardener's cottage, and thence made their escape in a boat to the island home of the young lover. The enraged mandarin pursued them with a whip, and would have beaten them to death had not the gods rewarded their fidelity by changing them both into turtle-doves. The picture is called the willow pattern not only because it is a tale of disastrous love, but because the elopement occurred "when the willow begins to shed its leaves."

Willy-nilly. Nolens volens; willing or not. Will-he, will-he, where nill is n negative, and will, just as nolens is n volens.

Wilmington, invoked by Thomson in his Winter, is Sir Spencer Compton, Earl of Wilmington, the first patron of our poet, and Speaker of the House of Commons.

Wil'd or Well', to wither. This is the Dutch and German woven (to fade). Spenser says, "When ruddy Phoebus 'gins to walk in west"—i.e. fade in the west.

"A will'd doonacl'e is not a fruit of the true of life."—J. Cook: The Orient, p. 140.

Wilt'shire (2 syll.) is Wilton-shire, Wilton being a contraction of Wily-town (the town on the river Wily).

Winchester. According to the authority given below, Winchester was the Camelot of Arthurian romance. Harmer, referring to King Lear, ii. 2, says Camelot is Queen Camel, Somersetshire, in the vicinity of which "are many large moors where are bred great quantities of geese, so that many other places are from hence supplied with quills and feathers." Kent says to the Duke of Cornwall—

"Goose, if I had you upon Sarum Plain, I'd drive ye cackling home to Camelot."

With all due respect to Harmer, it seems far more probable that Kent refers to Camelford, in Cornwall, where the Duke of Cornwall resided, in his castle of Tintagel. He says, "If I had you on Salisbury Plain [where geese abound], I would drive you home to Tintagel, on the river Camel." Though the Camelot of Shakespeare is Tintagel or Camelford, yet the Camelot of King Arthur may be Queen Camel; and indeed visitors are still pointed to certain large entrenchments at South Cadbury (Cadbury Castle) called by the inhabitants "King Arthur's Palace."

"Sir Balin's sword was put into marble stone, standing as upright as a great mullatone, and it swam down the stream to the edge of Camelot—

Winds. Poetical names of the winds.
The North wind, Aquilo or Bo'reas; South, Notus or Auster; East, Eurus; West, Zephyr or Favonius; North-east, Argestes; North-west, Corus; South-east, Volturinus; South-west, Afer ventus, Africus, Africa'num, or Plect. The Thraco-sias is a north wind, but not due north.

"Bores and Ciccas, and Argestes loud, And Thrascias rend the woods, and seas, upturn; Notus and Afer, black with thunderous clouds, From Serrat'na. Thwart of these, as fierce, Fourth rush . . . . Eurus and zephyr . . . .

Special winds.
(1) The ETHEIAN WINDS are refreshing breezes which blow annually for forty days in the Mediterranean Sea. (Greek, et, e, a year.)

(2) The HARMATTAN. A wind which blows periodicaly from the interior parts of Africa towards the Atlantic. It prevails in December, January, and February, and is generally accompanied with fog, but is so dry as to wither vegetation and cause human skin to peel off.

(3) The KHAMSIN. A fifty days' wind in Egypt, from the end of April to the inundation of the Nile. (Arabic for fifty.)

(4) The MISTRAL. A violent north-west wind blowing down the Gulf of Lyons; felt particularly at Marseilles and the south-east of France.

(5) The PAMPEDO blows in the summer season, from the Andes across the pampas to the sea-coast. It is a dry, north-west wind.

(6) The PUNA WINDS prevail for four months in the Puna (table-lands of Peru). The most dry and parching winds of any.

When they prevail it is necessary to protect the face with a mask, from the heat by day and the intense cold of the night.

(7) SAMIR or SIMOON. A hot, suffocating wind that blows occasionally in Africa and Arabia. Its approach is indicated by a redness in the air. (Arabic, simoon, from samma, destructive.)

(8) The Sirocco. A wind from Northern Africa that blows over Italy, Sicily, etc., producing extreme languor and mental debility.

(9) The SOLANO of Spain, a south-east wind, extremely hot, and loaded with fine dust. It produces great uneasiness; hence the proverb, "Ask no favour during the Solano." (See Trade Winds.)

To take or have the wind. To get or keep the upper hand. Lord Bacon uses the phrase. "To have the wind of a ship" is to be to the windward of it.

Windfall. Unexpected legacy; money which has come de caelo. Some of the English nobility were forbidden by the tenure of their estates to fell timber, all the trees being reserved for the use of the Royal Navy. Those trees, however, which were blown down were excepted, and hence a good wind was often a great godsend.

Windmills. Don Quixote de la Mancha, riding through the plains of Montiel, approached thirty or forty windmills, which he declared to Sancho Panza "were giants, two leagues in length or more." Striking his spurs into Rosinante, with his lance in rest, he drove at one of the "monsters dreadful as Typhon." The lance lodged in the sail, and the latter, striking both man and beast, lifted them into the air, shivering the lance to pieces. When the valiant knight and his steed fell to the ground they were both much injured, and Don Quixote declared that the enchanter Freston, "who carried off his library with all the books therein," had changed the giants into windmills "out of malice." (Cervantes: Don Quixote, bk. i. ch. viii.)

To fight with windmills. To combat chimeras. The French have the same proverb, "Se battre contre des mouines à vent." The allusion is, of course, to the adventure of Don Quixote referred to above.

To have windmills in your head. Fancies, chimeras. Similar to "bees in Windmill Street says—

“Did I not tell your worship they were windmills? and who could have thought otherwise, except such as had windmills in their head?” —

Dernand de Duquesne, bk. i. ch. viii.

Windmill Street. When Charnel chapel, St. Paul’s, was taken down by the Protector Somerset, in 1549, more than 1,000 cart-loads of bones were removed to Finsbury Fields, where they formed a large mound, on which three windmills were erected. It was from these mills that the street obtained its name. (Leigh Hunt.)

Window. (Norwegian, vindue.) A French window opens like folding doors; a sash window in two parts, called sashes, one or both of which are made to slide up and down halfway.

Wine. A vinum of wine is two quarts; a tappit-hen of wine or rum is a double magnum; a jeroboaum of wine or rum is a double "tappit-hen"; and a rehoboam (q.v.) is a double jeroboaum.

Wine. The French say of wine that makes you stupid, it is vin d’âme; if it makes you madd’lin, it is vin de cerf (from the notion that deer weep); if quarrelsome, it is vin de lion; if talkative, it is vin de pie; if sick, it is vin de porc; if crafty, it is vin de renard; if rude, it is vin de singe. (See below.)

Win’ of ape (Chaucer). “I trost that ye have drunken win of ape”—i.e. wine to make you drunk; in French, vin de singe. There is a Talmud parable which says that Satan came one day to drink with Noah, and slew a lamb, a lion, a pig, and an ape, to teach Noah that man before wine is in him is a lamb, when he drinks moderately he is a lion, when like a sot he is a swine, but after that any further excess makes him an ape that senselessly chatters and jabbers.

Wine-month. (Anglo-Saxon, Winmonath.) The month of October, the time of vintage.

Wine Mingleed with Myrrh (Mark xi. 23). Called by the Romans Morrhuna (vinum myrrhae conditum), given to malefactors to intoxicate them, that their sufferings from crucifixion might be somewhat lessened.

"Palouma" (that divina potio) was favoured with myrrh.

Win’trith. The same as St. Boniface, the apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon, killed by a band of heathens in 755.

Wing. Wings. Wing of a house, wing of an army, wing of a battalion or squadron, etc., are the side-pieces which start from the main body, as the wings of birds.

Don’t try to fly without wings. Attempt nothing you are not fit for. A French proverb.

On the wing. An vol, about to leave. To clipp one’s wings. To take down one’s conceit; to hamper one’s action. In French, Bagner les ailes [à quelqu’un]. To loud wings. To spur one’s speed.

“[This sound of danger lent me wings.]” —R. L. Stevenson.

To take one under your wing. To patronise and protect. The allusion is to a hen gathering her chicks under her wing.

To take wing. To fly away; to depart without warning. (French, s’envoler.)

Wings of Azrael (The). (See Azrael.)

Winged Rooks. Outwitted sharpeners. A rook is a sharper, and a rookery the place of resort for sharpeners. A rook is the opposite of a pigeon; a rook cheats, a pigeon is the one cheated.

“This light, young, gay in appearance, the thoughtless youth of wit and pleasure—the pigeon rather than the rook—but the heart the same shrewd, cold-blooded calculator.” —Sir W. Scott: Feniell of the Peak, chap. xxviii.

Win’fred (St.). Patron saint of virgins, because she was beheaded by Prince Caradoc for refusing to marry him. She was Welsh by birth, and the legend says that her head falling on the ground originated the famous healing well of St. Winifred in Flintshire. She is usually drawn like St. Denis, carrying her head in her hand. Holywell, in Wales, is St. Winifred’s Well, celebrated for its “miraculous” virtues.

Winkle (Rip van). A Dutch colonist of New York. He met with a strange man in a ravine of the Kaatskill Mountains. Rip helps him to carry a keg, and when they reach the destination Rip sees a number of odd creatures playing ninepins, but no one utters a word. Master Winkle seizes the first opportunity to take a sip at the keg, falls into a stupor, and sleeps for twenty years. On waking, his wife is dead and buried, his daughter is married, his native village has been remodelled, and America has become independent. (Washington Irving.)

Wint-monath [Wind-month]. The Anglo-Saxon name for November.

Winter. Summer. We say of an old man, “His life has extended to a hundred winters;" but of a blooming girl, "She has seen sixteen summers."

Winter's Tale (Shakespeare). Taken from the Pleasant History of Doratus and Eumelia by Robert Greene. Doratus is called by Shakespeare Florizel and Dorielles, and Fawnia is Perdita. Leontes of the Winter's Tale is Egistus in the novel, Polixenes is Pandaros, and Hermione is Bellarius.

Wipple-tree or Whipultra. Mentioned in Chaucer's Knight's Tale, is the cornel-tree or dogwood (Cornus sanguinea) (= whipple-tree, from whipple = turn).

Wisdom-tooth. The popular name for the third molar in each jaw. Wisdom-teeth appear between 17 and 25.

Wisdom of Many and the Wit of One (The). This is Lord John Russell's definition of a proverb.

Wise (The).
ALBERT II., Duke of Austria, called The Lame and Wise. (1289-1330-1558.)
ALFONSO X. (or IX.) of Leon, and IV. of Castile, called The Wise and The Astronomer. (1203-1252-1285.)
ABEN-I cast, a Spanish rabbi, born at Toledo. (1119-1174.)
CHARLES V. of France, called Le Sage, (1337, regent 1358-1360, king 1364-1380.)
CHEI-TZOU, founder of the fourteenth dynasty of China, called Hou-po-lao (the model ruler), and his sovereignty The Wise Government. (1278-1295.)
COMTE DE LAS CASES, called Le Sage. (1766-1842.)
FREDERICK, Elector of Saxony. (1463, 1544-1554.)
JOHN V. of Britain, called The Good and Wise. (1899, 1899-1942.)
"I Nathan the Wise. A drama by Lessing, based on a story in the Decameron. (Day x., Novell 3.)

Wise as a Serpent. This refers to the serpent which tempted Eve, or more probably to the old notion that serpents were extremely wise.

Wise as Solomon. (See Similes.)

Wise as the Mayor of Banbury. A blundering Sir William Curtis. The mayor referred to insisted that Henry III. reigned in England before Henry II.

The following is a fact which happened to myself in 1888. I was on a visit to a country mayor of vast wealth, whose house was full of most exquisite works of art. I was particularly struck with a choice china figure, when the mayor told me how many guineas he had given for it, and added, "Of course you know who it is meant for. It is John Knox signing Magna Charta."

Wise as the Women of Mungret. At Mungret, near Limerick, was a famous monastery, and one day a delegation was sent to it from Cashel to try the skill of the Mungret scholars. The head of the monastery had no desire to be put to this proof, so they habited several of their scholars as women, and sent them forth to waylay the delegation. The Cashel professors met one and another of these "women," and asked the way, or distance, or hour of the day, to all which questions they received replies in Greek. Thunderstruck with this strange occurrence, they resolved to return, saying, "What must the scholars be if even the towns-women talk in Greek?"

Wise Men or Wise Women. Fortune-tellers.

Wise Men of Greece. (See Seven Sages.)

Wise Men of the East. The three Magi who followed the guiding star to Bethlehem. They are the patron saints of travellers. (See Magi, Seven Sages.)

Wise Men of Gotham (The). (See Gotham.)

Wiseacre. A corruption of the German troissager (a soothsayer or prophet). This, like the Greek sophistem, has quite lost its original meaning, and is applied to dunces, wise only "in their own conceit."

There is a story told that Ben Jonson, at the Devil's Tavern, in Fleet Street, said to a country gentleman who boasted of his landed estates, "What care we for your diet and clad? Where you have an acre of land, I have ten acres of wit." The landed gentleman retorted by calling Ben "Good Mr. Wiseacre." The story may pass for what it is worth.

Wiseest Man of Greece. So the Delphic oracle pronounced Socrates to be, and Socrates modestly made answer, "'Tis because I alone of all the Greeks know that I know nothing."

Wish-wash. A reduplication of wash. Any thin liquor for drinking.

Wishy-washy. A reduplication of washy. Very thin, weak, and poor; wanting in substance or body.

Wishart (George). One of the early reformers of Scotland, condemned to the stake by Cardinal Beaton. While the fire was blazing about him he said: "He who from you high place beholdeth me with such pride shall be brought low, Wishing-bone. (See Merry-thought.)

Wishing-cap. Fortuna'tus had an inexhaustible purse and a wishing-cap, but these gifts proved the ruin of himself and his sons. The object of the tale is to show the vanity of human prosperity.

Wishing-coat. Willie Wynkin's wishing-coat. An Irish location.

"I wish I had here Willie Wynkin's wishing-coat." — Howard Pyle: Robin Hood, p. 200.

Wishing-rod (The) of the Nibelungs was of pure gold. Whoever had it could keep the whole world in subjection. It belonged to Siegfried, but when the "Nibelung hoard" was removed to Worms this rod went also.

"And there among was lying the wishing-rod of gold,
Which whose could discover might in subjection hold.
All this wide world as master, with all that dwell therein."

Leitsohn's Nibelungen-Lied, st. 1190.

Wisp. Will o' the Wisp. (See Ignis Fatuus.)

Wisp of Straw (A). Sign of danger. Often hung under the arch of a bridge undergoing repairs, to warn watermen; sometimes in streets to warn passengers that the roof of a house is under repair. The Romans used to twist straw round the horns of a toasting or bull, to warn passers-by to beware, hence the phrase famum habet in cornu, the man is crochety or dangerous. The reason why straw (or hay) is used is because it is readily come-at-able, cheap, and easilywiped into a bundle visible some long way off.

Wit. To wit, viz. that is to say. A translation of the French savoir. Wit is the Anglo-Saxon witan (to know). I divide my property into four parts, to wit, or savoir, or namely, or that is to say . . . .

Wits. Five wits. (See under Five.)

Witch. By drawing the blood of a witch you deprive her of her power of sorcery. Glaudvill says that when Jane Brooks, the demon of Tedworth, bewitched a boy, his father scratched her face and drew blood, whereupon the boy instantly exclaimed that he was well.

"Blood will 1 draw on thee; thou art a witch." — Shakespeare: 1 Henry VI., i. 5.

Hammer for Witches (Malleus Maleficarum). A treatise drawn up by Heinrich Institor and Jacob Sprenger, systematising the whole doctrine of witchcraft, laying down a regular form of trial, and a course of examination. Innocent VIII. issued the celebrated bull Summis Desiderantes in 1484, directing inquisitors and others to put to death all practisers of witchcraft and other diabolical arts.

* Dr. Sprenger computes that as many as nine millions of persons have suffered death for witchcraft since the bull of Innocent. (Life of Mohammed.) As late as 1705 two women were executed at Northampton for witchcraft.

Witch-finder. Matthew Hopkins, who, in the middle of the seventeenth century, travelled through the eastern counties to find out witches. At last Hopkins himself was tested by his own rule. Being cast into a river, he floated, was declared to be a wizard, and was put to death. (See above, Hammer for Witches.)

Witch Hazel. A shrub supposed to be efficacious in discovering witches. A forked twig of the hazel was made into a divining-rod for the purpose.

Witch of Endor. A divining woman consulted by Saul when Samuel was dead. She called up the ghost of the prophet, and Saul was told that his death was at hand. (1 Sam. xxviii.)

Witch's Bridle. An instrument of torture to make obstinate witches confess. (Pitrow, vol. i. part ii. p. 60.) (See Waking a Witch.)

Witches' Sabbath. The musing at night-time of witches and demons to concoct mischief. The witch first anointed her feet and shoulders with the fat of a murdered babe, then mounting a broomstick, distaff, or rake, made her exit by the chimney, and rode through the air to the place of rendezvous. The assembled witches feasted together, and concluded with a dance, in which they all turned their backs to each other.

Witchcraft. The epidemic demonopathy which raged in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries.

Witenagemot. The Anglo-Saxon parliament.

"The famous assembly of our forefathers was called by various names (as) Miegol Geman (or great meeting); the Witenagemot (or meeting of the wise); and sometimes the Mygel Gethen (or great thought). — Freeman: The Norman Conquest, i. 3.

Witenage (S.) The Saxon parliament of earls, nobles, and free men.
Witham. You were born, I suppose, at Little Witham. A reproof to a noodle. The pun, of course, is on little wit. Witham is in Lincolnshire.

"I will be sworn she was not born at Witham, for Dana gibes,—say she could not turn up a single lesson like a Christian."—Sir Walter Scott: Heart of Mid-Lothian, chap. xxxi.

Puns of this sort are very common. (See BEDFORDSHIRE, NOD, DUNCE, CRIPPLEGATE, SHANKS’ NAG, etc.)

With (1 syl.). When Delilah asked Samson what would effectually bind him she told her “green wither,” but when she called in the Philistines he snapped his bonds like tow. Also spelt with. A boy, being asked what part of speech is with, replied a noun, and being reproved for ignorance made answer: “Please, sir, Samson was bound with seven withs.”

"It seems impossible that Samson can be held by such green withes [i.e. that a great measure can be carried by such jesty shifts]."—The Times.

Withers of a Horse (The) are the muscles which unite the neck and shoulders. The skin of this part of a horse is often galled by the pommel of an ill-fitting saddle, and then the irritation of the saddle makes the horse wince. In 1 Henry IV., ii. 1, one of the carriers gives direction to the ostler to ease the saddle of his horse, Cat. "I prythee, Tom, beat Cut’s saddle... the poor jade is wrung on the withers," that is, the muscles are wrung, and the skin galled by the saddle. And Hamlet says (iii. 2):

"Let the galled jade wince, our withers are unwrung."

That is, let those wince who are galled; as for myself, my withers are not wrung, and I am not affected by the "bob."

Within the Pale. (See under PALE.)

Withen (Oxfordshire) is the Anglo-Saxon Witen-ey, the island of Wise-men—i.e. of the Witenagemot or national parliament.

Wittington. (See WITTINGTON.)

"Beneath this stone lies Wittington, Sir Richard rightly named. Who three times Lord Mayor served in London, in which he never was blamed. He rose from indigence to wealth By industry and that. For lo! he scorned to gain by stealth What he got by a cast."

Epitaph (destroyed by the fire of London).

Witwoold. A Sir Jerry Witwoold. A pert, talkative coxcomb, vain of little learning; one who swims with the stream of popular opinion, and gives his judgment on men and books as if he were Sir Oracle. A great pretender to virtue and modesty, like Mr. Pecksniff, but always nosing out smut and obscenity, which he retails with virtuous indignation.

Wives of Literary Men. The following literary men, among many others, made unhappy marriages:

| ADDISON | LYTTON |
| ARISTOTLE | MILTON (first wife) |
| BACON (LOUIE) | MOLIERE |
| BOCCACCIO | MORE |
| BYRON | PITTAGUS |
| DANTO | RACINE |
| DICKENS | ROUSSHAI (J. J.) |
| D U B E R (ALBERT) | SCALIER (both wives) |
| BURPIDE | SHAKESPEARE |
| GARRICK | SHELLEY (first wife) |
| HAYDN | SHERATON |
| HOOKER | STERNE |
| JOHNSON (DR.) | STRYNE |
| J O H N S O N (BEN.) | WYCHELEY (first wife) |
| KNOX | LILLY (second wife) |

Wo! Stop! (addressed to horses). "Ho!" or "Hoe!" was formerly an exclamation commanding the knights at tournaments to cease from all further action. (See Woo’seh.)

"Scoilers, as they read much of love, so when they once fall in love, there is no hope with them till they have their love."—Cobbler of Canterbury (1606).

Woo’er or Woo’a. Stop, addressed to a horse. The Latin word ohe has the same meaning. Thus Horace (i Sat. v. 12):

"Ohe, jam satis est."

Woo’seh, when addressed to horses, means "Bear to the left." In the West of England they say Woag—i.e. wag off (Anglo-Saxon, weah, a bend or turn). Woo’seh is "Move off a little."

Woo-tee Dynasty. The eighth Imperial dynasty of China, established in the south Liou-yu. A cobbler, having assassinated the two preceding monarchs, usurped the crown, and took the name of Woe-tee (King Woo), a name assumed by many of his followers.

Woden. Another form of Odin (q.v.). The word is incorporated in Wedensbury (Kent), Wednesbury (Suffolk), Wansdyke (Wiltshire), Wednesday, etc.

Wee to Thees, O Land, when thy king is a child. This famous stanza is from Ecclesiastes x. 6. Often quoted in Latin, I’a terris ubi rex est puor.

Woful. Knight of the Woful Countenance. The title given by Sancho Panza to Don Quixote. (Bk. iii. chap. v.) After his challenge of the two royal lions (pt. ii. bk. i. chap. xvii.), the adventurer called himself Knight of the Lions.

Wokey. Wicked as the Witch of Wokey. Wokey-hole is a noted cavern in Somersetshire, which has given birth to as many weird stories as the Sibyls’
Cave in Italy. The Witch of Wokey was metamorphosed into stone by a "lerned wight" from Gaston, but left her curse behind, so that the fair damsel of Wokey rarely find a "gallant." (Percy’s Reliques, iii. 14.)

Wolf (in music). In almost all stringed instruments (as the violin, organ, piano, harp, etc.) there is one note that is not true, generally in the bass string. This false note is by musicians called a "wolf."

The squeak made in reed instruments by muskilful players is termed a "goose."

Nature hath implanted so inveterate a hatred upween the wolves and the sheeps, that, being dead, yet in the operation of Nature appeareth there a sufficient trial of their discordant nature; so that the enmity between them seemeth not to dye with their bodies; for if there be put upon a large... strings made of the intralles of a sheep, and amongst them, one h−side of the intralles of a wolf... the musician... cannot reconcile them to a unity and concord of sounds, so discordant is that string of the wolf."—Fern: Blazon of Cantra (1580).

* Here Mr. Fern attributes the musical "wolf" to a wolf-gut string; but the real cause is a faulty interval. Thus, the interval between the fourth and fifth of the major scale contains nine commas, but that between the fifth and the sixth only eight. Tuners generally distribute the defects, but some musicians prefer to throw the whole onus on the "wolf" keys.

Wolf. (Anglo-Saxon, wulf.)

Efnis. The wolf that scatters venom through air and water, and will swallow Odin when time shall be no more.

Skoll. The wolf that follows the sun and moon, and will swallow them ultimately. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The Wolf. So Dryden calls the Presbytery in his Hind and Panther.

A hero foe the insatiate Wolf remains.

She-wolf of France. Isabella le Bel, wife of Edward II. According to a tradition, she murdered the king by burning his bowels with a hot iron, or by tearing them from his body with her own hands.

"She-wolf of France, with unrelenting fangs, That tear at the bowels of thy mangled mate."—Gray: The Bard.

Between dog and wolf. In Latin, "Inter canem et lupum"; in French, "Entre chien et loup." That is, neither daylight nor dark, the blind man’s holiday. Generally applied to the evening dusk.

Dark as a wolf’s mouth. Pitch dark.

He has seen a wolf. Said of a person who has lost his voice. Our forefathers used to say that if a man saw a wolf before the wolf saw him he became dumb, at least for a time.

"Vox quaeque Minervae Jupiter: Bucolics, elegy i."

"Our young companion has seen a wolf; said Lady Hameline, ‘and has lost his tongue in consequence.’—Scott: Quintin Durward, ch. xviii.

To see a wolf is also a good sign, inasmuch as the wolf was dedicated to Odin, the giver of victory.

He put his head into the wolf’s mouth.

He exposed himself to needless danger. The allusion is to the fable of the crane that put its head into a wolf’s mouth in order to extract a bone. The fable is usually related of a fox instead of a wolf. (French.)

Holding a wolf by the ears. So Augustus said of his situation in Rome, meaning it was equally dangerous to keep hold or to let go. Similarly, the British hold of Ireland is like that of Augustus. The French use the same locution: Tenir le loup par les oreilles.

To cry "Wolf!" To give a false alarm. The allusion is to the well-known fable of the shepherd lad who used to cry "Wolf!" merely to make fun of the neighbours, but when at last the wolf came no one would believe him.

In Chinese history it is said that Yen-wang, of the third Imperial dynasty, was attached to a courtesan named Pao-te, whom he tried by various expedients to make laugh. At length he hit upon the following: He caused the tocsins to be rung as if an enemy were at the gates, and Pao-te laughed immediately to see the people pouring into the city in alarm. The emperor, seeing the success of his trick, repeated it over and over again; but at last an enemy really did come, and when the alarm was given no one paid attention to it, and the emperor was slain. (B.C. 770.) (See AMPICLEAN SILENCE.)

To keep the wolf from the door. To keep out hunger. We say of a ravenous person "He has a wolf in his stomach," an expression common to the French and Germans. Thus manger comme un loup is to eat voraciously, and wolfenagen is the German for a keen appetite.

Wolf, Duke of Gascony. One of Charlemagne’s knights, and the most treacherous of all, except Ganelon. He sold his guest and his family. He wore browned steel armour, damasked with silver; but his favourite weapon was the gallows. He was never in a rage, but cruel in cold blood.

"It was Wolf, Duke of Sascoy, who was the originator of the plan of tying wetted ropes round the temples of his prisoners, to make their eyes bulge start from their sockets. It was he who had them sewed up in freshly-striped bulls hides, and exposed to the sun till the hides in shrinking broke their bones."—Croclemonta, iii.

Wolf Men. Giraldus Cambrensis tells us (Opera, vol. v, p. 119) that Irishmen can be "changed into wolves." Nennius asserts that the "descendants of wolves are still in Osory," and "they retransform themselves into wolves when they bite." (Wonders of Err, xiv.)

* These Osory men-wolves are of the race of Laighne Fxinidh.

Wolf-month or Wolf-monath. The Saxon name for January, because "people are wont always in that month to be in more danger of being devoured by wolves than in any other." (Verastegai.)

Wolf's-bane. The Germans call all poisonous herbs "banes," and the Greeks, mistaking the word for "beans," translated it by kis'amol, as they did "hen-bane" (hunos knamos). Wolf's-bane is an aconite with a pale yellow flower, called therefore the white-bane to distinguish it from the blue aconite. White-bean would be in Greek lenkos knamos, which was corrupted into lukos knamos (wolf-bean); but botanists, seeing the absurdity of calling aconite a "bean," restored the original German word "bane," but retained the corrupt word lukos (wolf), and hence the ridiculous term "wolf's-bane." (H. Fox Talbot.)

* This cannot be correct: (1) bane is not German; (2) lukos knamos would be hog-bean, not hen-bane; (3) How could Greeks mistranslate German? The truth is, wolf-bane is so called because meat saturated with its juice was supposed to be a wolf-poison.

Wolves. It is not true that wolves were exterminated from the island in the reign of Edgar. The tradition is based, upon the words of William of Malmsbury (bk. ii. ch. viii.), who says that the tribute paid by the King of Wales, consisting of 300 wolves, ceased after the third year, because "nullum se ulterius posse inventire professus" (because he could find no more—i.e. in Wales) but in the tenth year of William I, we find that Robert de Umbraville, knight, held his lordship of Riddledele in Northumberland by service of defending that part of the kingdom from "wolves." In the forty-third year of Edward III.

Thomas Engarne held lands in Pitchley, Northamptonshire, by service of finding, dogs at his own cost for the destruction of "wolves" and foxes. Even in the eleventh year of Henry VI, Sir Robert Plumpton held one bovate of land in the county of Notts by service of "frighting the wolves" in Shirewood Forest.

Wonder. A nine days' wonder. Something that causes a sensational astonishment for a few days, and is then placed in the limbo of "things forgot." Three days' amazement, three days' discussion of details, and three days of subsidence. (See Nine, and Seven.)

The eighth wonder. The palace of the Escorial in Toledo, built by Felipe II. to commemorate his victory over the French at St. Quentin. It was dedicated to San Lorenzo, and Juan Baptista de Toledo, the architect, took a gridiron for his model—the bars being represented by rows or files of buildings, and the handle by a church. It has 1,860 rooms, 6,200 windows and doors, 80 staircases, 73 fountains, 48 wine cellars, 51 bells, and 8 organs. Its circumference is 4,800 feet (nearly a mile). Escorial is scoria searri, iron dross, because its site is that of old iron works. (See Tullianni.)

An eighth wonder. A work of extraordinary mechanical ingenuity, such as the Great Wall of China, the dome of Chosroes in Madain, St. Peter's of Rome, the Menai suspension bridge, the Thames tunnel, the bridge over the Niagara, Eddystone lighthouse, the Suez Canal, the railroad over Mont Cenis, the Atlantic cable, etc.

The Three Wonders of Babylon.

The Palace, eight miles in circumference.

The Hanging Gardens.

The Tower of Babel, said by some Jewish writers to be twelve miles in height! Jerome quotes contemporary authority for its being four miles high. Strabo says its height was 600 feet.

Wonder-worker. St. Gregory, of Neo-Cassar'a, in Pontus. So called because he "recalled devils at his will, stayed a river, killed a Jew by the mere effort of his will, changed a lake into solid earth, and did many other wonderful things." (See Thaumaturgus.)

Wood. Knight of the Wood or Knight of the Mirror. So called because his coat was overspread with numerous small mirrors. It was Sampson Carrasco, a bachelor of letters, who adopted the disguise of a knight under the hope of overthrowing Don Quixote, when he would have imposed upon him the penalty of returning to his home for two years; but it so happened that Don Quixote was the victor, and Carrasco's scheme was abortive. As Knight of the White Moon Carrasco again challenged the Manchegian Muscard, and overthrew him; whereupon the vanquished knight was obliged to return home, and quit the profession of knight-errantry for twelve months. Before the term expired he died. (Cervantes: Don Quixote, pt. ii, bk. i, 11, etc.; bk. iv, 12.)

Wood. Don't cry [or fallo] till you are out of the wood. Do not rejoice for having escaped danger till the danger has passed away.

Wood's Halfpence. A penny coined by William Wood, to whom George I. granted letters patent for the purpose. (See DARTER'S LETTERS.)

"Sir Walter's [Scott] real belief in Scotch one-pund notes may be advantageously contrasted with Swift's forced frenzy about Wood's halfpence; more especially as Swift really did understand the defects of Wood's scheme, and Sir Walter was absolutely ignorant of the currency controversy in which he engaged."—The Times.

Woodbine. The bindweed or wild convolvulus. This is quite a different plant to the woodbine. It is a most troublesome weed in orchards, as its roots run to a great depth, and its long, climbing stalks bind round anything near it with persistent tenacity. It is one of the most difficult weeds to extirpate, as every broken fragment is apt to take root.

Woodbine. The honeysuckle or bee-wort; or perhaps the convolvulus.

"Where the bee strays diligent, and with extracted balm Of fragrant woodbine loads his little thigh."—Phillips.

Shakespeare says—

"So doth the woodbine the sweet honeysuckle Gently entwine."—Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 1.

* Gone where the woodbine twines. * To the pawnbroker's, up the spout, where, in Quebec, "on cottage walls the woodbine may be seen twining." (A correspondent of Quebec supplied this.)

Woodcock (A). A fool is so called from the supposition that woodcocks are without brains. Polonius tells his daughter that protestations of love are "springes to catch woodcocks." (Shakespeare: Hamlet, i, 3.)

Wooden Horse (The). Babloa.

Peter of Provence had a wooden horse named Babloca. (See Clavileno.)

"This very day may be seen in the king's armoury the identical peg with which Peter of Provence turned his Wooden Horse, which carried him through the air. It is rather bigger than the pole of a coach, and stands near Babloca's saddle."—Don Quixote, pt. i, bk. iv, 19.

Wooden Horse (To ride the). To sail aboard a ship, brig, or boat, etc.

"He felt a little out of the way for riding the wooden horse."—Sir Walter Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xv.

Wooden Horse of Troy. Virgil tells us that Ulysses had a monster wooden horse made after the death of Hector, and gave out that it was an offering to the gods to secure a prosperous voyage back to Greece. The Trojans dragged the horse within their city, but it was full of Greek soldiers, who at night stole out of their place of concealment, slew the Trojan guards, opened the city gates, and set fire to Troy. Menelao was one of the Greeks shut up in it. It was made by Epeios (Latin, Epices).

Cambuscan's wooden horse. The Arabian Nights tells us of Cambuscan's horse of brass, which had a pin in the neck, and on turning this pin the horse rose into the air, and transported the rider to the place he wanted to go to. (See Clavileno.)

Wooden Mare (The). "The mare foaled of an acorn." An instrument of torture to enforce military discipline, used in the reign of Charles II. and long after. The horse was made of oak, the back was a sharp ridge, and the four legs were like a high stool. The victim was seated on the ridge, with a firelock fastened to each foot.

"Here, Andrews, wrap a cloak round the prisoner, and do not mention his name. I warn you, you would have a trot on the wooden horse."—Sir Walter Scott: Old Mortality, chap. ix.

Wooden Spoon. The last of the honour men—i.e. of the Junior Optimes, in the Cambridge University. Sometimes two or more "last" men are bracketed together, in which case the group is termed the spoon bracket. It is said that these men are so called because in days of yore they were presented with a wooden spoon, while the other honour men had a silver or golden one, a spoon being the usual prix de mérite instead of a medal. (See Wooden Wedge.)

Wooden Sword. To wear the wooden sword. To keep back sales by asking too high a price. Fools used to wear wooden swords or "daggars of lath."
Wooden Wall. When the Greeks sent to Delphi to ask how they were to defend themselves against Xerxes, who had invaded their country, the evasive answer given was to this effect—

"Pallas hath urged, and Zeus, the sire of all, Hath safety promised in a wooden wall; Searing flames and harvest, weeping olive shall tell How thousands fought at Salamis and fell."

Wooden walls of Old England. The ships of war. We must now say, “The iron walls of Old England.”

Wooden Wedge. Last in the classical tripos. When, in 1824, the classical tripos was instituted at Cambridge, it was debated by what name to call the last on the list. It so happened that the last on the list was Wedgewood, and the name was accepted and moulded into Wooden-wedge. (See Wooden Spoon.)

Woodfall, brother of the Woodfall of Junius, and editor of the Morning Chronicle. Woodfall would attend a debate, and, without notes, report it accurately next morning. He was called Memory Woodfall. (1745-1803.) W. Radcliffe could do the same.

Woodwardian Professor. The professor of geology in the University of Cambridge. This professorship was founded in 1727 by Dr. Woodward.

Wool. Dyed in the wool. A hearty good fellow. Cloth which is wool-dyed (not piece-dyed), is true throughout and will wash. No wool is so white that a dyer cannot blacken it. No one is so free from faults that slander can find nothing to say against him; no book is so perfect as to be free from adverse criticism.

“Maister Mainwaring’s much abused,
Most grievously for things accused,
And all the dowillish [devilish] pack;
Fen let munn all their poison spit,
My Jord, there is no wool so whit
That dyers can’t make black.”

Peter Fidler: Middlesex Election, letter iii.

Wool-gathering. Your wits are gone wool-gathering. As children sent to gather wool from hedges are absent for a trivial purpose, so persons in a brown study are absent-minded to no good purpose.

“But my dear, my wits are somewhat wool-gathering and unsettled, my heart is as true as a star.”—Harriet B. Stone.

Woollen. In 1666 an Act of Parliament was passed for “burying in woollen only,” which was intended for “the encouragement of the woollen manufactures of the kingdom, and prevention of the exportation of money for the buying and importing of linen.” Repealed in 1814.

“Odius in woollen! ‘twould a saint provoke!” (Were the last words that poor Narcissa spoke.)

“Who made thee want a woollen coat?
And Betty—give her hair and her feet a little red.”

Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. I.

This was the ruling passion strong in death. At the time this was written it was compulsory to bury in woollen. Narcissa did not dare death half so much as being obliged to wear flannel instead of her fine mantles. Narcissa was Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, who died 1731.

Woollen goods. (See Linen Goods.)

Woolsack. To sit on the woolsack. To be Lord Chancellor of England, whose seat in the House of Lords is called the woolsack. It is a large square bag of wool, without back or arms, and covered with red cloth. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth an Act of Parliament was passed to prevent the exportation of wool; and that this source of our national wealth might be kept constantly in mind woollacks were placed in the House of Peers, whereas the judges sat. Hence the Lord Chancellor, who presides in the House of Lords, is said to “sit on the woolsack,” or to be “appointed to the woolsack.”

Woolwich Infant (The). (See Gun.)

Worcester (Woost-er). A contraction of Wici-ware-ester (the camp-town of the Wici people). Ware means people, and Wici was a tribe name.

Worcester College (Oxford), founded by Sir Thomas Cookes, of Bentley, Worcestershire. Created a baronet by Charles II.

Word. A man of his word. One whose word may be depended on; trustworthy.

As good as his word. In French, “Un homme de parole.” One who keeps his word.

By word of mouth. Orally. As “he took it down by word of mouth” (as it was spoken by the speaker).

I take you at your word. In French, “Je vous prends au mot.” I will act in reliance of what you tell me.

Pray, make no words about it. In French, “N’en dites mot.” Don’t mention it; make no fuss about it.

Speak a good word for me. In French, “Dites un mot en ma faveur.”

To pass one’s word. In French, to religious matters; "the flesh," i.e. love of pleasure and sensual enjoyments; "the devil," i.e. all temptations to evil of every kind, as theft, murder, lying, blasphemy, and so on.

Worm. To have a worm in one's tongue. To be cantankerous; to snarl and bite like a mad dog.

"There is one easy artifice
That seldom has been known to miss—
To snarl at all things right or wrong;
Like a mad dog that has a worm in its tongue."
—Samuel Butler: Upon Modern Critics.

To worm out information. To elicit information indirectly and piecemeal.

To worm oneself into another's favour. To insinuate oneself in an underhand manner into the good graces of another person.

"A worm is a spiral instrument resem-bling a double corkscrew, used for drawing wads and cartridges from cannon, etc.

Worms, in Germany, according to tradition, is so called from the Lindwurm or dragon slain by Siegfried under the linden tree.

"Yet more I know of. Siegfried that well your eye may hold,
Beneath the linden tree he slew the dragon bold;
Then in his heart he bathed him, which turned to harm his skin,
So now no weapon harms him, as oft hath proven been."
—Niclasius, st. 104.

Wormwood. The tradition is that this plant sprang up in the track of the serpent as it writhed along the ground when driven out of Paradise.

Worse than a Crime. It was worse than a crime, it was a blunder. Said by Talleyrand of the murder of the Duc d'Enghien by Napoleon I.

Worship means state or condition of worth, hence the term "his worship," meaning his worshipship.

"Thou shalt have worship in the presence of them that sit at meat with thee" (Luke xiv. 10) means "Thou shalt have worthship [value or appreciation]." In the marriage service the man says to the woman, "With my body I thee worship, and with all my worldly goods I thee endow"—that is, I confer on you my rank and dignities, and endow you with my wealth; the worshipship attached to my person I share with you, and the wealth which is mine is thine also.

Never worship the gods unaided. So taught Pythagoras, and he meant in a careless and slovenly manner. (See Iamblichus: Protreptics, symbol 3.) The Jews took off their shoes when they entered holy ground (Exodus iii. 5).
This custom was observed by the ancient Egyptians. Mahometans and Brahmins enter holy places bare-footed; indeed, in British India, inferiors take off their shoes when they enter the room of a British officer, or the wife of an officer. The idea is that shoes get covered with dust and holy ground must not be defiled by dirt. (Justin Martyr: Apology, 1.62.)

The sword given to the disciples by Christ was to shake off the dust of their feet when they left a city which would not receive them.

Worsted. Yarn or thread made of wool; so called from Worsted in Norfolk, new a village, but once a large market-town with at least as many thousand inhabitants as it now contains hundreds. (Chaucer.)

Worth = betide.

"Thus saith the Lord God: Howl ye, wo worth the day!"—Ezekiel xxv. 2.

"Wo worth the chase, wo worth the day.
That costs thy life, my gallant Grey.
..."—Sir Walter Scott.

Worthies (The Nine). (See Nine.)

1. The Nine Worthies of London.
1. Sir William Walworth, fishmonger, who stabbed Wat Tyler, the rebel. Sir William was twice Lord Mayor. (1374, 1380.)

2. Sir Henry Pritheard, who (in 1356) feasted Edward III., with 5,000 followers; Edward the Black Prince; John, King of Austria; the King of Cyprus; and David, King of Scotland.

3. Sir William Sevynzeke, who fought with the Dauphin of France, built twenty almshouses and a free school. (1418.)

4. Sir Thomas White, merchant tailor, son of a poor clothier. In 1553 he kept the citizens loyal to Queen Mary during Wyatt’s rebellion. Sir John White founded St. John’s College, Oxford, on the spot where "two elms grew from one root."

5. Sir John Bonham, entrusted with a valuable cargo for the Danish market, and made commander of the army raised to stop the progress of the great Soliman.

6. Christopher Crake. Famous at the siege of Bordeaux, and companion of the Black Prince when he helped Don Pedro to the throne of Castile.

7. Sir John Hawkwood. One of the Black Prince’s knights, and immortalised in Italian history as Giovanni Acuti Cavalierio.

9. Sir Henry Malverner, generally called Henry of Cornhill, who lived in the reign of Henry IV. He was a crusader, and became the guardian of "Jacob's well."

The chronicle of these worthies is told in a mixture of prose and verse by Richard Johnson, author of The Seven Champions of Christendom. (1592.)

Among these nine worthies we miss the names of Whittington, Gresham, and Sir John Lawrence (Lord Mayor in 1604), second to none.

Wound. Bind the wound, and grease the weapon. This is a Rosicrucian maxim. These early physicians applied salve to the weapon instead of to the wound, under the notion of a magical reflex action. Sir Kenelm Digby quotes several anecdotes to prove this sympathetic action.

Wraith. The spectral appearance of a person shortly about to die. It appears to persons at a distance, and forewarns them of the event." (Highland superstition.) (See FAIRY.)

Wrangler, in Cambridge phrase, is one who has obtained a place in the highest mathematical tripos. The first man of this class is termed the senior wrangler, the rest are arranged according to respective merit, and are called second, third, fourth, etc., wranglers, as it may be. In the Middle Ages, when letters were first elevated to respectability in modern Europe, college exercises were called disputations, and those who performed them disputants, because the main part consisted in pitting two men together, one to argue pro and the other con. In the law and theological "schools" this is still done for the bachelor’s and doctor’s degrees. The exercise of an opponent is called an oppenency. Wrangling is a word-battle carried on by twisting words and trying to obfuscate an opponent—a most excellent term for the disputations of schoolmen. The oppenency begins with an essay on the subject of dispute.

Wrath’s Hole (Cornwall). The legend is that Bolster, a gigantic wrath or evil spirit, paid embarrassing attention to St. Agnes, who told him she would listen to his suit when he filled his blood a small hole which she pointed out to him. The wrath joyfully accepted the terms, but the hole opened into the sea, and the wrath, being utterly exhausted, St. Agnes pushed him over the cliff.

Wrexen. Overstretched, strained, rank. They go to school all the week, and get wrexen. The weeds are quite Wright of Norwich

Do you know Dr. Wright of Norwich? A reproof given to a person who stops the decanter at dinner. Dr. Wright, of Norwich, was a great diner-out and excellenttalker. When a person stops the bottle and is asked this question, it is as much as to say, Dr. Wright had the privilege of doing so because he entertained the table with his conversation, but you are no Dr. Wright, except in stopping the circulation of the wine.

A similar reproof is given in the combination room of our Universities in this way: The bottle-stopper is asked if he knows A or B (any name), and after several queries as to who A or B is, the questioner says, "He was hanged," and being asked what for, replies, "For stopping the bottle."

Write. To write up. To bring into public notice or estimation by favourable criticisms or accounts of, as to write up a play or an author.

Write Like an Angel (To). (See under ANGEL.)

Wrong. The king (or queen) can do no wrong. "It seems incredible that we should have to remind Lord Redesdale that the sovereign 'can do no wrong,' simply because the sovereign can do nothing except by and with the advice and consent of the ministers of the Crown."—The Times.

Wrong End of the Stick (You have got hold of the). You have quite misapprehended the matter; you have got the wrong sow by the ear. There is another form of this phrase which determines the allusion. The toe of the stick is apt to be fouled with dirt, and when laid hold of defiles the hand instead of supporting the feet.

Wrong Side of the Blanket (The). (See BLANKET.)

Wrong Side of the Cloth (That is the). The inferior aspect. In French, l'envers du drap.

Wrong Sow by the Ear (You have the). You have made a mistake in choice; come to the wrong shop or box; misapprehended the subject. Pigs are caught by the ear. (See Sow.)

Wrong 'un (A). A horse which has run at any flat-race meeting not recognised by the Jockey Club is technically so called, and is boycotted by the club.

Wroth Money or Wroth Silver. Money paid to the lord in lieu of castle guard for military service; a tribute paid for killing accidentally some person of note; a tribute paid in acknowledgment of the tenancy of unenclosed land. Dugdale, in his History of Warwickshire, says—

"There is a certain rent due unto the lord of this Hundred (viz. of Knightlow), the property of the Duke of Devonshire), called with this with for worth-money, or swarm-penny..." Denarii vicecomitum vet alii castellani per solitum in castro mansionem et comites adagium (Sir Henry Spelman: Glossary). The rent must be paid on Martinmas Day, in the morning at Knightlow Cross, before sun-rise. The party paying it must go thrice about the cross and say, "The wrath-money," and then lay it [varying from ld. to 2s. 6d.] in a hole in the said cross before good witnesses, or forfeit a white bull with red nose and ears. The amount thus collected reached in tied to about £1., and all who complied with the custom were entertained at a substantial breakfast at the Duke's expense, and were feasted in a glass of rum and milk."

Wulstan (St.). A Saxon Bishop of Worcester, who received his see from Edward the Confessor. Being accused of several offences, and ordered to resign his see, he planted his crozier in the shrine of the Confessor, declaring if any of his accusers could draw it out he would submit to resign; as no one could do so he St. Wulstan himself, his innocence was admitted. This sort of "miracle" is the commonest of legendary wonders. Arthur proved himself king by a similar "miracle."

Wunderberg or Underbey, on the great moor near Salzberg, the chief haunt of the Wild-women. It is said to be quite hollow, and contains churches, gardens, and cities. Here is Charles V. with crown and sceptre, lords and knights. His grey beard has twice encompassed the table at which he sits, and when it has grown long enough to go a third time round it Antichrist will appear. (German superstition.) (See Baraboska.)

Wyn-monath [Wine-month]. The Anglo-Saxon name for October, the month for treading the wine-yats. In Domesday Book the vineyards are perpetually mentioned.

Wynd. Every man for his own hand, as Henry Wynd fought. Every man for himself; every man seeks his own advantage. When the feud between Clan Chattan and Clan Kay was decided by deadly combat on the North Inch of Perth, one of the men of Clan Chattan deserted, and Henry Wynd, a bandy-legged smith, volunteered for half-a-crown to supply his place. After killing one man he relaxed in his efforts, and on being asked why, replied, “I have done enough for half-a-crown.” He was promised wages according to his deserts, and fought bravely. After the battle he was asked what he fought for, and gave for answer that he fought “for his own hand,” whence the proverb.

(Sir Walter Scott: Tales of a Grandfather, xvii.)

Wyoming (3 syl.). In 1778 a force of British provincials and Indians, led by Colonel Butler, drove the settlers out of the valley, and Queen Esther toma-hawked fourteen of the fugitives with her own hand, in revenge for her son’s death. Campbell has founded his Gertrude of Wyoming on this disaster, but erroneously makes Brandt leader of the expedition, and calls the place Wyoming.

X

X on beer-casks indicates beer which paid ten shillings duty, and hence it came to mean beer of a given quality. Two or three crosses are mere trademarks, intended to convey the notion of twice or thrice as strong as that which pays ten shillings duty.

Xanthos [reddish yellow]. Achilles’ wonderful horse. Being chid by his master for leaving Patroclus on the field of battle, the horse turned his head reproachfully, and told Achilles that he also would soon be numbered with the dead, not from any fault of his horse, but by the decree of inexorable destiny.

(Iliad, xix.) (Compare Numbers xxii. 28-30.)

The Xanthos and Balios (swift as the wind) were the offspring of Podagrae, the harpy and Zephyros. (See Horse.)

Xanthos, the river of Troas. Elian and Pliny say that Homer called the Scamander “Xanthos” or the “Goldred river,” because it coloured with such a tinge the fleeces of sheep washed in its waters. Others maintain that it was so called because a hero named Xanthos defeated a body of Trojans on its banks, and pushed half of them into the stream, as in the battle of Blenheim the Duke of Marlborough drove the French into the Danube.

Xanthus. A large shell like those ascribed to the Tritons. The volutes generally run from right to left; and if the Indians find a shell with the volutes running in the contrary direction, they persist that one of their gods has got into the shell for concealment.

Xanthippe or Xanthippe (3 syl.). Wife of the philosopher Socrates. Her bad temper has rendered her name proverbial for a conjugal scold.

“Be she as foul as was Florentina’s love, As old as Sybil, and as curst and shrewd As Socrates’ Xanthippe, or a worse, She moves me not.”

Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, i. 2.

Xenocratea. A disciple of Plato, noted for her continence and contempt of wealth. (B.C. 396-314.)

“Warmed by such youthful beauty, the severe Xenocrates would not have more been chaste.”

Orlando Furioso, xi. 8.

Xerxes (2 syl.). A Greek way of writing the Persian Ksatira or Kasatru, a royal title assumed by Isundear, son of Gushtasp, daaruvesh. (See Darius.)

When Xerxes invaded Greece he constructed a pontoon bridge across the Dardanelles, which, being swept away by the force of the waves, so enraged the Persian despot that he “inflicted three hundred lashes on the rebellious sea, and cast chains of iron across it.” This story is probably a Greek myth, founded on the peculiar construction of Xerxes’ second bridge, which consisted of three hundred boats, lashed by iron chains to two ships serving as supporters. As for the scourging, without doubt it was given to the engineers and not to the waves.

Xerxes’ Tears. It is said that when Xerxes, King of Persia, reviewed his magnificent and enormous army before starting for Greece, he wept at the thought of slaughter about to take place. “Of all this multitude, who shall say how many will return?” Emerson, in his English Traits, chap. iv., speaks of the Emperor Charlemagne viewing the fleet of the Norsemen in the Mediterranean Sea with tears in his eyes, and adds, “There was reason for these Xerxes’ tears.”

Xerxes wept at the prospective loss he expected to suffer in the invasion prepared, but Charlemagne wept at the prospective disruption of his kingdom by the hardy Norsemen.

Xime’na. The Cid’s bride.

Xit. Royal dwarf to Edward VI.

Xur’y. A Moresco boy, servant to Robinson Crusoe. (De Poe: Robinson Crusoe.)
Y

Y. A letter resembling "y" was the Anglo-Saxon character for th (hard); hence y, y', y'', etc., are sometimes made to stand for the, that, this.

Y. See Samian Letter.

Ya'coub ebn La'ith, surnamed al Soffir (the brazier), because his father followed that trade in Seistan, was captain of a bandit troop, raised himself to the sovereignty of Persia, and was the first independent monarch of that country of the Mahometan faith. (573-875.)

Yaucu-mama [mother of waters]. A fabulous sea-snake, fifty paces long and twelve yards in girth, said to lurk in the lagoons of South America, and in the river Amazon. This monster draws into its mouth whatever passes within a hundred yards of it, and for this reason an Indian will never venture to enter an unknown lagoon till he has blown his horn, which the yaucu-mama never fails to answer if it is within hearing. By this means the danger apprehended is avoided. (Waterton.)

Yahoo. A savage; a very ill-mannered person. In Gulliver's Travels the Yahoos are described as brutes with human-forms and vicious propensities. They are subject to the Houyhnhmns, or horses with human reason.

Yama. Judge of departed souls, the Minos of the Hindus. He is represented as of a green colour, and sits on a buffalo.

Yamuna. A sacred river of the Hindus, supposed by them to have the efficacy of removing sin.

Yankee. A corruption of "English." The word got into general use thus: In 1718 one Jonathan Hastings, a farmer at Cambridge, in New York, used the word as a puffing epithet, meaning genuine, American-made, what cannot be surpassed, etc.; as, a "Yankee horse," "Yankee cider," and so on. The students of the college, catching up the term, called Hastings "Yankee Jonathan." It soon spread, and became the jocose pet name of the New-Englander. Since then the term has been extended to any American of the Northern States. (Indian corruption of Anglais or English, thus: Yengees, Yenghis, Yanghus, Yankees.)

Yankee Doodle is Yankee Doodle (Oliver Cromwell), who went to Oxford "with a single feather fastened in a macaroni knot," whence the rhyme—

"Nankee Doodle came to town upon his little pony, Stuck a feather in his hat, and called it macaroni."

The brigade under Lord Percy marched out of Boston playing this air "by way of contempt," but were told they should dance to it soon in another spirit.

Yarmouth Blater. A red herring, for which Yarmouth is very famous. (Lex Bulatronicum.)

Yarmouth Capons. Red herrings.

Yawn. Greek, chaino; German, gähnen; Anglo-Saxon, ganian.

Yea, Yes. Yea and nay are in answer to questions framed in the affirmative; as, "Art thou a prophet?" Yea or nay. Yes and no to questions framed in the negative; as, "Art thou not a prophet?" Yes or no. (George P. Murrah: Lectures on the English Language.) (See his note on the celebrated passage of Sir Thomas More, who rebukes Tyndale for using no instead of nay, p. 422.)

Year. Annum magnus. The Chaldaic astronomers observed that the fixed stars shift their places at about the rate of a degree in seventy-two years, according to which calculation they will perform one revolution in 25,920 years, at the end of which time they will return to their "as you were." This revolution of the fixed stars is the annum magnus. The Egyptians made it 30,000 years, and the Arabians 40,000. (See Amshus Konwound of God.)

† For a year and a day. In law many acts are determined by this period of time—e.g. if a person wounded does not die within a year and a day, the offender is not guilty of murder; if an owner does not claim an estray within the same length of time, it belongs to the lord of the manor; a year and a day is given to prosecute appeals, etc.

Yellow. Anglo-Saxon, geolu, yellow; Italian, giallo; Danish, gul; Icelandic, gull, our gold; yellow metal.

Yellow indicates jealousy, inconstancy, and adultery. In France the doors of traitors used to be daubed with yellow. In some countries the law ordains that Jews be clothed in yellow, because they betrayed our Lord. Judas in medieval pictures is arrayed in yellow. In Spain the vestments of the executioner are either red or yellow—the former to indicating bloodshedding, and the latter treason.

Yellow, in blazonry, is gold, the symbol of love, constancy, and wisdom. Yellow, in Christian symbolism, also gold, is emblematical of faith. St. Peter is represented in a robe of a golden yellow colour. In China yellow is the imperial colour.

Yellow-bellies. Frogs, femmen. The Mexicans are so called.

"When the Queen's Prize was won at Wimbledon, July 21st, 1863, by Sergeant Buinmer, 2nd Lincoln, his victory was saluted with 'Well done, yellow-belly'! in allusion to his being a Lincolnshire man." — Notes and Queries, August 22nd, 1863, p. 116.

"Ah, then, again, it kin scarce be Mexikins neither. It up too fur north for any o' them yellow-bellies."—Captain Mungo Reid: The War Trail, chap. xxxi.

Yellow Book of France. A report drawn up by Government every year since 1861, designed to furnish historians with reliable information of the state, external and internal, of the French nation. It is called Yellow from the colour of its cover. It corresponds to our "Blue Book" and the "White Books" of Germany and Portugal.

Yellow boy (A). A gold sovereign.

"John did not save the cause: there wanted not yellow-boys to see it done."—Armabn: John Bull.

Yellow boy (A). A bankrupt. The French call a bankrupt Safranier, and Aller au safran means to be made a bankrupt. The allusion is to the ancient custom of painting the house of a traitor yellow. It will be remembered that the house of the Petit Bourbon was long so stigmatised on account of the treason of the Constable Bourbon.

Yellow Caps. A notable insurrection in China, in the reign of Hán-líng-tee (168-189), headed by Tchang-keo, and so called from the caps worn by the rebels, which were all of the imperial colour.

Yellow Dwarf. A certain queen had a daughter named ALL-FAIR, of incomparable beauty. One day the queen went to consult the Desert-Fairy but, being weary, lay down to rest, and fell asleep. On waking she saw two lions approaching, and was greatly terrified. At this juncture the Yellow Dwarf arrested her attention, and promised to save her from the lions if she would consent to give him—ALL-FAIR for his bride. The queen made this promise, and an orange-tree opened, into which the queen entered, and escaped the lions.

The queen now sickened, and ALL-FAIR went to consult the Desert-Fairy, but, like her mother, was threatened by the lions, and promised to be the dwarf’s bride if he would contrive her escape. Next morning she awoke in her own room, and found on her finger a ring made of a single red hair; which could not be got off. The princess now sickened, and the States resolved to give her in marriage to the powerful king of the Gold Mines. On the day of espousals the Yellow Dwarf came to claim his bride, carried her off on his Spanish cat, and confined her in Steel Castle. In the meantime the Desert-Fairy made the king of the Gold Mines her captive. One day a mermaid appeared to the captive king, carried him to Steel Castle, and gave him a sword made of one entire diamond. Thus armed, the king went in, and was first encountered by four sphinxes, then by six dragons, then by twenty-four nymphs. All these he slew with the syren sword, and then came to the princess. Here he dropped his sword, which the Yellow Dwarf took possession of. The Yellow Dwarf now made the king his captive, and asked if he would give up the princess. "No," said the king; whereupon the dwarf stabbed him to the heart; and the princess, seeing him fall, threw herself upon the dead body and died also. (Countess D’Auñoy: Fairy Tales.)

Yellow Jack. The flag displayed from lazarets, naval hospitals, and vessels in quarantine. (See Union Jack.)

Yellow Jack (The). The yellow fever.

"Raymond and all his family died of yellow fever, and Fernando... had passed a few weeks recovering from a touch of yellow Jack."—A. C. Gismon: Baron Montes, book iv. chap. x.

Yellowhammer (The). The eggs of this bird are spotted with red. The tradition is that the bird fluttered about the Cross, and got stained with the blood in its plumage, and by way of punishment its eggs were doomed ever after to bear marks of blood. 'Tis a very lame story, but helps to show how in former times every possible thing was made to bear some allusion to the Redeemer. Because the bird was "cursed," boys who abstained from plundering the eggs of small birds, were taught that it is as right and proper to destroy the eggs of the bunting as to persecute a Jew. (See Christian Traditions.)

Hammer is a corruption of the German ammer, a hammer.
Ye'men. Arabia Felix. Felix is a mistranslation by Ptolemy of Yemen, which means to the "right"—i.e. of Mecca. (See STONY ARABIA.)

"Beautiful are the maids that glide
On famine,—shadowed even through Yemen’s dale."—THOMAS MOORE: Fire-Worshipers.

Yeoman (A) was anciently a forty-shilling freethinker, and as such qualified to vote, and serve on juries. In more modern times it meant a farmer who cultivated his own freethold. Later still, an upper farmer, tenant or otherwise, is often called a yeoman.

"His family were yeomen of the richer class, who for some generations had held property."—R. C. JEBB: Richard Jenkyn, chap. 1. p. 2

Yeoman's Service. Regular hard work; effectual service; excellent service whether in a good or bad cause. The reference is to the yeomen of the Free Companies.

"The whole training of Port Royal did hone yeoman's service."—SHAKESPEARE: Sir Percival, p. 56.

"We found a long knife, and a knotted handkerchief stained with blood, with which Claude had no doubt recently done yeoman's service."—Miss Robinson: Whitefears, chap. viii.

Yeomen of the Guard. The beef-eaters (v.r.).

Yeth-Hounds. Dogs without heads, said to be the spirits of unbaptised children, which ramble among the woods at night, making wailing noises. (Derbyshire.)

Yezd (1 syl.). Chief residence of the Fire-worshippers. Stephen says they have kept the sacred fire alight above 3,000 years, without suffering it to go out for a second. The sacred fire is on the mountain Ater Quedah (Mansion of the Fire), and he is deemed unfortunate who dies away from the mountain. (Persia.)

"From Yezd's eternal Mansion of the Fire,

Yggdrasil. The ash-tree, whose roots run in three directions: one to the Asi-gods in heaven, one to the Frost-giants, and the third to the under-world. Under each root is a fountain of wonderful virtues. In the tree, which drops honey, sit an eagle, a squirrel, and four stags. At the root lies the serpent Nithhöggr gnawing it, while the squirrel Ratatoskr runs up and down to sow strife between the eagle at the top and the serpent. (Scandinavian mythology.)

"The Norns beswall the Sai Yggdrasil."—LORD BYRON: Harold, bk. viii.

Y'mir. The personification of Chaos, or the first created being, produced by the antagonism of heat and cold. He is called a giant, and was nourished by the four milky streams which flowed from the cow Audhumla. While he slept, a man and woman grew out of his left arm, and sons from his foot. Thus was generated the race of the frost-giants. (Hrithvinsuir.)

Odin and his two brothers slew Ymir, and threw his carcass into the Ginnungagap (abyss of abysses), when his blood formed the water of the earth, his gore the ocean, his bones the mountains, his teeth the rocks, his skull the heavens, his brain the clouds, his hair plants of every kind, and his eyebrows the wall of defence against the giants. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Yn'ol. An earl of decayed fortune, father of Erid, ousted from his earldom by his nephew Edyn, who was called the "Sparrow-hawk." When Edyn was overthrown in single combat by Prince Geraint, he was compelled to restore the earldom to Ynol. (Tennyson: Idylls of the King; Euid.)

Yo'ke (1 syl.). Greek zugon, Latin jugum, French joi, Dutch jok, German joch, Anglo-Saxon gecu (pron. yau). To pass under the yoke. To suffer the disgrace of a vanquished army. The Romans made a yoke of three spears—two upright and one resting on them. When an army was vanquished, the soldiers had to lay down their arms and pass under this archway of spears.

Yor'ick. The King of Denmark's jester, "a fellow of infinite jest and most excellent fancy." (Hamlet, v. 1.) In Tristram Shandy Sterne introduces a clergyman of that name, meant for himself.

York, when it was Saxon, was called Ecworic, and the legend is that a Duke of Effric being drowned at the foot of the wall caused this name to be given to the city. Southwalk Wall was also called the Effric Wall or Stone. (VICTOR Hugo: L'Homme qui Rit, pt. ii. bk. iii. 1.)

York is Ew-rwic (pron. Yerrie), and means the town on the Eure, now called the Ouse. The Romans Latinised the word Eure or Eore into "Evora" or "Eboro," and added: "vicum;" whence Eboraviscum, contracted into Eboraecum.

York Stairs (London), by Inigo Jones. The only remains left of the splendid mansion of the Buckingshams. The site is part of the precincts of a palace belonging to the bishops of Norwich. It then passed to Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, then to the archbishops of York, then to the Crown, then to the Duke of Buckingham, who rebuilt it. The second Duke of Buckingham pulled it down, and converted it into the five streets, etc., called respectively, "George," "Villiers," "Duke," "Of," "Buckingham." The gate leading to the Thames is the only part of this mansion which remains.

Yorks (a Stock-Exchange term), the Great Northern Railway Ordinary Stock, the York line. Similarly, there are the Berwicks, the Brums, the Dovers, the Leeds, the Pots or Potteires, the Singapore, and so on. (See Stock-Exchange Slang.)

Yorkshire. I see Yorkshire, too. I am as deep as you are, and am not to be bamboozled. The North-countrymen are proverbially "long-headed and cannie." A tale is told of a Yorkshire rustic under cross-examination. The counsel tried to make fun of him, and said to him, "Well, farmer, how go calves at York?" "Well, sir," said the farmer, "on four legs and not on two." "Silence in the court!" cried the baffled bigwig, and tried again. "Now, farmer—remember you are on your oath—are there as many fools as ever in the West Riding?" "Well, no, sir, no; we've got our share, no doubt; but there are not so many as when you were there."

Young Chevalier. Charles Edward Stuart, the second Pretender. (1720-1766.)

Young England. A set of young noblemen and aristocratic gentlemen who tried to revive the formality and court manners of the Chesterfield school. They wore white waistcoats, patronised the pet poor, looked down upon shopkeepers, and were altogether Red-Tape Knights. Disraeli has immortalised their ways and manners, but scarcely a caput mortuum of their folly now remains.

Young Germany. A literary school headed by Heinrich Heine, whose aim was to liberate politics, religion, and manners from the old conventional trammels.

Young Italy. A league of Italian refugees, who associated themselves with the French republican party, called the Carbonnerie Démocratique (q.v.). It was organised at Marseilles by Mazzini, and its chief object was to diffuse republican principles.

Your Petitioners shall ever Pray, etc. The part omitted is, if a petition to the Crown, "for your Majesty's most prosperous reign"; but if to Parliament, the suppressed words are, "for the prosperous success of this high and honourable court of Parliament."

Youth Restored. Iolaüs was restored to youth, as Euripidès says.

Phaon, the beloved of Sappho, was restored to youth on the behalf of Venus.

Æson was restored to youth by Medæa, and so was Jason.

The muses of Bacchus and his husbands were restored to youth, according to Æschylus.

Ysolde, Ysoude, or Iseult. Daughter of the Queen of Ireland. Sir Tristram, being wounded, was cured by Ysolde, and on his return to Cornwall gave his uncle such a glowing description of the young princess that he sent to ask her hand in marriage. Ysolde married King Mark of Cornwall, but entertained a criminal passion for the nephew. This attachment being discovered by the king, he banished Tristram from Cornwall. Sir Tristram went to Wales, where he performed prodigies of valour, and his uncle invited him back again. The guilty intercourse being repeated, Sir Tristram was banished a second time, and went to Spain, Ermonie, and Brittany. In this last place he met with Ysolt of the White Hand, daughter of the Duke of Brittany, whom he married. After many marvellous exploits he was severely wounded, and, being told that no one could cure him but Ysolde, he sent a messenger to Cornwall, and told him if the queen consented to accompany him he was to hoist a white flag. The queen hastened to succour her lover, but Ysolt told her husband that the vessel was coming with a black sail displayed. Sir Tristram, in an agony of despair, fell on his bed and instantly expired. Soon as Ysolde heard thereof, she flung herself on the corpse and died also. King Mark buried the two in one grave, and planted over it a rose-bush and vine, which so intermingled their branches as they grew up that no man could separate them.

Ysolt of the White Hand. Daughter of the Duke of Brittany and wife of Sir Tristram. (See above.)

Yue-Làoù, in Chinese mythology, is the old man of the moon, who unites with a silken cord all predestined
Yoga. A mundane period of years, four of which have already passed, making up an aggregate of four million solar years. In the first period men were innocent and free from disease, in the second their life was shortened by one quarter. In the first period devotion was man's object, in the second spiritual knowledge, in the third sacrifice. Compare the Hindu legend with the account given in Genesis.

Yule (1 syl.). Christmas time.

Yule Log. A great log of wood laid in ancient times across the hearth-fire on Christmas Eve. This was done with certain ceremonies and much merrymaking. (Norwegian, jult, Christmas.)

"Eccy at Yuletide, when the log stood fixed in chimney corner, laugh and jest went round." - Adrich: Wyndham Tovey, stanza 5.

Yule Swain (The). A kind of Santa Klaus among the Lapps. He is eleven feet high, and rides on a goat. He appears on St. Thomas's Day, and continues his visits till Christmas Eve; but where he comes from and whether he goes nobody has the least idea.

Yuletide has been held as a sacred festival by numberless nations.

Christmas holds December 25th as the anniversary of the birth of Jesus. China on the same day celebrates the birth of Buddha, son of Maya. (Buddhism.)

Druid held during the winter solstice the festival of Nollagh. (Higgins.)

Egypt held that Horus, son of Isis, was born towards the close of December. (Le Clerc de Septiènes.)

Greece celebrated in the winter solstice the birth of the gods (Hera, Ceres, Dionysus, Bacchus), and Hercules (Heracles).

India. Numerous Indian tribes keep Yuletide as a religious festival. (Minter Williams.)

Mexico holds in the winter solstice the festival of Capuchine. (History of the Indies, vol. ii. p. 339.)

Persia at the same period honours the birth of Mithra. (Grose.)

Bona celebrated on December 25th the festival of "Natalis Solis Invicta." (Needham.)

Sweden held Yuletide the festival called Jul, in honour of Fraya, son of Odin.

Yum'boes (2 syl.). Fairies of African mythology, about two feet high, of a white colour, and dressed like the people of Jafol. Their favourite haunt is the range of hills called The Paps.

"When evening's shades o'er Goree's isle extend, The amiable Yumboes from The Paps descend, Seily approach the natives' huts, and steal With secret hand the pounded cow-cow meal." - Nightsey: Fairy Mythology.

Yves (St.) (1 syl.). Patron saint of lawyers, being himself a lawyer. As he used his knowledge of the law in defending the oppressed, he is called in Brittany "the poor man's advocate."

"Ad vocavit, sed non introc, Res miranda populique.

Yves to St. Yves.

Y'veto't (pron. Eve-tô). The King of Yvetot. Yvetot is a town in Normandy, and the king referred to is the lord of the town, called roi d'Yvetot in old chronicles. The tradition is that Clovis, son of Clovis, having slain Gautier, lord of Yvetot, before the high altar of Soissons, made atonement by confessing the title of king on the heirs of the murdered man.

"Il était un roi d'Yvetot
Peu connu dans l'histoire;
Se levant tard, se couchant tôt,
Dortant fort bien sans gloire,
Et couronné par Jeanne d'U.
D'un simple bonnet de coton,
Dit-on,
Oh! oh! oh! oh! ah! ah! ah! ah! ah!
Quel bon petit roi c'était, là! là! là! là!"

Borangier: Roi d'Yvetot (1813).

A king there was, "roi d'Yvetot" slept,
But little known in story;
Went soon to bed, till daylight slept,
And soundly without glory.
His royal brow in cotton cap
Would Janet, when he took his nap, Enwrap.
Ah! ah! ah! ah! ah! ho! ho! ho! ho!
A famous king thus "roi d'Yvetot."

Z

Za'bian. The Zabian world of fashion. The world of fashion that worships the stars, or men and women of notoriety. A Zabian is a worshipper of the sun, moon, and stars. The Chaldees and ancient Persians were Zubians.

"This is the new meteor, admired with so much devotion by the Zabian world of fashion." - Belgrano, No. 3.

Zacocia. King of Mozam'bec. Camoens, in his Lusiad, says that he received Vasco da Gama, and his men with great hospitality, believing them to be Mahometans, but the moment he discovered that they were Christians all his kindness turned to the most run-corous hate. He tried to allure them into ambush, but, failing in this, sent to Gama a pilot to conduct the fleet to Momba'ze (2 syl.), where the whole party had been killed or reduced to slavery. This treachery failed also, because Venus drove the fleet in a contrary direction by a storm. The faithless pilot lastly attempted to run the ships upon hidden rocks, but the Nereids came to the rescue, and the pilot threw himself into the sea to escape the anger of the Portuguese adventurer. (Camoens: Lusiad, bks. i, ii.)
Zadkiel (3 syl.). Angel of the planet Jupiter. (Jewish mythology.)

Zadkiel. The pen-name of Lieutenant Morrison, author of the Prophetic Almanac.

Zadoc, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is designed for Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury.

"Zadoc the priest, whom (shunning power and place).
His lofty mind advanced to David's [Charles 11.] grace."

Zakarti's Ibn Muhammed, surnamed Kazwin, from Kaswin, the place of his birth. De Sacy calls him "the Pliny of the East." (1200-1263.)

Zakka. A tree growing in the Muhammadan hell, from which a food is prepared for the damned of inexpressible bitterness.

"How will it be for him whose food is Zakka?"—The Koran.

Zal. Son of Sam Neriman, exposed on Mount Elburz, because he was born with white hair, and therefore supposed to be the offspring of a deer. He was brought up by the wonderful bird See-murgh (q.t.), and when claimed by his father, rescued from the foster-bird a feather to give him insight into futurity. (Persian mythology.)

Zanes. The statues dispersed about the grounds on which the public games of Greece were celebrated. They were the produce of fines imposed on those who infringed the regulations.

Zanoji. Hero of a novel so called by Lord Lytton. Zanoni is supposed to possess the power of communicating with spirits, prolonging life, and producing gold, silver, and precious stones.

Zamy. More correctly, Zanny (Italian zanni, a buffoon; Latin sannio, "sanne," means a grimace, and "sanneo," one who makes grimaces).

"For indeed, he's like the 'zani' to a tumbler.
That tries tricks after him to make men laugh."—R. Jackson: Every Man Out of His Humour, iv. 2.

"He belonged to one of those dramatic companies called zanni, who went about the country reciting and acting."—John Inglesant, chap. xxvii.

"Where, some hours since, was heard the swell
Of trumpets and the clash of zal."—

Thomas Moore: Fire-Worshippers.

Zelina was in love with Azim. Azim left his native Bokhara to join the Persian army, and was taken captive by the Greeks. Report said "he was dead;" Zel'ica lost her reason, joined the harem of the Veiled Prophet as "one of the elect of Paradise," and became "priestess of the faith." When Azim joined the prophet's band, Zelica was appointed to lure him to his destruction, both of body and soul. They meet—Azim tells her to fly with him, but she tells him she is the prophet's bride, and flees from his embrace. After the death of the prophet Zelica puts on his veil, and Azim, thinking she sees the prophet, rushes on her and kills her. (Thomas Moore: Veiled Prophet of Khorasan; Lalla Rookh.)

Zelotes (3 syl.) or Sicarii were pious assassins among the Jews, who imposed on themselves the task of killing all who broke the Mosaic law. (Mishnah: Sanhedrin, ix. 6.)

"Simon Zelotes was probably a disciple of Judas the Gaulonite, leader of a party of the Renaim (Sicarii)."—Renan: Life of Jesus, ix.

Zem. The sacred well of Mecca. According to Arab tradition, this is the very well that was shown to Hagar when Ishmael was perishing of thirst. Mecca is built round it.

Zen'ochis Khan [great chief]. A title assumed in 1206 by Temouind, a Persian rebel, in the presence of 100 tribes. His progress was like that of a destroying angel, and by his sword Persia became part of the vast Mogul empire.

Zend-Avesta. The great work of Zoroaster, or rather Zarathustra, the Mede, who reformed the Magian religion. It is the Avesta or "Living Word," written in the Zend language (B.C. 400). It now contains the Yasna, the Vispered, the Vendidad, and the Khordah-Avesta.

"The sacred writings of the Parsees have usually been called Zend-Avesta by Europeans; but this is, without doubt, an inversion of the proper order of the words, as the Pahlavi books always style them 'Avistak-va-Zand' (text and commentary)."—Heng: Essays on the Parsee, Essay lii, p. 10.

Zenalophon. A corruption of Zeno-lophon. The beggar-maid loved by King Cophetua.

"The magnanimous and most illustrious king Cophetua set eyes upon the penurious and indigent beggar Zenalophon."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iv, 1.

Zenith, Na'dir. Zenith is the point of the heavens immediately over the head of the spectator. Na'dir is the opposite point, immediately beneath the spectator's feet. (French, zenith, nadir.)

Zephon [searcher of secrets]. The cherub despatched by Gabriel to find Satan, after his flight from hell. Thus'riel goes with him. (Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 788-796.)
Zephyr: The west wind, the son of Aeolus and Aurora, and the lover of Flora. (Roman mythology.)

Pas de zephyr. Standing on one foot and balancing the other backwards and forwards.

Zeus (1 syl.). The Grecian Jupiter. The word means the “living one.” (Sanskrit, Dyaus, heaven.) (See Jupiter.)

Zeuxis (2 syl.), a Grecian painter, is said to have painted some grapes so well that the birds came and pecked at them.

"'Tis so. Poor birds, decked with painted grapes. Do surfeit the eye, and pluck the new." Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

Zig. A prodigious cock, which stands with its feet on the earth and touches heaven with its head. When its wings are spread it darkens the sun, and causes a total eclipse. This cock crowed before the Lord, and delighteth Him. (Babylonic Talmud.)

Zig. A chum, a comrade. (Italian zigo, a newt or little lizard.) It generally means un mauvais camarade, unless otherwise qualified. (French argot.)

"Only the bun zig Rac."—Outsid: Under Two Floors, chap. xvi.

Zim and Jim. "His house was made a habitation for Zim and Jim, and every unclean thing." (Godly Man's Portion, 1663). The marginal reading of Isa. xii. 21, 22, explains Zim to be wild beasts, and Jim jackals.

Zimri, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is the second Duke of Buckingham. Like the captain who conspired against Asa, King of Judah, he "formed parties and joined factions," but pending the issue "he was drinking himself drunk in the house of Arza, steward of his house." (1 Kings xvi. 9.)

"Some of the chiefs were princes in the land; in the first rank of these did Zimri stand; a man so various that he seemed to be not one, but all mankind's epitome. Stuff in opinions, always in the wrong. Was everything by starts, and nothing long." Part i. 548-549.

Zin'cali. Gipsies; so called in Spain from Sinte or Sind (India) and cato (black), the supposition being that they came from Hindustan, which no doubt is true. The Persian Zangi means an Ethiopian or Egyptian.

Zin'dikites (3 syl.). An heretical Mahometan sect, who disbelieve in God, the resurrection, and a future life. They think that the world is the production of four eternal substances, and that man is a microcosm of the world.

Zineu'ra, in the Decameron of Boccaccio (day ii. novel 9), is the Imogen of Shakespeare's Cymbeline. In male attire Zineura assumed the name of Sicura'no da Finale, and Imogen of Fidele. Zineura's husband was Bernard Lomellin, and the villain was Ambrose. Imogen's husband was Posthumus Leonatus, and the villain Iachimo. In Shakespeare, the British king Cymbeline takes the place assigned by Boccaccio to the sultan.

Zion. Daughter of Zion. Jerusalem or its inhabitants. The city of David stood on Mount Zion. Zion and Jerusalem, were pretty much in the same relation to each other as Old and New Edinburgh. (Hebrew, Tsion, a hill.)

Zist. "So trouver entre le zist et le zed." To be in a quandary; in a state of perfect bewilderment. Also, to shilly-shally. "Zist" is anything of no value, as "Cela ne vaut pas un zed." It is not worth a fig. "Zist" is the same word slightly varied.

Zobeide (2 syl.). A lady of Bagdad, whose history is related in the Three Calendars. The Kalif Haroun-al-Raschid married her. (Arabian Nights.)

Zodiac. An imaginary belt or zone in the heavens, extending about eight degrees each side of the ecliptic.

Signs of the Zodiac. The Zodiac is divided into twelve equal parts, proceeding from west to east; each part is thirty degrees and is distinguished by a sign. Beginning with "Aries," we have first six northern and then six southern signs—i.e. six on the north side and six on the south side of the equator; beginning with "Capricornus," we have six ascending and then six descending signs—i.e. six which ascend higher and higher towards the north and six which descend lower and lower towards the south. The six northern signs are: Aries (the ram), Taurus (the bull), Gemini (the twins), spring signs; Cancer (the crab), Leo (the lion), Virgo (the virgin), summer signs. The six southern are: Libra (the balance), Scorpio (the scorpion), Sagittarius (the archer), autumn signs; Capricornus (the goat), Aquarius (the water-bearer) and Pisces.
(the fishes), winter signs. (Greek, so-on, living creatures.)

Our zernal signs the Ram begins,
Then comes the Bull, in May the Twins ;—
The Crab in June, next Leo shines,
And Virgo ends the northern signs.

The Balance brings autumnal fruits,
The Scorpion stings, the Archer shoots ;—
December’s Goat brings wintry blast,
Aquarius rain, the Fish come last. “E. C. B.

Zohar. The name of a Jewish book containing cabalistic expositions of the “books of Moses.” Traditionally ascribed to Rabbi Simon ben Yochi, first century; but probably belonging to the thirteenth century.

“The renowned Zohar is written in Aramaic, and is a commentary on the Pentateuch, according to its divisions into fifty-two hebraicidal hosones.”—Encyclopaedia Britannica, vol. xii. p. 313.

Zollism. Harsh, ill-tempered criticism; so called from Zoilos (q.e.).

Zoilos (Latin, Zoilus). The sword of Zoilos. The pen of a critic. Zoilos was a literary Thersites, shrewd, witty, and spiteful. He was nicknamed Home~ro~mastiz (Homer’s scourge), because he mercilessly assailed the epics of Homer, and called the companions of Ulysses in the island of Circe “weeping porkers” (“choirid'ia klaionta”). He also flew at Plato, Isocrates, and other high game.

“Pendem volo Zolium videre.” Martial.

Zola-lse. To write like Zola, the French novelist, the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Zola is noted for his realistic novels, many of which are unfit for circulating libraries. His speciality is a reckless exposure of the licentious habits of the French. His historic novel, called the Débâcle, exposed the breakdown of Napoleon III. and his army in the Franco-German war (1870-1871).

Other parts of speech from Zola are Zolaesque, Zolaisation, Zolaiser, etc.

Zula: The most complimentary meaning of Zolaesque is the terrible descriptive style of writing. The more general meaning is licentious and coarsely erotic.

Zollverein, meaning customs union, a commercial union of German states for the purpose of establishing a uniform tariff of duties. (Begun 1819.)

Zophial. An angelic scout of “swiftest wing.” The word means “God’s spy.” (Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 356.)

Zoraida (3 syl.). Daughter of Agimorato of Algiers, who becomes a Christian and elopes with Ruy Perez de Viedma, an officer of Leon. The story is told in an episode of Don Quixote, called The Captive’s Life and Adventures. (Bk. iv. chap. ix.-xi.)

Zoraida (3 syl.) or Zoraida. The name of a yacht belonging to the squadron at Cowes. This name is taken from Rossini’s Zoraida et Coradin.

Zounds! An oath, meaning God’s wounds.

Zulal. That stream of Paradise, clear as crystal and delicious as nectar, which “the spirits of the just made perfect” drink of.

Zuleika. Daughter of Giaffir, Pacha of Abydos. She is all purity and loveliness. Her intelligence, joyousness, undeviating love, and strict regard to duty are beautifully portrayed. She promises to flee with Selim and become his bride;—but her father, Giaffir, shoots her lover, and Zuleika dies of a broken heart. (Byron: Bride of Abydos.)

Zuleika. The wife of Joseph.

“It is less costly than the others, and it is remarkable that, although his wife’s name, Zuleika (according to tradition), is inscribed in the certificates given to pilgrims, no grave having that name is shown.”—The Times (Report on the visit of the Prince of Wales to the mosque of Hebron).

Zulafgar. Ali’s sword. (See Sword.)
